A DPA such as this one erodes the most elementary protections of the criminal law, by turning the prosecutor into judge and jury, thus undermining our principles of separation of powers. The Bristol-Myers Squibb DPA allows the prosecutor to lower the boom following the recommendation of Mr. Lacey. The corporation's sole remedy is to plead its case before the prosecutor in an environment wholly devoid of the most rudimentary procedural protections.

These powers were implemented when Mr. Christie threatened to reinstate the indictment if the board did not remove CEO Peter R. Dolan for his role in an aborted agreement with Canadian corporation Apotex. The agreement -- to delay Apotex's introduction of a generic competitor to Plavix, BMS's best-selling blood thinner -- led to a criminal antitrust investigation. Any connection between channel stuffing and price fixing remains unclear. * * *

BMS is not the only instance of prosecutorial zeal. A New York deferred prosecution agreement with KPMG in essence required the firm to stop payment to former employees to cover the defense expenses in criminal prosecutions for tax fraud before Judge Lewis A. Kaplan in New York's southern district. Mr. Kaplan rightly treated the government's decision as an unwarranted interference with the defendants' constitutional right to the assistance of counsel and a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. He has ordered a cessation of proceedings until the defense lawyers could regroup their forces.

Yet we should do far better. For starters, the Department of Justice should engage in unilateral disarmament by disavowing the odious Thompson memo, and rethinking why it ever needs to threaten the nuclear option of a corporate indictment. For its part, our new Congress should repeal by statute the doctrines of vicarious liability for criminal conduct in a corporate context -- because these give the government unwarranted and arbitrary power over corporations.

At bottom, corporations are just individuals tied together by an elaborate network of contracts; and we don't need yet another sorry reminder of how mindless government policies harm the innocent shareholders whom they are supposed to protect. The government has a vital role in criminal enforcement. So let it go after real, i.e., human, criminals the old-fashioned way, by careful investigation and skilled prosecution.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Government To Appeal Acquittal Of Former San Diego Councilman (AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (AP) -- The Justice Department said Monday that it will appeal a federal judge's ruling that overturned a jury conviction of a former City Council member accused of taking money from a strip club owner in exchange for political favors.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam poured significant resources into winning a conviction against Michael Zucchet in July 2005, forcing the councilman to resign and relinquish his position as interim mayor. Four months later, U.S. District Court Judge Jeffrey Miller acquitted Zucchet, saying the evidence against him on charges of fraud and extortion was insufficient.

"Because it is rare for a trial judge to overturn a jury's unanimous finding of guilt, it should not surprise anyone that the government would seek to defend the jury's verdicts on appeal," Lam said in a statement.

Zucchet's attorney, Jerry Coughlan, insisted on Zucchet's innocence.

"They've got an uphill battle ahead of them to convince an appellate court that one of the best judges around was wrong," Coughlan said.

Zucchet and fellow former Councilman Ralph Inzunza were convicted of taking money from Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi in exchange for trying to ease restrictions on touching dancers at San Diego strip clubs.

Zucchet was convicted of four counts of fraud and three counts of extortion on his first day as interim mayor. Mayor Dick Murphy had resigned amid federal probes into the city's scandal-plagued pension fund.

Inzunza was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Lance Malone, a former Clark County, Nev., commissioner and a lobbyist for Galardi, was sentenced to three years in prison.

Fan Hacks Into Cell Phone Data For Linkin Park's Lead Singer, Threatens Wife, Feds Say (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - ALBUQUERQUE, New Mexico-A woman is accused of using a computer at a national laboratory to hack into a cell phone company's Web site to get a number for Chester Bennington, lead singer of the Grammy-winning rock group Linkin Park.

According to an affidavit filed by the Department of Defense Inspector General, Devon Townsend, 27, obtained copies of Bennington's cell phone bill, the phone numbers he called and digital pictures taken with the phone.

Investigators said she also hacked into the e-mail of Bennington's wife, Talinda Bennington, and at one point called her and threatened her.

Talinda Bennington told federal authorities last month that someone had accessed their Verizon Wireless account online, according to the affidavit, and expressed concern that a "stalker" had access to personal information.

Townsend waived her right to a preliminary hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court and was released to her mother's custody. She is accused of using a computer at her former workplace, Sandia National Laboratories, to access Bennington's cell phone information. Lab spokesman Michael Padilla said Wednesday that she no longer worked there.

Townsend's attorney, Ray Twohig, said that investigators were still analyzing his client's computer and that it remains to be seen what exact violations will be alleged.

"This is the Internet version of a groupie hiding in Mick Jagger's dressing room," Twohig said. "We're in a different age, and fans have more skills than they used to."

Townsend's computer wasn't connected to classified data, Padilla said.

The affidavit says that during a search of Townsend's home in Albuquerque, investigators found Linkin Park posters, autographed band memorabilia, pictures of Townsend with Chester Bennington, bootlegged Linkin Park music and copies of messages and photographs intercepted from the Bennington family's e-mail accounts.

A person who answered the phone Friday at Time Warner - Linkin Park's label is Warner Bros. Music - said no one would be available to comment until Monday.

Sandia National Laboratories develop technology to support national security, according to its Web site.

Linkin Park has sold more than 36 million records worldwide. In February, Linkin Park and rapper Jay-Z shared a Grammy Award for best rap/sung collaboration for "Numb/Encore." In 2001, the band won a Grammy for best hard rock performance for "Crawling."

At Trial, Transcripts Reveal 2 Detectives' Last Minutes (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Two covert police detectives spent their final minutes touting their underworld credibility and evading their surveillance team in an effort to put the men they were investigating at ease, according to testimony and recordings delivered in court yesterday.

"What is the big deal?" one detective asked the two men in his car, according to a surveillance tape transcript provided by prosecutors. "I know. Everybody's leery. Listen, I'm leery, I'm leery too. I, I understand. I don't want to get caught up."

Minutes later on the evening of March 10, 2003, the detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, and his partner, Rodney J. Andrews, 34, lay dead on a street in Staten Island.

Their supervisor, Sgt. Richard Abbate, found their bodies shortly after losing the signal from a surveillance transmitter one detective wore disguised as a pager.

"I saw that he had one eye closed and one eye opened," Sergeant Abbate said, speaking from the witness stand about Detective Andrews. "He had sustained a wound to his head. I then approached Detective Nemorin. There was a long line of blood coming from his head."

It is likely that no one will ever know whether the detectives' efforts to disguise their employment succeeded. The man on trial for their killing in federal district court in Brooklyn, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty on charges of murder in furtherance of racketeering.

Prosecutors have dropped charges of obstruction of justice murder, because a witness crucial to those charges rescinded his earlier account that Mr. Wilson knew the men were detectives.

That witness, like several others in the case, was a member of the so-called Stapleton Crew, a street gang that prosecutors said sold drugs and guns, shot, robbed and terrorized a path across Staten Island.

"It grew from a group of guys selling crack cocaine on the corners and in the projects to having a route," an assistant United States attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said in her opening statement yesterday.

In the years since the shooting, seven members of the group have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges in exchange for their testimony against Mr. Wilson.

Ms. Kavanagh told jurors that Mr. Wilson intended to steal $1,200 from the detectives, money they were carrying to purchase a Tec-9 pistol, though the stack of police-issued $100 bills remained in Detective Nemorin's pocket after he was killed. She told jurors that the members of the Stapleton Crew had speculated on Detective Nemorin's police status, but she stopped short of suggesting that Mr. Wilson knew for sure.

"The evidence will show, ladies and gentlemen," Ms. Kavanagh said, "that the defendant did not care."

A lawyer for Mr. Wilson, Ephraim Savitt, told the jury that the witnesses were unreliable. Aside from the man who changed his account, others have lied to prosecutors and violated the conditions of their cooperation deals, Mr. Savitt said.

The fourth man in the car on the night of the shootings, Jesse Jacobus, then 17, has assaulted his fellow inmates as he waits to testify, the defense lawyer said.

"He still is a brute," Mr. Savitt said. "You're going to have to rely on the word of Jesse Jacobus to find that Ronell Wilson was actually the shooter, as the government alleges."

Mr. Jacobus is one of the seven men who have pleaded guilty in the case. As the lawyers made their arguments, a crowd of police officers watched on a screen from an overflow room. Inside the courtroom, their colleagues were dressed in business suits, prohibited from appearing in their uniforms.

Friends and relatives of the slain detectives, including several small children, watched from the gallery. As testimony began, the police supervisor, Sergeant Abbate, described following his detectives through the streets of Staten Island, listening to the signal from the surveillance transmitter in his sport utility vehicle. The car the detectives were driving, a Nissan Maxima, had once been his own department-issued vehicle.

Sergeant Abbate said he watched two men climb into the seats behind the detectives, ride around and then stop for a red light. When the light changed, Sergeant Abbate testified, the Maxima did not move. A man got out of the back seat. Inside his S.U.V., another officer leaned over and blew the horn. The man in the street turned and looked at the S.U.V., Sergeant Abbate said, identifying the person he saw as Mr. Wilson. Then the Maxima drove out of his sight.

The sergeant said he could tell that Mr. Wilson had later returned because he heard the same voice resume on the transmitter.

In their transcript, prosecutors identified that voice as “Ronell Wilson.” The recording played in court was unintelligible for long portions, a mixture of static, overlapping voices and hip-hop music, presumably from the car stereo. The audible parts are dominated by Detective Nemorin’s lilting Haitian accent.

Using profane street language riddled with racial slurs, Detective Nemorin sought to convince the men in the car that Detective Andrews was his brother-in-law.

“There’s nothing to worry about,” Detective Nemorin said. “Look, we’re not going to deal in front of him, O.K.? I’m coming. I could step out and we do the deal outside.”

The voice attributed to Mr. Wilson argued every point:

“That ain’t how Frankie run business, yo,” he said.

“It’s mad hot, man,” he said, meaning the police are watching closely.

“It’s mandatory, we gotta search you,” he said.

Between arguments, the voice directs Detective Nemorin where to turn as he drives, a winding series of lefts and rights punctuated by talk of frustration at red lights.

“That’s it, that’s it,” Detective Nemorin said, 20 seconds before the tape cuts to static. “All right? All right?”

Rare Death Penalty Trial Begins In New York (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 28, 2006

A federal prosecutor told a jury yesterday that the Staten Island man accused of executing two undercover detectives during a gun sale in 2003 had considered that his victims might be police and simply "did not care."

The defendant, Ronell Wilson, now 24, could face the death penalty if convicted in a trial that opened yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But the judge, Nicholas Garaufis, instructed the 12 jurors and six alternates not to think about sentencing Mr. Wilson during the first stage of the trial, as they decided the factual question of his guilt or innocence of the federal racketeering crimes he is charged with.

Mr. Wilson is a reputed leader of the Stapleton Crew, a gang named after the Staten Island housing project of the same name. Mr. Wilson is accused of killing detectives James Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews as he gave them driving directions from the back seat of the car.

The car, a Nissan Maxima, is at the center of the case. The ride began at about 7:15 p.m. on March 10, 2003, when the detectives pulled up in front of Wilson, then 20, and his 17-year-old associate Jesse Jacobus at the housing development.

The aim of the detectives, both members of the elite Firearms Investigation Unit, was to purchase a TEC-9 submachine gun for $1,200 and get "one more gun out of the hands of one more violent criminal," an assistant U.S. attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said. A half-hour later, the bodies of detectives were found in a nearby street. Both men had been shot in the head.

The conversation from the final 30 minutes of the detectives' lives was captured on a static-filled audiotape that prosecutors played yesterday. The conversation between Mr. Wilson and the detectives was fueled by suspicion. Mr. Wilson had expected only one man, not two, to show up for the deal. Nemorin repeatedly tries to allay Mr. Wilson's suspicions by saying Andrews is his brother-in-law.

Feds' Probe Of James Now Takes Close Look At Newark Land Deals (NSL)

By Ian T. Shearn And John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), November 28, 2006

A federal investigation into the administration of former Newark Mayor Sharpe James has expanded, with more subpoenas delivered to City Hall and agents now scrutinizing real estate deals that benefited some of the ex-mayor's biggest supporters, according to sources close to the probe.

FBI agents in recent weeks have interviewed a number of city employees, and prosecutors also have demanded additional records from Newark City Hall, among them personnel files of at least four current and former city employees, including James' son, Elliot.

The federal investigation began in late August, when federal officials issued subpoenas and executed a search warrant following a Star-Ledger story detailing travel expenses that James and his security detail had charged to a police department credit card. James, who stepped down in June after 20 years as mayor, remains a state senator.

While investigators continue to look at travel-related expenses, they are also probing the administration's sale of surplus city lots to developers at cut-rate prices, according to sources familiar with the investigation. Among those winning the no-bid contracts were several people with close ties to James, including some with little or no development experience, a Star-Ledger investigation found in 2005.

In June, a state Superior Court judge in Essex County halted the discount land sales, saying that the timing of developers' campaign contributions to James and other city officials and the approval of their projects "raises concerns."

James, now head of the newly created Urban Issues Institute at Essex County College, did not return phone messages left at his home and office. At a recent event sponsored by the institute, James declined to comment on the probe, saying, "We are not interested in that. I'm a college professor now."

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Chris Christie, declined comment.

On Nov. 2, federal investigators delivered a subpoena to City Hall, demanding the personnel files for Elliot James, the ex-mayor's son and former aide; Leonard Anton H. Wheeler, a school board member and former planning board member who was Sharpe James' legislative aide; Calvin West, who was James' top aide for years; and Diana Jarrell, an investigator for the city's Alcoholic Beverage Commission. A copy of the subpoena was viewed by The Star-Ledger.

It was unclear why the grand jury sought those records.

West, who is now employed as the governor's representative in North Jersey, said he was unaware that his records were subpoenaed, adding that he has not been called to testify before a grand jury.

"I've been out of City Hall for four years," West said. "Nobody has said anything to me."

Wheeler, now an Irvington school teacher, also said he was unaware that his records were subpoenaed. He said he had not been contacted about testifying, but would do so if called.

"I don't know what they hope to find by looking at my records," Wheeler said. "I wasn't paid much and I came to work."

Wheeler said he believes the investigation is politically motivated.

"This is about doing away with the old regime," Wheeler said. "This is about destroying Sharpe's legacy. Everything good that happened in this city in the last 20 years has Sharpe James' fingerprints on it."

Neither Elliot James nor Jarrell could be reached for comment.

In August, the U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed travel records and personnel files for 10 city employees, including five former police bodyguards, two department heads, two former mayoral aides and a former city councilman.

Anthony Fusco, a Passaic attorney representing three of James' former bodyguards, said his clients have been interviewed by FBI agents, but have not appeared before a grand jury. His clients -- officers Jerome Ramsey, Robert Moore and Lucinda Simmons -- are complying with federal investigators, he said.

Earlier this month, Newark attorney and longtime James confidant Raymond A. Brown and his son, Raymond M. Brown, went to City Hall and asked for copies of James' travel and expense account documents recently turned over to federal investigators, a spokeswoman for Mayor Cory Booker confirmed. City lawyers declined the request, said the spokeswoman, Desire Peterkin-Bell.

In an Aug. 20 story, The Star-Ledger detailed James' use of a police department credit card to augment his travel, dining and entertainment expenses.

While in office, James used two credit cards to pay for his travel and expenses -- one billed to the police department and the other to City Hall. According to incomplete records obtained by The Star-Ledger, James put more than $200,000 in charges on the two cards over the past 4 1/2 years, with more than $125,000 attributed to travel.

The two expense accounts came on top of $25,000 that the City Council added to his annual salary in 1993 to cover such costs.

In addition to demanding James' travel records, the U.S. Attorney's Office also has subpoenaed travel records and personnel files for 10 other city employees, including the police bodyguards, two department heads, two former mayoral aides and a former city councilman. Investigators also have asked for e-mails generated by James and another bodyguard, Adelino Benevente, dating to 2001.

3rd Woman Is Identified Among 4 Victims In Ditch (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Nate Schweber

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Investigators yesterday released the identity of the third of four women found dead last week in a ditch near a squalid strip of motels just outside Atlantic City. They noted that like two other victims, she, too, had a history of prostitution arrests.

The victim, Barbara Breidor, 42, is believed to have been dumped into the ravine about two weeks before pedestrians discovered the women's bodies on Nov. 20, according to a statement by the Atlantic County prosecutor, Jeffrey S. Blitz.

The cause of her death, and that of the unidentified victim, have not been determined. But investigators have said that autopsies on the other two victims showed that one, Tracy Ann Roberts, 23, died of asphyxiation and that the other, Kim Raffo, 35, was killed by ligature strangulation.

All four victims were found in several inches of water behind a $15-a-night motel, barefoot and with their heads facing in the same direction, a few hundred feet apart, Mr. Blitz has said.

Medical examiners have told investigators that the varying decomposition of the victims' bodies indicates that they had been killed and dumped at different times during the past month, and that the most recent victim had most likely been dead for only two days before she was found.

While drug dealing and prostitution have long been commonplace near the rundown strip of the Black Horse Pike where the bodies were found, many residents and business owners have been terrified at the prospect of a serial killer preying upon women who live on the margins of Atlantic City's economy.

Local authorities have formed a task force with the New Jersey State Police and the F.B.I. to try to solve the killings. Two dozen investigators have been assigned to the case, Mr. Blitz said. .

Ms. Breidor's friends said they had been worried about her since she disappeared about six weeks ago. She lived in a quiet neighborhood of well-tended homes across the street from the Ventnor Educational Community Complex.

Lori Adams, a former roommate, said that despite the problems that led Ms. Breidor to struggle for a living on the tawdry outskirts of Atlantic City, she was bright, upbeat and funny.

"She made you laugh every second of every day you were with her," Ms. Adams said.

Ms. Adams became agitated when asked about Ms. Breidor's record of prostitution arrests. "It's nobody's business what she did with her life," she said. "The things she did she will take to her grave."

Ms. Breidor was raised in the suburbs of Philadelphia, according to a cousin, Lance Breidor, and lived intermittently along the Jersey Shore during the past two decades. Mr. Breidor, 45, said they spent a lot of time together as children but drifted apart when they became adults. He said he remembered hearing that she had struggled with drug addiction.

When he last saw Ms. Breidor eight years ago, he said, she was working at a jewelry store at a mall outside of Philadelphia and appeared to have her life in order

"She seemed to be the type that would always be smiling and joking," he said. "Usually when there are people who'd take a bad turn there are signs. But we never saw any with her."

A.C. Killings Echo Three Earlier Cases (PHI)

By George Anastasia And Jacqueline L. Urgo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098825

ATLANTIC CITY - Earlier this year, three suspected prostitutes were attacked on North Georgia Avenue a few blocks from the city's Boardwalk casino strip.

All three were slashed across the throat. Two died.

Those unsolved crimes have attracted the attention of investigators probing the killings of four suspected prostitutes whose bodies were found last week in a drainage ditch in the West Atlantic City section of Egg Harbor Township.

"Major Crimes, the FBI and the state police have been in," said Atlantic City Police Detective Richard Johnson, a city arson investigator who worked on the Georgia Avenue cases.

Johnson was quick to point out that there was no hard evidence linking the Georgia Avenue slashings to the marsh killings, which some have attributed to a serial killer. Investigators are interested because all of the victims were apparently prostitutes, Johnson said.

Though the victims on Georgia Avenue were slashed, authorities have determined that at least two of the women whose bodies were dumped in the marsh had been strangled. Pathologists could not determine the cause of death of the two other marsh victims because the bodies were too badly decomposed.

Yesterday, as a task force of federal, state and local authorities pressed the hunt for the killer of the women in the marsh, a third victim was identified as 42-year-old Barbara V. Breidor. The fourth victim, whose body had been in the ditch for up to a month, remains unidentified.

Authorities pointed out that all four women in the ditch were white with blond or light hair.

Two of the Georgia Avenue victims, including one who died, fit that description, Johnson said. The other woman who died was African American.

"They're all from the same victimization group," Capt. Jim Hutchins of the Atlantic City police said, referring to the women's background as suspected prostitutes. He said yesterday that linking the two sets of killings would be speculation at this point.

The first Georgia Avenue slaying was on May 3, according to police, who opened an investigation after firefighters responding to a fire in an apartment at 29 N. Georgia Ave. discovered a charred body.

The victim was later identified as Veronica Fields, 45.

"She was badly burned," said Johnson, the arson investigator. "It wasn't until the autopsy that we realized her throat had been slashed.

Authorities believe Fields' killer put her on a bed in her apartment and set the bed on fire.

In July, a suspected prostitute was attacked in a parking lot next to that building, Johnson said. Her throat was slashed, but she survived.

Police would not release the woman's name yesterday.

Two months later, on Oct. 1, police were summoned to an apartment at 26 N. Georgia Ave., where they found Karen Luongo dead in her bathtub. Her throat had been slashed.

Luongo was last seen entering her apartment a few nights earlier with an unidentified man, according to a report in the Atlantic City Press.

Johnson said investigators had been pursuing several angles in that case, including one theory that Luongo was killed because she knew who had killed Fields.

The two apartment buildings are across the street from each other, just a few blocks from the Boardwalk casino strip and the city convention center and train station.

The apartment building at 26 N. Georgia has a notorious history. Twenty-five years ago it was the residence of mob boss Nicodemo "Little Nicky" Scarfo, who is now serving a 55-year prison term for racketeering and murder.

"Back then that was one of the safest blocks in the city," an investigator said.

The Atlantic City Police Department Vice Squad has been providing information to the law enforcement task force investigating the West Atlantic City murders.

The four marsh bodies were discovered Nov. 20 within about 300 feet of one another in a drainage ditch behind a strip of seedy motels along the Black Horse Pike, about a mile outside Atlantic City.

All four were barefoot, lying facedown, with their heads pointed toward Atlantic City.

DOJ_NMG_0098826

Breidor last lived on Lafayette Avenue in Ventnor. She was identified through dental records, Atlantic County Prosecutor Jeffrey S. Blitz said.

Earlier, investigators identified two other victims as Tracy Ann Roberts, 23, and Kim Raffo, 35, both of Atlantic City. Both had been strangled.

Breidor was wearing Capri-style jeans and a brown, long-sleeve zippered jacket. Blitz estimated her body had been in the water at least two weeks and authorities could not determine a cause of death.

Breidor, Roberts and Raffo had arrest records for prostitution, Blitz said.

The fourth victim, described as 5 feet tall and weighing about 160 pounds, has not been identified. Authorities believe her body was in the water for up to a month. Investigators hope several identifying tattoos, including a black-and-white bulldog on the small of her back, a crudely designed Playboy bunny on her shoulder, and the name "Yolly" or "Molly" on her stomach, will help them learn her identity.

The three known victims have been described as transient, living in boardinghouses and apartments in Atlantic City's poorer fringes. Fields and Luongo, the Georgia Avenue victims, also skipped from house to house.

"They're easy targets," said Hutchins, a 25-year police veteran. "If they disappear for two weeks, nobody cares. They just figure they're 'cracked out.' "

Hutchins said most prostitutes in Atlantic City - as in other cities - are drug addicts likely to take risks.

"It's an occupational hazard," he said. "But they'll pretty much do anything for a dollar."

Fairfax Police To Seek FBI Help (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Fairfax County police plan to ask for help from the FBI as they investigate the recent killings of two similar-looking elderly women who shared the same first name and lived two miles apart.

"We want to make sure we're looking into all possible leads," said Officer Camille Neville, a Fairfax County police spokeswoman.

Officer Neville said that officers canvassing the Springfield neighborhood near where the women were killed received some "promising" tips.

Police stopped cars at Hyland and Craig streets Sunday night, handing out 4,000 fliers and asking residents for information.

"We did receive some interesting information -- not necessarily pertinent at this point, but things we would not have known otherwise," she said.

Marion Newman, 74, of the 7100 block of Reservoir Road, was found dead inside her home by a friend about 11:15 a.m. last Tuesday. She had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier.

Police said there was no sign of forced entry into Mrs. Newman's home, but there were signs of a struggle. They also said that Mrs. Newman suffered trauma to her upper body.

Investigators are examining whether the case is linked to the August slaying of Marion Barbara Marshall just two miles away.

A friend found Mrs. Marshall, 72, dead in her home in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14. An autopsy revealed that Mrs. Marshall had been beaten to death.

Surveillance photos showed Mrs. Marshall about 11:15 a.m. Aug. 14 at the Giant Food store in the Bradlick Shopping Center, located at 6980 Braddock Road, police said.

Police said that they have not connected the two killings through physical evidence but are investigating the similarities.

Officer Neville said police are planning to ask for help from the FBI's Quantico, Va.-based Behavioral Science Unit, which develops profiles of suspects based on evidence patterns.

Police do not believe the killings of Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Newman were related to the death of a 52-year-old Falls Church woman found in her house about 4:30 p.m. Saturday.

Officers found Julie Mansfield Adams of the 8300 block of Glastonbury Court after receiving a tip from West Virginia State Police, who were investigating the suicide of a 41-year-old man.

Police initially said that Mrs. Adams suffered trauma to the upper body, but autopsy results released yesterday showed that she died from a stab wound.

The killing was domestic in nature, police said.

Fairfax County has recorded 15 homicides this year.

Inmate At Big Sandy Prison Slain; Second Killing In Three Weeks (LEXHL)

By Lee Mueller, EASTERN KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 28, 2006

INEZ - Federal authorities are investigating the second slaying in less than three weeks at a maximum security prison in Eastern Kentucky.

Prison authorities Monday confirmed the stabbing death of Shamoni Peterson, 32, on Nov. 13, three weeks after the U.S. Penitentiary-Big Sandy in Martin County reported the first slaying since it opened in 2003.

"Preliminary information indicates he was the victim of an assault," a Federal Bureau of Prisons news release said Monday.

Peterson, like the first victim, Calvin Speight, 42, was from Washington, D.C. Peterson was transferred to the Martin County prison on Dec. 14 and was serving a sentence of six years and three months for unlawful possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, according to authorities.

Like Speight, who died Oct. 24, Peterson was transported to Highlands Regional Medical Center near Prestonsburg, where he was pronounced dead, Floyd County Coroner Roger Nelson said.

Nelson said Peterson apparently had been stabbed repeatedly with a sharp weapon and was pronounced dead at 6:40 a.m.

"He bled out, more or less," Nelson said.

Prison spokeswoman Mashelle Arisman said that no charges have been filed in either case, but that the FBI is investigating.

Arisman said the prison, which houses 1,600 high-security inmates near the Johnson County line, has been placed on lockdown status during the investigation.

Warden Suzanne Hastings could not be reached for comment, but Felica Ponce, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons in Washington, said "there is no correlation between the two deaths that have occurred there."

Slick Admits Lying To FBI In Miller Case (CRG)

By Dorothy De Souza Guedes

Cedar Rapids Gazette, November 28, 2006

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA - In a small federal courtroom crowded with reporters, investigators and members of Evelyn Miller's family, Danny Slick pleaded guilty to lying during a July 3, 2005, interview with the FBI about Evelyn's disappearance.

Details of the plea agreement, which could require Slick to cooperating with prosecutors, were not available.

Slick was accused of lying to FBI agents July 3, 2005, about a drug dealer known as "Porky" and where "Porky" lived.

Slick's friend Randy Patrie, 34, told Slick that he had stopped to get "dope" at "Porky's" after he dropped off Slick at their residence about 2:30 a.m. July 1, 2005, after the two men left the apartment where Evelyn lived with her family.

At the time of Slick's arrest, authorities said it was an important step forward in piecing together the events that led to the disappearance of Evelyn and her death.

"This is the first time that somebody is having to take responsibility for anything connected to Evelyn's disappearance," said Brandi Hoffman, of Des Moines.

Hoffman spoke outside the courthouse on behalf of the family. She is the sister of Casey Fredericksen who was engaged to Evelyn's mother and responsible for the girl's care the morning she disappeared.

Man Pleads Guilty To Misleading FBI In Evelyn Miller Case (AP)

CEDAR RAPIDS (AP) — A man believed to have been one of the last to see Evelyn Miller alive pleaded guilty Monday to lying to FBI agents investigating the girl's 2005 disappearance and death.

Danny Slick, 27, of Charles City, admitted in federal court to giving investigators false statements during interviews days after the five-year-old girl disappeared from her Floyd apartment.

He faces a maximum of five years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 20 in U.S. District Court in Sioux City.

Prosecutors and investigators have said little on whether Slick's legal case has any significant bearing on the ongoing investigation into Miller's slaying.

But U.S. District Judge John Jarvey agreed Monday to seal most of the details of Slick's 13-page plea deal.

Relatives of the young girl viewed Slick's guilty plea and its confidential details as some positive pieces to the puzzle.

"I think he knows who did it and what happened," Brandi Hoffman, the girl's aunt, told reporters afterward. "There has to be a reason for them to have sealed" the plea deal.

Slick was arrested in June and indicted by a grand jury on two counts of making false statements to FBI agents working the case.

He pleaded not guilty, was released after posting bond, but arrested again in August for violating his probation and held in custody since.

Dressed in a prison gray shirt and pants and handcuffed around the waist, Slick offered few words during his brief hearing, mostly just answering "yes" to a series of the judge's questions.

Under the deal, Slick admitted to lies alleged in the indictment's second count, involving statements Slick gave about his whereabouts and that of his former roommate, Randy Patrie, the night Miller disappeared.

Initially, Slick said he and Patrie visited the apartment to see Casey Fredericksen, the live-in boyfriend of the girl's mother, Noel.

Slick said he and Patrie left Miller's apartment and returned to their home in Charles City at about 2:30 a.m, but that Patrie left for about 15 minutes, allegedly to buy drugs at the home of someone named "Porky."

In the indictment, authorities say Slick altered details of his initial story during a second interview. In court documents, Slick said he did not see Patrie again for several hours after Patrie left their home, and that he misled agents when he denied knowing Porky's real name and where he lived.

Where Are They? 2 Little Boys Have Vanished Without A Trace (MINNST)

By Terry Collins And Richard Meryhew, Star Tribune Staff Writers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 28, 2006

Ground and air searches turned up no sign of the Red Lake brothers, opening up other theories about what happened.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- Now that the air and ground crews are gone, the question on everyone's mind is: If Tristan and Avery didn't wander away from their home, then what happened to them?

"We just don't have any indicators one way or another," on whether the brothers wandered off or whether foul play was involved, FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said Monday.

Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, were last seen playing outside their home Wednesday morning in a remote area.

Although authorities have said they have found no evidence so far that would suggest the boys were abducted, that scenario seems more probable with each passing day, said an expert familiar with cases of missing children.

"There's not a break in the ice, not the scent in the trails that would normally tell you they wandered off," said Nancy Sabin, executive director of the Jacob Wetterling Foundation.

DOJ_NMG_0098829

Sabin added: "They used a lot of sophisticated tools to figure out how far those boys went and how fast. And as of the moment, there isn't any evidence that they went into the water anywhere. ..."It's a stumper I think at this point, anything is possible," she said.

The Wetterling Foundation is a nonprofit organization that educates families and communities to prevent the exploitation of children.

Paul Burke, a consultant with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, agreed with Sabin.

"I don't know where this will go," Burke said Sunday after thanking the scores of volunteers at the Red Lake Humanities Center. "It's hard. It's tough."

The ground and air searches were called off on Sunday, but "pinpoint searches" will continue. Under dreary skies, authorities on Monday surveyed some empty houses near the missing boys' home.

While the brothers haven't been seen, their smiling faces are on fliers that have been posted in surrounding areas and the Twin Cities.

After five days of intense searching, McCabe said they haven't ruled out the possibility the boys might still be on the Red Lake Reservation in northern Minnesota.

"Whenever you do a ground search, you can't always be sure," he said. "There's never a guarantee every area has been covered, even after a thorough search."

Sabin encouraged anyone who might have information about the case to call authorities. The FBI has set up a tip hot line at 1-866-333-4969. Citizens also can call the FBI at 612-376-3200 or the Red Lake Tribal Police at 1-218-679-3313.

"The public's eyes, ears and hearts are really needed in this situation to break this case in some way," Sabin said. "We need some good, quality leads. And you just never know what's going to break it. Somebody out there knows something."

Stranger abductions of children are extremely rare in the United States. The most recent study by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children showed that about 115 occur each year.

Nevertheless, Sabin said , parents of children who have questions about the Red Lake case should talk with them to reassure them that they are safe and loved.

"Parents need to give an extra hug or spend time in conversation or a hand held here or there to make sure they are going to be OK," she said.

'POP' TART SCAMS BIGWIG (NYPOST)

By Dan Mangan

The New York Post, November 28, 2006

November 28, 2006 -- A pretty, young swindler who first met a top Pepsi Bottling Group executive online later anonymously shook him down for $125,000 by threatening to tell his wife, children and bosses he was trolling the 'Net at work for women, shocking court papers reveal.

"I'm sure this will be an unpleasant surprise. I'm sure when your wife finds out that you've been looking for a fill-in for her . . . it will be unpleasant for her, too," Jessica Wolcott, 22, e-mailed multimillionaire exec Gary Wandschneider, 54, in August.

Wolcott - who had met the exec face-to-face five months earlier - hid her identity in the threatening missive by using the e-mail account "cheater_eater@hotmail.com."

"After all these years of being married, this is how you repay your vows?" Wolcott asked Wandschneider, a father of three and executive V.P. for worldwide operations at Westchester-based Pepsi Bottling.

"You are disgusting . . . you are pathetic," Wolcott continued in the August e-mail.

Wolcott warned Wandschneider he would end up known as "just another hated Peter Cook" - supermodel Christie Brinkley's cheating hubby - if he didn't pony up the cash.

And when Wandschneider tried to stall by asking for time to gather the $125,000, she warned, "Here's hoping your life is still a living hell and worrying every day that your name will be in the news or on a TV movie for what you've done to your wife."

Wolcott eventually got the funds transferred to her online account - but only after Wandschneider alerted the FBI, which provided the money and set up a sting to nail her.

The feds discovered her identity by determining she sent the e-mails from various locations in Pennsylvania.

When Wandschneider learned her name from FBI agents, he told them he had met her last February through the craigslist.org Web site. A month later, after exchanging e-mails and photos, he met her at a Mount Kisco bar.

The Ridgefield, Conn., man also copped to giving her $30,000 shortly after that meeting because she told him she needed to pay debts.

Although court papers do not identify Wandschneider by name, his identity was confirmed by Pepsi Bottling.

Wolcott pleaded guilty to the extortion scheme in White Plains federal court last week. She was ordered to repay the swindled $125,000 and surrender her computer.

She faces up to two years in prison at her February sentencing, but remains free on bail.

Wandschneider - who admitted to the feds that he used craigslist.org and another Web site to meet other women - could not be reached for comment.

But his wife, Dana, said, "I can't wait for her to be sentenced. You know, extortion is a bad thing."

A Pepsi Bottling spokeswoman said the company - the world's largest bottler of Pepsi beverages - learned of the scandal only yesterday and has launched an internal investigation.

Wolcott told thesmokinggun.com Web site, which first reported the case, that she did not have a "relationship" with Wandschneider.

Her lawyer, Susan Brody, told the Web site that Wolcott was "a young girl who has not had an easy life."

When Wandschneider first received an anonymous threatening e-mail on his office computer from Wolcott, she told "Gary" that she knew he had used his work e-mail account on a Web site that catered to wealthy men trying to meet attractive women, court records say.

"I'm sure [Pepsi Bottling] would be very proud to have an employee with such high morals," she wrote. "I don't like cheaters, not at all, men like you become my profession . . . You think you can just [throw] money at some young girl . . . who needs it because you are in a better position and use it to get sex?"

Admitting that what she was doing was extortion, Wolcott told Wandschneider she had no criminal record, so that even if she got caught, "I will get a slap on the wrist."

Ex-city Worker Pleads Guilty (RMA)

By Jack Flynn, Jflynn@repub.com

The Republican (MA), November 28, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - Another day, another guilty plea.

A former Springfield Housing Authority maintenance foreman yesterday became the 25th defendant to be convicted or admit guilt in Springfield's corruption probe. He pleaded guilty to two felonies for his role in building the Rhode Island summer home of ex-City Councilor Francis G. Keough III.

Daniel J. McNamee, 40, of Springfield, pleaded guilty to one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false federal tax return during a hearing before Judge Michael A. Ponsor in U.S. District Court.

The guilty pleas were part of a deal with the U.S. Justice Department that will spare McNamee a trial but potentially expose him to 12 to 18 months in prison, Ponsor said. Sentencing was set for March 1.

The pace of the six-year federal corruption offensive has picked up since August, with 10 defendants pleading guilty and two others accepting plea deals in the housing authority scandal.

Last week, Fred Swan, a prominent city activist and brother of state Rep. Benjamin Swan, D-Springfield, pleaded guilty to fraud and other charges for his management of the taxpayer-funded Caring Health Center in Springfield.

In the only defeat for the federal government, Ponsor ruled that charges were filed too late against housing authority contractor Peter Davis following his trial in October on racketeering and bribery conspiracy charges.

Details of McNamee's agreement, including whether he will be required to cooperate in upcoming cases, were not immediately available yesterday.

The outlines of the deal were discussed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven H. Breslow and McNamee's lawyer, Mark J. Albano, during a brief private conference with Ponsor.

The plea came seven months after a grand jury accused McNamee of misleading investigators about a heating system he installed at Keough's Rhode Island vacation home, and failing to report $11,000 in income from construction work at Friends of the Homeless, a taxpayer-financed charity run by Keough after he left politics in the mid-1990s.

Until quitting in 2002 to run his own contracting business, McNamee had worked as a $47,000-a-year maintenance foreman for the housing authority's Reed Village development.

During yesterday's hearing, Breslow said the defendant not only worked on Keough's property on authority time, but was accompanied by other employees as well.

No charged were filed against McNamee for defrauding the authority, but the 50-count indictment against Keough and two other men states that the $1,700 boiler installed at his home was obtained from the authority.

Keough, one of Springfield's most influential figures, is facing fraud, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, tax evasion and other charges related to his decade-long tenure at the homeless charity.

In the Springfield Housing Authority case, ex-director Raymond B. Asselin and 11 others pleaded guilty or accepted plea agreements in a multi-million dollar embezzlement scheme.

The housing authority and Friends of the Homeless are operating under new management.

Gentry Admits He Shot Tame Bear (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, November 28, 2006

Country music star Troy Lee Gentry admitted Monday that "Cubby," the bear he killed on a Minnesota farm in 2004, wasn't a wild beast after all.

Appearing in federal court in Duluth on the day his trial was to start, Gentry pleaded guilty to a charge of falsely claiming the animal was wild. The charge, a misdemeanor, was the result of a plea bargain reached last week with federal prosecutors.

"He's glad to get it over with," said Gentry's attorney, Ron Meshbesher, of Minneapolis. "Obviously, he's saddened by all the publicity in this case, which inferred all kinds of improper conduct."

Gentry, 39, and Lee Marvin Greenly, 46, who owns Minnesota Wildlife Connection near Sandstone, were charged in August with conspiracy and falsely "tagging" the "trophy-caliber" bear by claiming it was shot in the wild. In reality, the tame bear was shot in a fenced area of several acres.

After the indictment, Gentry's Nashville agent shifted the blame for any improper conduct to Greenly, and online fan discussion forums were abuzz with debate over whether Gentry was a bona fide big-game hunter or a wannabe.

Gentry, in a statement released by his management company, said he regrets what happened, but he stops short of accepting any culpability other than relying on Greenly's guidance.

"I did participate in improperly tagging the animal I shot, without realizing the seriousness of what I was doing. For that, I am truly sorry," the statement said. "I relied on the experts around me for guidance, and I regret that today. Not so much because I was fined and punished, but because it appears that I don't have respect for the law."

He says the legal case "has been a humbling experience for me, and one which I deeply regret."

Gentry, half the country duo Montgomery Gentry, had previously declined to speak publicly about the bear shooting. The band's Web site works to craft an image of him and Eddie Montgomery as authentic country music icons.

"We're not trying to candy-coat anything. Who we are is who we are. It's all about being real, being yourself, and playing real music to the people," Gentry is quoted as saying in a biographical blurb.

But federal wildlife officials alleged Gentry's self-professed prowess as a bow hunter was candy-coated and in fact not real. The music star paid Greenly $4,650 for "Cubby," a 600-pound black bear that lived on Greenly's 80-acre business.

Gentry, who lives in Tennessee and has a Minnesota hunting license, killed the bear with a bow and arrow as a video camera recorded the action.

When the kill was registered with the state's Department of Natural Resources, however, he said the bear was killed in the wild.

Meshbesher and the U.S. attorney's office worked out the plea bargain last week, and Gentry entered his new plea Monday morning before U.S. District Judge Paul Magnuson, sitting in Duluth.

In return for the guilty plea, prosecutors dropped a felony count against Gentry.

"It was emphasized by the judge … that he was merely charged with an improper tagging where the bear was killed," Meshbesher said. "The bear was legally harvested."

Greenly pleaded guilty to two felony counts. He is alleged to have set up illegal baiting stations inside Sandstone National Wildlife Refuge, then helped other hunters kill bears at the stations.

Both men will be sentenced later. Greenly could face up to five years' imprisonment on each count and a $400,000 fine.

Gentry has agreed to pay a $15,000 fine and not hunt in Minnesota for five years. He also will turn over the mounted bear, which Meshbesher said is in Gentry's home in Nashville.

While it may not rise to the collectibility status of Hank Williams' Martin D-28 guitar or a Lefty Frizzell rhinestone Nudie suit, the bear could wind up in the hands of a fan. Forfeited items are usually sold by the government at auction, Meshbesher said.

In a notice posted on Montgomery Gentry's Web site after the indictment in August, Johnny Dorris, whose Hallmark Direction Co. manages the band, lashed out at the "false accusations made against Troy in the indictment."

He said Gentry was "disheartened that he has been falsely accused" and shifted the blame to Greenly, saying Gentry had killed and tagged the bear "per the guidance of his professional guide."

Dorris could not be reached for comment Monday.

Gentry is an avid hunter, Meshbesher said. The band's 10-page contract rider even includes an "Attitude Enhancement" section that said any promoter booking the band in winter should provide for "snow skiing, snowmobiling, boating, hunting and/or fishing."

CIVIL LAW:

Justices Let Stand A Decision To Void Big Award Against Philip Morris (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court refused to revive a $10.1 billion award against Philip Morris USA yesterday, rejecting an appeal from smokers who said they were misled about the health risks of "light" cigarettes.

The justices, without comment, left intact an Illinois Supreme Court decision that threw out the case against Philip Morris, which is a division of the Altria Group and is the nation's largest cigarette maker.

Antismoking activists had hoped the verdict would be the first in a series of awards around the country against the industry over light cigarettes.

"It's clearly the end of lights litigation in Illinois," said David Adelman, a Morgan Stanley analyst who has an overweight rating on Altria. Altria shares fell 33 cents, to $83.42, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

In overturning the award last year, the Illinois Supreme Court said smokers could not invoke a state consumer protection law because the Federal Trade Commission had endorsed the "light" and "low tar" descriptions in settlements with other cigarette makers. Like many states, Illinois bars claims over actions specifically authorized by a government agency.

Supreme Court intervention might have complicated plans by Altria, which is based in New York, to spin off its Kraft Foods unit. On Nov. 16, Altria's chief executive, Louis C. Camilleri, said the company was ready to split off the food company, pointing to what he said was a waning risk of costly tobacco-related awards.

The tobacco industry is still defending a separate nationwide class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in New York on behalf of light cigarette smokers. That suit, which invokes federal racketeering law, also raises questions about the legal force of the F.T.C. settlements.

Arguments in Major Antitrust Case

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 (AP) — The Supreme Court pressed both sides Monday in a case that turns on the question of how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust-conspiracy suit.

Some experts consider the case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, which stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years.

The class-action suit was filed in 2003 on behalf of United States consumers of local telephone and Internet service, claiming that incumbent local telephone companies, or Baby Bells, illegally conspired to prevent competition by excluding new local phone companies from their territories and agreeing not to compete against each other.

The original seven incumbent local phone companies have been reduced to four through mergers and acquisitions: Verizon Communications, the BellSouth Corporation, Qwest Communications and AT&T.

A federal district court dismissed the case, saying plaintiffs did not have enough evidence to show that a conspiracy would most likely be proved at trial. That decision was reversed by the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which ruled in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a “short and plain statement of the claim” to survive a motion to dismiss.

The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, who contend that a low standard would allow “meritless” and “abusive” cases to go forward. But the plaintiffs argue that a higher standard could make it too difficult for individuals to bring valid antitrust cases.

Supreme Court Rejects Reinstatement Of $10.1 Billion Cigarette Verdict (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, November 28, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court sided with one of the largest U.S. tobacco companies on Monday and refused to disturb a court ruling that threw out a $10.1 billion verdict over Philip Morris USA's "light" cigarettes.

The Court issued its order without comment.

Last year, the Illinois Supreme Court threw out the massive fraud judgment against Philip Morris, a unit of the Altria Group Inc., in a class action lawsuit that involved "light" cigarettes.

Because the Federal Trade Commission allowed companies to characterize their cigarettes as "light" and "low tar," Philip Morris could not be held liable under state law even if the terms it used could be found false or misleading, the state court said.

The case involved 1.1 million people who bought "light" cigarettes in Illinois. They claimed Philip Morris knew when it introduced such cigarettes in 1971 that they were no healthier than regular cigarettes but hid both that information and that light cigarettes actually had a more toxic form of tar.

An Illinois judge ruled in favor of the smokers in March 2003, saying the company misled customers into believing they were buying a less harmful cigarette.

A separate case involving Philip Morris is pending before the Supreme Court. Justices are considering whether to allow a punitive damages award of $79.5 million to the widow of a longtime smoker.

Laws Prohibit Smoking Around Children (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 28, 2006

Anti-tobacco forces are opening a new front in the war against smoking by banning it in private places such as homes and cars when children are present.

Starting Jan. 1, Texas will restrict smoking in foster parents' homes at all times and in cars when children are present, says Darrell Azar of the Department of Family and Protective Services.

Vermont, Washington and other states and counties already prohibit foster parents from smoking around children in their homes and cars.

Arkansas and Louisiana passed laws this year forbidding anyone from smoking in cars carrying young children. Courts are ordering smoke-free environments in custody and visitation disputes.

"We are very rapidly moving to protect children from secondhand smoke," says John Banzhaf, executive director of Action on Smoking and Health. "Even from their own parents and grandparents."

Former surgeon general Richard Carmona said in June that children exposed to secondhand smoke suffer an increased risk of respiratory ailments and sudden infant death syndrome.

Most smoking bans apply to workplaces and spots like bars and restaurants.

Smokers' rights groups liken banning smoking in private to the "Salem witch hunt," says Gary Nolan, spokesman for The Smoker's Club, Inc. He says secondhand smoke is not dangerous. "If we don't reverse this, they'll be telling us what we can eat and what we can feed our children," Nolan says.

Former smoker Bob Mathis, a Democratic state representative in Arkansas, sponsored a law that bars smoking in a car carrying a child young enough to require a car seat. It took effect in July. A violator can be fined $25 but can get out of it with proof of participation in a smoking-cessation program. A similar law took effect in Louisiana in August.

"We have laws on the books in every state of the union against child abuse," Mathis says. "This is a form of child abuse."

At least six states and some counties prohibit foster parents from smoking when foster children are present, says Kathleen Dachille, director of the Legal Resource Center for Tobacco Regulation, Litigation & Advocacy at the University of Maryland School of Law. "There are times when it's appropriate to regulate what people can do in their home," she says. "The state is responsible for that child."

Some courts are ordering parents in custody and visitation disputes not to smoke around their kids.

Initially, courts considered restrictions when children had ailments such as asthma that are exacerbated by smoke, says Linda Elrod, a law professor and editor of Family Law Quarterly. Now, they're more willing to restrict smoking even when there are no obvious health problems, she says. It generally comes up when one parent complains about the other's smoking.

Prosecution Finishes Argument In US Smuggling Deaths Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - HOUSTON-A prosecutor on Monday described the truck driver at the center of America's deadliest human smuggling attempt as a "vile and heartless person" who ignored the pleas of the illegal immigrants stuffed in his trailer as the temperature inside rose.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors in closing arguments that Tyrone Williams, a Jamaican citizen, was concerned only with getting paid, not the welfare of the illegal immigrants he was transporting during the failed 2003 smuggling attempt. Nineteen people died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

Williams' attorney, Craig Washington, acknowledged Williams is guilty of transporting illegal immigrants, but he insisted Williams never meant to hurt them.

Rodriguez said Williams failed to turn on his vehicle's air conditioning, which would have prevented the deaths. When Williams found out his passengers had punched holes through the trailer's back doors in an attempt to get fresh air and call for help, his only concern was getting more money to pay for the damage, Rodriguez said.

During his closing statements, Rodriguez showed the jury crime scene photos of the 19 victims.

"This government takes no pleasure in showing you these horrific photos," Rodriguez said. "These deceased individuals can only testify through these photos."

Williams is charged with 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting illegal immigrants. He faces a possible death sentence if convicted.

Authorities say Williams was part of a smuggling ring that tried to transport more than 70 illegal immigrants from Mexico, Central America and the Dominican Republic in his airtight tractor-trailer from South Texas to Houston in May 2003.

Washington blamed Abel Flores, a member of the smuggling ring, for overstuffing the trailer. Washington said Williams did not know the immigrants were dying until one spoke to him in English, long after the journey had begun.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston, after the immigrants succumbed to the deadly heat inside.

Prosecutors argued Williams ignored the immigrants' cries for help during the four-hour trip. The immigrants' body temperatures went from their normal 98.6 degrees Fahrenheit (37 Celsius) to as high as 113 degrees F (45 C).

Survivors testified they could not understand how Williams did not hear or feel as the immigrants desperately banged on the trailer's walls and shouted.

Fatima Holloway, a woman who rode in the cab with Williams, testified he did not respond to her pleas to free the immigrants.

Williams' defense attorney, Craig Washington, countered his client could not hear the immigrants' cries from the packed trailer until it was too late.

Washington also argued Williams did not know other smuggling ring members overfilled his stifling trailer.

Several survivors called by Williams' attorneys testified the air conditioning unit was turned on during the trip.

Washington tried to discredit Holloway's testimony by highlighting inconsistent statements she made to authorities about the smuggling attempt.

A jury convicted Williams last year on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on 20 other counts. However, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the decision, saying the verdict did not count because the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Williams, 35, who lived in Schenectady, New York, is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty.

So far, seven people have been sentenced to prison in the case. Sentencing for three others is pending. Charges against two were dismissed, and one man remains a fugitive.

Police Informant Denies Buying Drugs At Elderly Woman's Home (CNN)

CNN.com, November 28, 2006

ATLANTA, Georgia (CNN) -- An informant cited in a search warrant as having purchased narcotics at an elderly Atlanta woman's house denies buying drugs there, authorities say.

Undercover officers raiding the 88-year-old woman's house shot her to death last week after she fired on them while they broke down her door in a high-crime neighborhood.

Federal prosecutors will investigate the case, Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington announced Monday.

Pennington said the eight-member narcotics squad that took part in the raid has been placed on paid leave while investigators look into the informant's story and the circumstances surrounding the Nov. 21 death of Kathryn Johnston. The informant also told investigators from the Atlanta police internal affairs bureau that he was told to lie about the matter, the chief said.

"The FBI will investigate his statements, along with the police officers' statements as well," Pennington said.

Police said Johnston opened fire on police who tried to enter her home, prying off burglar bars and forcing open her door, during a "no-knock" drug raid last Tuesday. Officers returned fire, killing her.

Relatives put Johnston's age at 92, but Fulton County medical examiners said she was 88.

Neighbors and relatives said the raid had to have been a mistake. They said Johnston lived alone and was so afraid of crime in her neighborhood west of downtown Atlanta that she wouldn't let neighbors who delivered groceries for her come into her home.Reviewing 'no-knock' policy

In an affidavit used to obtain the search warrant, narcotics officers said an informant had purchased two bags of crack cocaine from a man identified only as "Sam" in the home earlier that day. Pennington said he called in federal prosecutors and the FBI after internal affairs investigators questioned the informant over the weekend.

"After we brought the informant in and interviewed that informant, he told us that he had no knowledge of going into that house to purchase drugs," he said. "That's what he told us. I don't know if he went in or not. We don't know if he's telling the truth."

Pennington said the man was being "put away in a secure place" until he could be questioned by the FBI. The chief also promised to make "every document, every witness and piece of evidence" available to investigators.

Meanwhile, the seven narcotics officers and a sergeant were put on administrative leave with pay, and the department is reviewing its use of "no-knock" raids after the shootout, he said. The warrants are common in narcotics cases when officers fear suspects may try to dispose of drugs or evidence in the time it takes authorities to gain access to the home.

In addition to the FBI and the Justice Department, the Fulton County district attorney's office and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation are taking part in the probe.

Pennington made his reputation cleaning up a breathtakingly corrupt New Orleans Police Department in the 1990s. He said the "intense speculation and suspicion" surrounding Johnston's death spurred him to call in outside agencies.

"There are many unanswered questions. I promise each and every citizen that the complete truth will be eventually known, whatever that might be," he said. "But we must all exercise patience while we examine and re-examine every single aspect of these tragic events."

A spokesman for Johnston's family, the Rev. Markel Hutchins, went to Washington to request a federal investigation Monday. Hutchins said he had received assurances that agents would conduct a "swift and thorough" investigation into the woman's death.

Hutchins said the three mid-level officials with whom he met also promised "all resources at our disposal" to help counter the fallout in the African-American community from the shooting. He said he urged the Justice Department officials to press for strong federal guidance to local police departments against the use of no-knock warrants.

McKinney: Study Police Shootings House Member Seeks Federal Investigation (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 28, 2006

U.S. Rep. Cynthia McKinney has added her voice to a growing chorus of prominent Americans concerned about a spate of high-profile police shootings, including one that killed a New York man the day of his wedding.

The congresswoman has asked the Justice Department to investigate police-involved shootings around the nation, including in her home district of DeKalb County, where police have fatally shot a dozen people this year.

"There is a belief by some citizens that the police-involved shootings are steeped in the intentional use of excessive force, even deadly force," McKinney said in a Nov. 25 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. "There definitely appears to be a developing national pattern of police misconduct and abuse resulting in an inordinately high number of serious injuries and deaths to the victims."

McKinney has also asked the House Judiciary Committee to conduct hearings on "the state of America's law enforcement agencies' use of force and deadly force and the impact on Americans on the basis of race and economic standing," her letter said.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said Monday that the shooting early Saturday of three unarmed men, in which 50 bullets were fired, was "unacceptable." Sean Bell, who died in the shooting, was to have been married later that day.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg convened an extraordinary meeting of black religious leaders and elected officials at City Hall yesterday to calm frayed tempers over the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man in Queens, calling the circumstances "inexplicable" and "unacceptable."

"It sounds to me like excessive force was used," the mayor said of the conduct of the officers, who fired 50 shots outside a Queens nightclub early Saturday, killing Sean Bell, 23, hours before he was to be wed, and injuring two others. "I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50-odd shots fired."

Mr. Bloomberg made the remarks after meeting with some of the city's most influential black politicians and community leaders, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, the Rev. Al Sharpton and dozens of others.

The mayor's decision to meet with Mr. Sharpton and other black leaders was a stark turnabout from the approach of Mr. Bloomberg's predecessor, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who did not reach out to black leaders in the immediate aftermath of the fatal 1999 shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant who died in a hail of 41 police bullets.

Mayor Bloomberg's blunt assessment of events still under investigation was striking, although he took pains to point out that the facts were not all in, saying several times that he did not yet know what happened in the shooting, but that he expected that a grand jury would be impaneled by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown.

In a move that suggests the officers feel their actions were justified, the lawyer representing the men said he had contacted Mr. Brown's office and offered to have the officers speak to prosecutors and appear before a grand jury voluntarily without immunity. The police have not released the officers' names, saying they are trying to protect them from retaliation or harassment.

Philip E. Karasyk, who is a lawyer for the Detectives' Endowment Association, said, "We feel confident that once all of the facts and circumstances of this tragic incident are known, then our detectives will be exonerated."

"This was a tragedy, but not a crime," he said.

Mr. Brown said in a statement that he intended to convene a grand jury to hear evidence in the case. While Mr. Karasyk has represented the four men who are detectives in the preliminary stages of the investigation, three of the four will get new lawyers, possibly as soon as tomorrow, because each must have his own and it remains unclear whether they will pursue the same strategy. The fifth man, an officer, has different representation.

Participants at the private meeting at City Hall, which included Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly and several high-ranking Bloomberg aides, described the discussions as frequently heated, with the mayor sitting next to leaders whom he counts as supporters. Those more critical of the administration's response to the shooting, including Mr. Sharpton and City Councilman Charles Barron of Brooklyn, sat on the opposite side of the table.

Mr. Bloomberg's approach of reaching out to community leaders has drawn praise, and he plans to go to southeast Queens today to meet with community leaders there. But his efforts have left some unconvinced that the underlying conflicts between the police and predominantly black communities are being addressed.

"We prefer talking than not talking, but the object is not a conversation, the object is fairness and justice," Mr. Sharpton said as he left City Hall. "Because we're not just interested in being treated politely, we're interested in being treated fairly and rightly. And that will happen when police are held as accountable as anyone else."

Mr. Bloomberg pledged to do just that, saying that the city would review its policies and training procedures to ensure fair treatment, but he added that he did not believe that the shooting was racially motivated. Of the officers who fired on Mr. Bell's car, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

"I do not at this point believe that there was anything racially motivated here, but we'll wait and see whatever the facts are," Mr. Bloomberg said. "A lot of people feel that this on top of other incidents that have happened in the past is a pattern that is unacceptable. I find that pattern unacceptable as well," Mr. Bloomberg continued, adding that he saw the shooting as an isolated case.

"There is no evidence that they were doing anything wrong," he said of the men who were shot, referring to the moments leading up to the confrontation with the police.

Some policies appear to have been violated in the shooting, which occurred when, according to the police, undercover officers fired 50 bullets at Mr. Bell's car after he drove into one of the officers and an unmarked police van.

Officers are trained to shoot no more than three bullets before pausing to reassess the situation, Mr. Kelly said in his most detailed assessment of the shooting yet. Department policy also largely prohibits officers from firing at vehicles, even when they are being used as weapons.

Although several of the leaders at City Hall expressed confidence in the mayor and the police commissioner, the emotional meeting, which began with outbursts of anger and ended calmly, laid bare some of the rifts among New York's black leaders themselves. Some expressed support for the mayor's handling of the case or refrained from criticizing him. Many, however, expressed concerns that the administration was failing to deal with what they described as continuing tensions between black residents and police officers even when the officers are not white.

"There were some heated exchanges," said the Rev. Herbert Daughtry, an influential Pentecostal minister in Brooklyn. "We all agree that there is a pattern of police abuse of power, and this abuse of power ranges from police killing to police brutal behavior to disrespect. We reiterated that over and over again."

Mr. Daughtry warned the mayor not to confuse patience with complacency. "There is a temperature in our communities that is rising, and the tension is intensifying," he said. "While we don't want to try to ignite anything, we'd be blind to overlook what's happening and not to sound the alarm."

But other leaders played down the anger in the room, saying that some participants seemed determined to bring up past history or to pursue agendas with little bearing on this specific case.

"There's always anger after incidents like this and there's always a lot of people that bring up other incidents," said City Councilman Leroy G. Comrie Jr. of Queens. "People confuse history, and specific people are concerned about their individual actions." He added: "You have different people that don't know each other, there's always room dynamics, you know, because people come in with different agendas or some people are off topic altogether."

The shooting happened as the police were undercover in the club, Club Kalua, to investigate reports of prostitution and drug dealing. There was a dispute outside between two groups of men, and one group of three or four left. One undercover officer followed them, believing they might have been going to get a gun before returning to the club. In the officers' version of events, the undercover officer confronted the men in Mr. Bell's silver Nissan Altima, and they tried to run him over, prompting the fusillade from him and his backups.

Some of the leaders expressed dismay over Mr. Kelly's revelation that one of the undercover officers had had two beers in the course of the operation inside the nightclub, but was not given a breath analyzer test. Mr. Kelly said that undercover officers are allowed the two drinks and are not normally tested for intoxication. He said they were deemed fit for duty by their superior.

While the office of Mr. Brown, the Queens district attorney, will oversee the criminal inquiry, the tactics employed by the detectives and their supervisor during the events leading up to the shooting and the shooting itself will also be reviewed by the Police Department. Several people who have been briefed on the detectives' version of events raised questions about their tactics.

For instance, they said that one undercover officer who had been inside the club without his weapon retrieved it from a police vehicle and then engaged the men in the Altima, even though that task should have been left to the backup team. Mr. Kelly said that sequence of events was unusual.

Saying there was a "grave crisis" of confidence in his southeast Queens community, Bishop Lester Williams, who was to have performed Mr. Bell's wedding, said there had been no improvement in police-community relations since the height of tensions under Mayor Giuliani.

"It's Little Iraq, I'm sorry, especially toward the blacks in the community," he said before attending the meeting. "We don't feel protected."

But others said that Mr. Bloomberg had made some progress simply by setting a new tone. "Just the simple fact of meeting, or discussion, or expressing concern and outrage on the part of this administration, was different," said Comptroller William C. Thompson Jr., the city's top black elected official.

Shortly after 5 p.m., many of the same black leaders who had attended the meeting with Mr. Bloomberg went to a briefing at the Queens County Courthouse with Mr. Brown.

Mr. Bell's fiancée, Nicole Paultre, 22, the mother of their two daughters, arrived with her father and Mr. Bell's mother, Valerie, and uncle.

Nearly two hours later, Mr. Sharpton and Mr. Bell's family left, pushing past reporters without saying anything. Several other civic leaders said the meeting had been emotionally difficult, with Ms. Paultre and Ms. Bell bursting into tears. The civic leaders declined to discuss the meeting's specifics, but said they were satisfied with what they had heard.

While officials met and discussed the case, Mr. Bell's father, William, 53, stood by his house on a quiet, suburban street near Cambria Heights and said that they were all missing the point.

“It’s more about politics than human life,” he said. Mr. Bloomberg has spoken with Sean Bell’s fiancée and said he plans to visit the family soon, but William Bell said none of the officials had reached out to him.

“At least they could say ‘I’m sorry,’ ” he said. “Say ‘I’m sorry, I’m going to find out what’s going on.’ ”

“He’s gone,” he said of his son. Then, patting over his chest, he added, “Not here in my heart he’s not gone, but he’s gone.”

N.Y. Mayor Calls Shooting 'Inexplicable' (WP)

By Michael Powell And Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 27 -- Once again a hail of police bullets has ended the life of an unarmed black New Yorker, and the city's mayor finds himself walking an uncertain line between reassuring black and Latino residents and defending his police force.

With a City Council member saying that black people are being "murdered" and some black clergy signaling their discontent with Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R), who is white, walked into a news conference Monday and spoke of his profound unease with the shooting by undercover police that claimed the life of a bridegroom on his wedding day.

"I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50 shots fired," Bloomberg said. "It sounds to me that excessive force was used, but that's up to the district attorney to find out."

In a visible symbol of Bloomberg's concern, he was accompanied by a number of prominent black pastors and politicians, including activist preacher Al Sharpton and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). The night before, Sharpton journeyed to the Community Church of Christ in the Jamaica neighborhood of Queens and vowed that he was going to "keep this in the street."

The shooting occurred early Sunday morning as an undercover officer trailed three men -- Sean Bell, 23, Joseph Guzman, 31, and Trent Benefield, 23 -- as they left a bachelor party at the Kalua Cabaret club in Jamaica. The trio had argued with two men inside the club and left, trying to avoid trouble, witnesses said.

The officer told the three men to stop, although witnesses differ about whether the officer identified himself and flashed his badge.

Bell and his friends, witnesses told the New York Daily News, feared that the undercover officer was a friend of those they had argued with and that he was carrying a gun. The men tried to pull away in their car, scraping the leg of an officer. An officer fired a shot, and four more officers pulled out their 9mm guns and began shooting.

Three bullets fatally struck Bell, a delivery man and father of two, who died just hours before his marriage ceremony was to take place.

Benefield and Guzman were injured; the latter had 11 bullet wounds. None of the three men carried a gun, and police manacled the two survivors as they lay bleeding, a fact that concerned civil libertarians.

"It's not as if people so seriously wounded were a flight risk," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "Yet they were treated as criminals for having gotten shot by the police."

Kelly offered a carefully calibrated defense, noting that the Hispanic officer who opened fire was a 12-year veteran and apparently thought the car was trying to hit him. Three of the five officers who fired shots were black or Latino.

Kelly's spokesmen released data showing that New York officers now fire 40 percent fewer shots per incident than in 1995. Police killed 30 people in 1996, compared with nine in 2005 and 10 so far this year.

Maki Haberfeld, a John Jay College of Criminal Justice professor and specialist in the use of deadly force, said she was not inclined to second-guess officers operating under stress at night. "There are distorted perceptions of time and motion, and fear and adrenaline, and it takes 20 seconds to fire 50 shots," she said. "I'm taken aback by how the mayor indicted these officers. How could he know?"

But such arguments and statistics soothed few nerves, particularly for those who live in neighborhoods with a history of frayed relations with the police. Sunday's shooting called to mind the fatal shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant, in 1999. Diallo, a peddler and student, was returning home when undercover police officers told him to stop. He panicked and officers fired 41 shots, 19 of them hitting Diallo. His death came to symbolize the unsightly underbelly of then-Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani's war on crime.

That history was very much alive in the minds of residents on the streets of Jamaica on Monday. Theirs is a prosperous lower-middle-class neighborhood with vibrant shops, the crack-fueled crime of 10 years ago a fading memory. Yet many said police officers still pat down young men for guns and stop cars with little reason.

"The demeanor when they talk to people -- they have a nasty attitude," said Wayne Johnson, 43, a car-service driver. "They'll come and see us talking on the corner and say: 'What you doing here?' They think everyone is a drug dealer."

Monique Holley, 23, attends the nearby Queensboro Community College and has passed her exam to become a police officer. Monday, she found herself struggling with second thoughts. "If I become a cop, how would people look at me? That's what I am debating today."

Bloomberg enjoys far better relations with the city's black leaders than Giuliani did. There was no more visible evidence of this Monday than the presence at the news conference of the rhetorically flammable Sharpton, who was persona non grata at City Hall throughout the Giuliani era.

African Americans, Sharpton said on a radio show after the news conference, appreciate that the city's crime drop means that their neighborhoods are safer and that many young men are alive who might otherwise have died in violent crime. But he said that peace carries an unacceptably high price tag.

"I told the mayor, 'Yes, we want crime down. Yes, crime is higher in many of our communities than elsewhere,' " Sharpton said. "But it's worse to have to live in these neighborhoods and be afraid of the cops and the robbers."

Calls For Justice At NYC Vigil For Groom (FINDLAW/AP)

By Deepti Hajela, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - NEW YORK-An angry crowd shouted "No justice, no peace!" Some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner. Many counted off to 50, the number of rounds that are estimated to have been fired by police at three unarmed men, killing one on his wedding day.

Several hundred people gathered Sunday for a vigil and rally to demand answers about why officers let fly a flurry of bullets at 23-year-old Sean Bell early Saturday, hours before he was supposed to marry the mother of his two young children.

The five officers were placed on paid administrative leave and stripped of their guns, said Paul Browne, chief spokesman for the NYPD. Police and prosecutors promised a full investigation.

But none of that stemmed the fury of a community outraged by the shootings.

"We cannot allow this to continue to happen," the Rev. Al Sharpton said at the gathering outside Mary Immaculate Hospital, where one of the two wounded men was in critical condition. "We've got to understand that all of us were in that car."

Relatives of the men, including Bell's fiancee, attended the vigil and rally but none spoke publicly.

Some in the crowd called for the removal of Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly, yelling "Kelly must go!"

Kelly has said that police shot at the car after it drove forward and struck an undercover officer and an unmarked police minivan. The information was based on interviews with witnesses and two officers who did not fire their weapons, he said.

But a witness account emerged Monday disputing that version of events.

Trini Wright, a dancer at the strip club where Bell's bachelor party was held, told the Daily News she was going to a diner with the men and was putting her makeup bag in the trunk of their car when the police minivan appeared.

"The minivan came around the corner and smashed into their car. And they (the police) jumped out shooting," Wright, 28, told the newspaper for Monday editions. "No 'stop.' No 'freeze.' No nothing."

Kelly had said Saturday the police department was still piecing together what happened and that it was too early to say whether the shooting was justified. He said it was unclear whether the officers, who were in plain clothes, identified themselves before firing.

On Sunday, Browne said, "We are continuing to look for additional witnesses to shed light on the incident and assisting the district attorney's office with its investigation."

Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Kelly planned to meet with community leaders at City Hall on Monday. Bloomberg and his aides were in contact with Bell's family and community leaders throughout the weekend.

The shootings occurred after 4 a.m. Saturday outside the Kalua Cabaret in Queens. Kelly said the incident stemmed from an undercover operation by seven officers investigating the club.

Bell was struck twice. The survivors were Joseph Guzman, 31, who was shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, who was hit three times. Guzman was in critical condition Sunday and Benefield was stable.

The officers' shots struck the men's car 21 times. They also hit nearby homes and shattered windows at a train station, though no residents were injured.

Police thought one of the men in the car might have had a gun, but investigators found no weapons. It was unclear what prompted police to open fire, Kelly said.

According to Kelly, the groom was involved in a verbal dispute outside the club, and one of his friends referred to a gun.

An undercover officer walked closely behind Bell and his friends as they headed for their car. As he walked toward the front of the vehicle, the car drove forward, striking the officer and minivan, Kelly said.

The officer was apparently the first to open fire, Kelly said. He had served on the force for five years. One 12-year veteran fired his weapon 31 times, emptying two full magazines, Kelly said.

In total, it is believed 50 bullets were fired, he said. It was the first time any of the officers, all of whom carried 9 mm handguns, had been involved in a shooting, he said.

At some point, Bell backed the car onto a sidewalk, hitting a building gate, police said. He then drove forward, striking the police vehicle a second time, Kelly said.

The police department's policy on shooting at moving vehicles states: "Police officers shall not discharge their firearms at or from a moving vehicle unless deadly force is being used against the police officers or another person present, by means other than a moving vehicle."

The police officers' group 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care said it was issuing a vote of no confidence in Kelly over the shooting.

Community leaders planned a rally Dec. 6 at police headquarters.

This isn't the first time the NYPD has come under scrutiny over officer-involved shootings.

In 1999, police killed Amadou Diallo, an unarmed immigrant from Guinea in western African who was shot 19 times. The four officers in that case were acquitted of criminal charges. And in 2003, Ousmane Zongo, a native of Burkina Faso in western African, was hit four times, twice in the back.

Associated Press writer Tom Hays contributed to this report.

50 Bullets And A Death In Queens (NYT)

Much has changed in New York since Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant, was killed in a hail of 41 bullets fired by city police officers in 1999. Mr. Diallo's death sent racial tensions in the city nearly to a boiling point — helped along by Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who regularly shunned meetings with black leaders and failed to treat the crisis with the urgency it required.

Now Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his police commissioner, Raymond Kelly, are dealing differently with their own Diallo-style disaster. Police officers firing 50 rounds early last Saturday killed Sean Bell, an unarmed man who was to have married his high school sweetheart later in the day. The mayor and the commissioner moved quickly to answer questions and to hear the concerns of the victim's family and the community. But their responsiveness will not bring back Sean Bell. The challenge here is far greater than good communications.

The officers who killed Mr. Bell were part of a sting operation at a Queens nightclub suspected of narcotics, prostitution and weapons violations. According to published reports, the officers have said that as Mr. Bell and his friends left the club and headed toward their car, an undercover detective heard one of them say he was going to get a gun. They also reportedly said that when the men entered the car, the detective pulled his gun and identified himself, but the car suddenly gunned forward, hit him in the shin and then struck an unmarked police minivan. The officers then opened fire.

The tragedy may simply involve two sets of very frightened men who reacted instinctively to what they thought was imminent danger. But only one of the sets was armed. There was no gun in the car, nor on the shooting victims, who sat helpless inside while five police officers began firing 50 rounds at them. One emptied his gun, a 9mm semiautomatic, reloaded and emptied it again, accounting for 31 rounds. The shooting appears to have been frantic, with bullets shattering windows as far away as the AirTrain station, hundreds of yards from the scene. Two of Mr. Bell's companions were injured; miraculously, there were no other casualties.

Unlike the Diallo tragedy, the officers involved in the Queens shooting were not all white. They were also not inexperienced. The first bullet came from an officer with five years on the job, and the detective who fired the 31 rounds had 12. But it is hard to explain their actions as anything but panic.

Police rules mandate that an officer pause after firing three rounds to assess the situation. If the shooters had followed procedures, they might have seen there was no threat before it was too late. Mayor Bloomberg has rightly called for a quick and impartial investigation. The officers must be held accountable for what has happened. But the Police Department must also confront the fact that a disaster that everyone swore to prevent seven years ago has repeated itself in Queens.

Which Officer Shot Girl Can't Be Known (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

Probe fails to find definitive evidence. The toddler was killed as her father held her in a gun battle with police.

So many bullets were discharged during a siege last year at a South Los Angeles auto shop that investigators cannot determine which LAPD officer fired the shot that killed 19-month-old Suzie Peña, Chief William J. Bratton said Monday.

The finding, which follows a 15-month investigation that used outside weapons experts, complicates the Police Commission's task today in deciding whether the officers should be disciplined.

Suzie Peña was shot twice as her father held her in front of him as he exchanged gunfire with Los Angeles police officers in July 2005. The fatal shot hit Suzie in the head but did not lodge there. Investigators could not determine which of the bullet fragments they found had hit her.

Her death set off a debate about Los Angeles Police Department tactics, prompting investigations by the FBI and the Los Angeles County district attorney's office and calls for better rules on how SWAT officers respond to hostage standoffs.

Bratton described the investigation as one of the most complex in the department's history. It involved microscopic analysis of about 130 bullets and more than 100 casings involving 13 firearms, and more than 80 interviews of witnesses and 36 DNA tests.

"The issue is, can we with any definitiveness determine who fired the fatal shot," Bratton told The Times. "The subsequent investigation has not been able to make a more definitive determination. That's unfortunate, but that's pretty much where we are with it."

Figuring out which of 13 officers who fired shots actually killed Suzie is a key question both for the LAPD and the family's attorneys, who are suing the department. By identifying the officer, they could determine where he or she was standing, figure out his or her vantage point, and assess whether proper tactics were used.

The Police Commission will decide today whether any of the officers involved in the standoff violated department policies. Without being able to link Suzie's death to a specific officer, however, officials said, it would be difficult to build a case against any individual.

LAPD sources who are familiar with the investigation said the detectives who examined the incident broke it down into three distinct stages that the commission will examine.

It began when Jose Raul Peña's 16-year-old stepdaughter called police to say that her father had a gun and was threatening to kill her. Officers responded, and during a brief gun battle with Peña were able to rescue the stepdaughter from the auto shop. The sources said investigators examined whether any officer failed to follow policy by initiating a crossfire in the direction of other officers.

The second segment occurred more than two hours into the standoff when an officer on top of an LAPD armored vehicle shot at Peña as the gun-wielding man held Suzie. Commissioners are expected to examine who gave the authority to fire, the sources said.

The final segment occurred when officers decided to storm the auto store. The officers found themselves in a small interior office of the shop, firing at Peña as he shot at them, Suzie still in his arms. One SWAT officer, Daniel Sanchez, was wounded; Suzie and her father were killed.

Sources said investigators were looking at why police decided to enter the building. In the days after the shooting, LAPD officials said they moved in because they thought that Peña was perhaps incapacitated.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the probe publicly, said it was possible that the commission could find some of the tactics used by the officers violated policy while upholding their actions in Suzie's death.

In an interview Monday, Bratton declined to reveal his recommendation to the commission.

He said it may be hard for some to understand how the investigation was unable to identify Suzie's shooter.

"Everybody likes closure, likes completion. Sometimes you are not able to get there," Bratton said. "We will not be able to make that determination. We have no ability to make a determination as to who fired that [fatal shot]."

The Police Commission is one of several panels and agencies looking into the Peña case. The district attorney's office plans to announce today whether it will file criminal charges related to the girl's death. The FBI and an LAPD board of inquiry also are reviewing the standoff.

At least four officers were carrying rifles. All of the rifle bullets were fired close to Peña and his daughter.

The complexity of the case "had to do with the sheer size of the incident, the number of officers, the number of shooting officers, the number of rounds fired, the circumstance," Bratton said.

Whatever the outcome of the commission meeting, Bratton said, Suzie's father was solely responsible for her death as authorities have said that Peña used his daughter as a "human shield" against officers.

"He's the one who set that whole chain of events in motion," Bratton said. "All the actions that day were precipitated by Mr. Peña's actions. The death of that young child is totally in his hands."

Bratton also defended his department's investigation. "I'm very comfortable, based on my review, that they did an outstanding job on the investigative portion of it and the Police Commission will have a lot of information to work with in terms of making their final recommendations," he said.

Luis Carrillo, an attorney for the child's mother, said he was suspicious about the LAPD's inability to identify where the shot that killed the toddler came from. He alleged that officers moved the child's body, interfering with efforts to trace the trajectories of bullets.

Carrillo has filed a lawsuit — seeking damages and a change in LAPD policies — against the city.

"It is important to know who fired that bullet," he said.

Supreme Court Debates Deadline For Pay-discrimination Claims (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, November 28, 2006

Employees must complain about pay discrimination within six months or forfeit their claim, the Supreme Court was told Monday in a case closely watched by companies and civil rights groups.

Justices engaged in a lively but inconclusive debate about how to apply a 180-day deadline for complaining about discriminatory pay decisions under Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Lilly Ledbetter sued Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., claiming that after 19 years at the company's Gadsden, Ala., plant, she was making $6,000 a year less than the lowest-paid man in the same job.

Ledbetter claimed the disparity existed for years and was primarily a result of her gender. A jury agreed, but an appeals court overturned the verdict.

Lawyers for Goodyear and the Bush administration argued against her claim.

Glen Nager, Goodyear's attorney, said the appeals court was correct.

"Bring that claim or lose it," he said.

Justice Department lawyer Irving Gorenstein said if the court were to side with Ledbetter, "it would undo the statute of limitations in pay cases."

But Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin Russell, told the justices that each smaller paycheck should be treated as a new act of discrimination.

Eight justices joined in the questioning. Justice Clarence Thomas was, customary for him, silent, but he could play a pivotal role in deciding the case.

Thomas once was chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is responsible for investigating workplace discrimination claims.

Applying the 180-day deadline to decisions made years ago makes no sense in a situation in which the disparity grew over time, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

Early on, "there is no reason to think there is going to be this inequality," she argued.

But Chief Justice John Roberts was skeptical that employees could "challenge the discrimination 15 years later."

Ledbetter was initially awarded more than $3.8 million. A judge reduced the award to $360,000.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict. The appeals court said Ledbetter mainly was complaining about decisions made by her supervisors long ago, well after the deadline for raising allegations of discrimination.

In Ledbetter's appeal to the Supreme Court, her lawyers said each paycheck represented a violation of civil rights law by Goodyear, even if the lower pay resulted from discriminatory decisions made years earlier.

"Under the court of appeals' rule, an employee is condemned to perpetually unequal pay for equal work unless she recognizes and complains about the discrimination within a few short months after it first begins," Ledbetter's lawyers said in a court filing.

Supporting Ledbetter, the NAACP, AARP and other rights groups said employers would not suffer any consequences for recurring discrimination if they could rebuff allegations merely by arguing the deadline for complaining about the first episode passed.

Goodyear denied discriminating against Ledbetter. She received periodic raises despite being ranked near the bottom of her group of workers, the company said.

"Title VII requires allegedly aggrieved employees like Ledbetter to assert their intentional discrimination claims within the 180-day charge-filing period or lose them," the company told the court.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business said if the court rules for the worker in this case, employers would be subject to damages for innocent decisions made years ago that would be difficult to defend because of the passage of time.

Court Explores Complexities In Job Discrimination Case (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — Federal law prohibits discrimination on the job, requiring employers to pay their employees without regard to race, sex, religion or national origin. Many complexities lie behind that simple statement, as a Supreme Court argument on Monday made abundantly clear.

The question for the court was how to treat a discriminatory action that happened long ago, beyond the statute of limitations for the federal Civil Rights Act, but that has effects that continue to the present day. Is each new paycheck, reflecting a salary lower than it would have been without the initial discrimination, a recurring violation that sets the clock running again? Or does the passage of time, without fresh acts of intentional discrimination, render the initial injury a nonevent in the eyes of the law?

The case was brought to the court by a woman, Lilly M. Ledbetter, who worked for 19 years as a manager at a Goodyear Tire and Rubber plant in Gadsden, Ala. For years, Ms. Ledbetter was paid less than men at the same level, and by 1997, as the only female manager, she was earning less than the lowest-paid man in the department. In 1998, after an undesired transfer, she retired and filed a discrimination charge against the company with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

She took her case to federal court and won a jury award of more than $3 million in back pay and compensatory and punitive damages. Because of caps imposed by the law, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the judge reduced the award, to $360,000. But the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, in Atlanta, overturned the verdict entirely. It ruled that Ms. Ledbetter had no case because she could not show any intentional discrimination in the 180 days before she complained to the employment commission.

Other federal appeals courts, including those here and in New York, disagree with that analysis, as does the E.E.O.C. The agency has long applied what is known as the "paycheck accrual rule," under which each pay period of uncorrected discrimination is seen as a fresh incident of discrimination. So although the 180-day limit applies to discrete actions like a discriminatory refusal to hire or failure to promote, it does not, in the view of the federal agency charged with administering the statute, prevent lawsuits for the continuing effects of past discrimination in pay.

But the Bush administration has disavowed the commission's position. After the court agreed in June to hear Ms. Ledbetter's appeal, Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company Inc., No. 05-1074, the administration entered the case on the company's behalf.

Irving L. Gornstein, an assistant to the solicitor general, argued that "employees who allow the 180-day period to pass may not years later, and even at the end of their careers, challenge their current paychecks on the grounds that they are the result of a number of discrete, individually discriminatory pay decisions that occurred long ago."

When Justice Antonin Scalia asked, "Why should we listen to the solicitor general rather than the E.E.O.C.?" Mr. Gornstein acknowledged that the commission "has taken a different position," one that he said was based on a misunderstanding of a Supreme Court precedent.

Ms. Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin K. Russell, said it was often difficult for employees to learn that their pay was discriminatory. Employees who receive regular raises, Mr. Russell said, may well not realize that the raises were smaller than they should have been.

"It's only when the disparity persists," he said, "when the different treatment accrues again and again and the overall disparity in the wages increases, that the employee has some reasonable basis to think that it's not natural variation in the pay decisions but actually intentional discrimination."

Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer appeared most sympathetic to Mr. Russell's argument. Justice Breyer commented at one point that "there will be probably a significant number of circumstances where a woman is being paid less, and all she does is for the last six months get her paychecks and she doesn't really know it because pay is a complicated thing." It could take "even a year for her to find out," he said.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. appeared the most skeptical, several times raising the question of how employers could shoulder the burden of defending long-ago pay decisions.

"It could be 40 years, right?" Chief Justice Roberts asked Mr. Russell, adding, "I mean, if it happened once 20 years ago, you have a case that you can bring" under the plaintiff's analysis.

The Goodyear lawyer, Glen D. Nager, noting that the statute required proof of intentional discrimination, said the basic point was that “no one at Goodyear took Miss Ledbetter’s sex into account” in the salary she was paid in the 180 days before she filed her complaint.

The law does not permit the accusation “that there is discrimination today merely because there was discrimination yesterday,” Mr. Nager said, adding that when the “filing period passes and no charge is brought, the employer is entitled to treat that past act as if it was a lawful act.”

Justice David H. Souter asked, “Is that so even if they know it was in fact originally an unlawful act?”

“Yes,” Mr. Nager replied.

EEOC Seeks To Block Sidley Discovery Bid In Former Partners' Age Discrimination Case (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 28, 2006

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is suing law firm Sidley Austin for allegedly demoting around 30 partners on the basis of age, is seeking to block discovery concerning the subsequent job performance of several of the former partners, as well as the mental health of one.

Chicago-based Sidley has denied having a mandatory retirement policy and claims that the partners at issue were demoted in 1999 due to performance factors, including low billable hours and poor business development skills. The firm is hoping to show that new employers encountered similar performance from demoted partners who left Sidley.

But in a motion for a protective order filed Nov. 17 in Chicago federal court, the EEOC asked that Sidley be denied discovery relating to the billable hours, equity status and business development efforts of six former partners now working at other firms. The agency, which is arguing that performance reasons for the demotions were pretextual, called the information sought by Sidley "not relevant to any disputed fact" in the case.

"Evidence concerning the Former Partners' hours, billings, business development and time devoted to specific clients at the Subsequent Firms would not have any tendency to prove or disprove whether such factors actually motivated Sidley's decision to change Former Partners' status in 1999," the EEOC said in its motion before Judge James Zagel of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

The agency, which has agreed to stipulate that Sidley's records concerning billable hours and other performance metrics are accurate, also highlighted a potential hazard to former partners of permitting the firm to seek such records from those partners' current firms.

"The Subsequent Firms of several of the Former Partners are not aware of the circumstances under which these Former Partners' employment at Sidley ended," the EEOC said in its motion. "Disclosure of those circumstances would cause great embarrassment to these Former Partners and would likely cause substantial damage to these Former Partners' careers and professional reputations."

The agency also asked the judge to block Sidley from deposing "Partner A" about his mental health and history of mental health treatment. The EEOC said Sidley had previously said mental health problems Partner A experienced in 1993 had nothing to do with his demotion six years later and should not now be able to assert otherwise.

"Other than simple harassment, no purpose would be served by an inquiry into Former Partner A's present or former state of mental health or treatment history," the agency argued.

In its opposition to the EEOC's motion, Sidley, represented by Chicago's Grippo & Elden, argued that the information about the partners' subsequent performance was highly relevant to countering the EEOC's claim that performance issues were a mere pretext for age-based discrimination.

"Many of the putative claimants clearly and undeniably had below-average hours and billings for partners with their experience," the firm said in its opposition. "Sidley has identified those below-average hours and billings as contributing to Sidley's decision to change the putative claimants' status.

"The EEOC and the putative claimants may attempt to attribute those below-average hours and billings to something other than lack of effort or talent, but a similar experience at the putative claimants' subsequent law firm will belie such an argument," Sidley continued.

Most of Sidley's argument concerning its questioning of Partner A was redacted from public documents, but the firm did say in its opposition to the EEOC's motion that the discovery it was seeking was "obviously relevant."

HIGH-PROFILE LAWSUIT

The EEOC's suit against Sidley, filed in January 2005 after a five-year investigation, has received widespread attention in the legal profession because law firm partners have traditionally been considered employers exempt from anti-discrimination laws. The agency is taking the novel position that Sidley's highly centralized management structure, in which an unelected executive committee made almost all major decisions, rendered most partners at the firm employees.

But the suit's high profile has also raised fears that embarrassing information about the partners at issue may come to light, despite the issuance of a number of protective orders. Several of the demoted partners have asked the EEOC to sever them from the case out of concern that such information will be publicly disclosed. The EEOC, which is seeking millions of dollars in back pay for the former partners, has refused such requests on the grounds that only the agency itself and none of the demoted partners is an actual party to the case.

According to a partial transcript of a hearing held Oct. 6, Zagel noted the unwilling participation in the matter of several of the former partners, saying that "perhaps no single individual whose case is being pled by the EEOC has the slightest interest in having a case pursued for professional reasons and maybe personal ones as well."

At the same hearing, Zagel suggested he understood Sidley's need for at least some discovery concerning the partners' subsequent performance. He recalled an earlier case of his in which an employment discrimination plaintiff was allegedly fired for persistently violating minor firm procedures and earning a reputation as someone who "just doesn't follow the rules."

"Investigation of his subsequent employer established that at the subsequent employer he did the same thing, and at the employer after that he did the same thing," Zagel said at the hearing. "And I thought it did a pretty good job of destroying the pretext argument that was offered by the plaintiff, so good a job that the case settled for what was essentially a nominal amount."

But the judge also used another example to illustrate a danger for Sidley. He said: "[O]ne of the things that makes life very difficult for employers who want to raise this defense is, they may very well fire somebody because they're habitually late to work ... and then you look at all the future employees and it's a disaster for the defendant because they're never late now."

ERA Proponents Roused By A Big Change In Congress (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

The Democratic takeover of Congress should revive interest in an issue many Americans think is settled -- adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment -- as new bipartisan groups pursue the Republican-leaning states needed for its ratification.

"I think a great way to commemorate the elevation of the first woman speaker would be to elevate all women in the Constitution," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews, New Jersey Democrat and one of nearly 200 ERA proponents in the House.

Supporters say that despite advancements for women's rights since the ERA's official death in 1982 -- primarily prohibitions against sex discrimination -- the constitutional amendment is needed because women lag in career advancement and pay equity.

In 1972, for instance, the ratio of female-to-male earnings for full-time, year-round work was 58 cents on the dollar. Last year, it was 77 cents on the dollar, according to Census Bureau data.

"The equal treatment of women should be made a pillar of our society," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat. "Unlike under the previous majority, I think we will at least have a discussion of rights that should exist and that most people in fact believe are already in the Constitution."

The one-sentence ERA -- "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex" -- has been promoted since the 1920s to ensure that women are treated on an equal basis with men, especially in the workplace.

The ERA was passed by Congress in 1972 but declared dead on June 30, 1982, when only 35 of the 38 necessary states ratified it.

Now activists are working to get three more state legislatures to ratify the ERA, and they expect a Democrat-led Congress and historical precedent to ensure its enactment.

"Once the American public really wants it, it will be had," said Jennifer Macleod, national coordinator of the ERA Campaign Network.

The rationale behind this "three-state strategy" is that Congress accepted the 27th "Madison" Amendment, which concerns congressional pay increases, after a 203-year ratification period and can therefore accept more ERA ratifications even after the deadline.

To which legendary ERA opponent Phyllis Schlafly said: "I think they are dreaming. I think they're beating a dead horse."

Opponents, led by Mrs. Schlafly, founder of Eagle Forum, helped sink the ERA with warnings about a military draft for women, unisex toilets, same-sex "marriage," and loss of family and workplace protections for wives, mothers and widows.

The ERA has its veteran supporters, such as the National Council of Women's Organizations. But in recent years, at least two new groups have emerged with the mission of getting three more state ratifications.

The two new groups are purposefully bipartisan, recognizing that Republican ERA support is a necessity: Of the 15 unratified states, Illinois is the lone "blue" state; the other 14 are "red" states that sweep from the Carolinas through the South, and into the West, with Arizona and Utah. The most vigorous ERA campaigns are in Florida, Missouri and Illinois.

"It's a myth" that Republicans don't support the ERA, said Idella Moore, who founded www.4ERA.org in Atlanta in early 2003.

Republicans have a long history of "doing the right thing" -- they're the party of the Emancipation Proclamation and a Republican cast the deciding vote for women's right to vote, said Lynn Fountain, a Georgia research scientist, Republican voter and board member of www.4ERA.org.

The Nov. 7 midterm elections showed that Republicans "don't have a very good image" with women right now, she said. "Wouldn't you like to fix that?"

Ms. Macleod of the 6-year-old ERA Campaign Network in New Jersey said her group is strongly bipartisan, but she agreed that a new Congress led by California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the first female speaker of the House, offered fresh opportunities. Under Republican-led committees, pro-ERA bills were "locked up for years," she said. New leadership "will surely make it more likely, more possible to move it ahead."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, is a leading ERA proponent, as are both Mr. Andrews and Mrs. Maloney, who also support a second strategy that calls for restarting the process completely.

Many Americans will be puzzled to hear about a new ERA battle, partly because they think the issue is over and partly because many of them think the ERA is already part of the Constitution.

For example, at least 22 states have either adopted ERAs or constitutional prohibitions against sex discrimination, according to a 2005 a Rutgers Law Journal article.

The death of the ERA was celebrated in June 1982 -- it's "dead for now and forever in this century," Mrs. Schlafly told supporters, according to a 1982 Time magazine article -- and implied by the U.S. Supreme Court in October 1982, when it declined to take up an ERA-related lawsuit because the issue was "moot."

However, Ms. Moore and Ms. Macleod say if three more states ratified the ERA, Congress could certify it by a simple majority vote.

Mr. Andrews' bill addresses this point: "If three states ratified [the ERA], the courts would sooner or later get the question of whether the prior ratifications were valid. And I want the House to go on record and say, 'Yes, they are,' " Mr. Andrews said last week.

ANTITRUST:

Supreme Court Case On Baby Bells May Affect Antitrust Enforcement (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a case with implications for antitrust enforcement, the Supreme Court heard arguments on how specific a plaintiff's allegations must be to claim anticompetitive behavior.

The case springs from the decades-old legal saga that ended the Bell system telephone-service monopoly and created today's marketplace.

The 1996 Telecommunications Act gave the Bell system's regional successors, the Baby Bells, the right to sell long-distance service in return for opening their local networks to competitors. Despite Congress's expectation the law would create a competitive market, the Baby Bells have remained dominant in their respective regions.

The plaintiffs, a group of individuals who bought local telephone and Internet service since the law was enacted and represented by the class-action firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, filed suit in 2003, alleging the Baby Bells conspired to restrict entry into their territories of competitors in local telephone and Internet service. They claimed the Baby Bells, which after several mergers and name changes now include AT&T Inc., BellSouth Corp., Qwest Communications International Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc., violated the Sherman Antitrust Act, which prohibits "every contract, combination...or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce."

The plaintiffs had no direct evidence of such a conspiracy, however, and instead based their claim on circumstantial indicators of anticompetitive behavior, such as the parallel conduct of the Baby Bells in declining to compete in each other's territory and allegedly impeding other carriers from connecting to their networks. The Baby Bells argued that without more -- such as an allegation of a specific meeting in which a deal was made to restrain trade -- the case should be dismissed without allowing the plaintiffs discovery of internal documents.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure impose minimal requirements to file a lawsuit, specifying little more than that plaintiffs file "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that [they are] entitled to relief." Court rulings have interpreted the rule to require that the claim provide defendants "fair notice" of the accusation so they can respond and prepare for trial.

A federal judge in New York dismissed the suit, ruling the plaintiffs' allegations fell short of this standard. The Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, also in New York, reinstated the lawsuit, saying the evidentiary test applied by the trial court was better suited at a later stage of proceedings -- summary judgment, which a party can seek after discovery and presentation of evidence -- on the grounds no reasonable jury could agree with its opponent.

The appeals court acknowledged that the ease of filing lawsuits imposed on defendants the "sometimes colossal expense of undergoing discovery" and could thereby encourage unjustified settlements to avoid trial. But the Second Circuit said "if that balance is to be recalibrated...it is Congress or the Supreme Court that must do so."

Yesterday, a lawyer for the Baby Bells, Michael Kellogg, told the Supreme Court that no recalibration was needed because existing law already required dismissal of the suit.

Several justices, however, seemed unpersuaded. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg suggested the Baby Bells were trying to rewrite a 68-year-old rule by adding evidentiary requirements to the initial claim, and Justice John Paul Stevens said "dozens" of antitrust claims were no more specific than that alleged in the Baby Bells case.

The Bush administration, siding with the Baby Bells, argued that parallel conduct was common in the U.S. economy, and that allowing antitrust suits based only on it would be too burdensome for business. Pressed by Justice Antonin Scalia, however, Assistant Attorney General Thomas Barnett agreed that some parallel conduct could be so suspicious as to be sufficient to support a claim.

But the plaintiffs' attorney, J. Douglas Richards, fared no better. Under the standard the plaintiffs favored, Justice Stephen Breyer said, half the companies in the U.S. could be sued. Adopting that position would have the Supreme Court "restructuring the economy," he said.

A decision is expected by the end of the court's term, in June.

(Bell Atlantic Co. v. Twombly)

Separately, the court refused to consider reinstating a $10.1 billion tobacco judgment against Philip Morris Inc., a unit of Altria Group Inc.

The Illinois Supreme Court last year threw out the judgment, issued by a state trial court in 2003, in a class-action lawsuit over light and low-tar cigarettes. The Illinois high court ruled 4-2 that the state-level class action wasn't allowed because Federal Trade Commission consent orders -- settlements between the federal government and tobacco companies -- have allowed tobacco companies to advertise light and low-tar cigarette products.

Yesterday's action paves the way for Altria to seek the return of a $6 billion note that secured the judgment pending appeal.

Supreme Court Presses For Answers In Baby Bell Case (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday pressed both sides in its search for how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust conspiracy lawsuit against several Baby Bell companies.

Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ), BellSouth Corp. (BLS), AT&T Inc.'s (T) SBC Communications Inc. unit, and Qwest Communications International Inc. (Q) have all been trying to block a class-action lawsuit alleging they engaged in an anticompetitive conspiracy to restrict competition in the local telephone and broadband Internet markets.

The lawsuit is still in its early stages. The companies and the U.S. Justice Department, at oral arguments on the appeal, urged the Supreme Court to set private antitrust lawsuit standards that ends the case before expensive legal discovery takes place.

"The private plaintiffs do not have the authority to pursue purely investigative complaints," said Michael Kellogg, a Washington-based attorney who represented the companies.

The justices are considering whether the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York was right to overturn a federal trial court ruling that threw the case out. The high court will specifically decide whether the plaintiffs in the case - a proposed class-action for customers since 1996 federal telecommunications law changes - must allege specific anticompetitive acts that are suspicious enough to warrant consideration for a trial.

The justices probed for how to draw a legal line between allowing a lawsuit against illegal conduct and barring one for corporate activity that simply reflects prudent business decisions not to compete in some geographic areas or with some product offerings.

Thomas Barnett, the Justice Department's antitrust chief, told the justices that plaintiffs "should not be able to survive a motion to dismiss unless it challenges a set of facts."

Barnett faced tough questioning from several justices who wanted him to justify the government's position based on antitrust rulings that have taken place since a 1986 Supreme Court ruling made it easier to stop private lawsuits before trial.

But the court was equally hard on J. Douglas Richards, the New York attorney who represented the plaintiffs. Richards told the court that the lawsuit could proceed to legal discovery without proving the allegations.

"You don't have to prove your case in the complaint," Richards said. Instead, he said the Second Circuit was correct when it ruled more court proceedings are required before the telecommunications companies can win a dismissal.

Justice Stephen Breyer and others appeared concerned about making it too easy to bring private antitrust litigation under the Sherman Act, telling Richards at one point that upholding his position would result in the court "engaging in a major restructuring of the economy."

Prior to the Second Circuit decision, a U.S. District Court judge dismissed the case, ruling the plaintiffs hadn't shown the companies might have violated federal antitrust laws. A ruling overruling the Second Circuit and backing the trial court would likely make it harder for consumers to challenge anticompetitive activity in telecommunications and other industries. If the court upholds the appeals court ruling, companies facing similar lawsuits would likely face higher litigation costs as they fight in court to get class-action conspiracy suits thrown out.

Supreme Court Hears Telecom Antitrust Case (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, November 28, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer on Monday didn't seem too impressed with the notion that competitors taking similar actions is enough to file a lawsuit charging antitrust violations.

"If you're right," Breyer told J. Douglas Richards, attorney for respondent William Twombly, who filed a class action against Bell Atlantic Corp. and the rest of the telecommunications companies, "I guess we can engage in a major restructuring of our economy."

Twombly charged the phone companies had violated the Sherman Act -- which prohibits conspiracies -- by agreeing not to compete outside the regions in which each was essentially the dominant phone provider. The proof that there was an actual agreement was a statement in the initial brief that said that the same decision by all the companies was contrary to the interest of the firms, Richards told the court.

"Conduct against self interest is a way [for the court] to infer a violation" of the Sherman Act, Richards said.

But he was having a hard time arguing with eight justices who appeared incredulous and at times jockeyed for a chance to ask more questions, with only Justice Clarence Thomas remaining apart from his querulous brethren.

"You have a suspicion and you want to use the discovery process to see if that is true, isn't that the case?" Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg asked Richards.

The high cost of discovery, which would trigger class actions that businesses would have to settle rather than litigate, is the big fear of the various companies and individuals filing friend of the court briefs in this matter, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, The Commonwealth of Virginia and 15 other states, a group of economists, and MasterCard International Inc.

Without a clear statement of the actual illegal acts in the pleading, the courts would be clogged with antitrust lawsuits, according to several parties who filed friends of the court briefs in the matter, including the government. And antitrust cases, unlike any other type of law, permit courts to triple the damages.

Breyer, a former antitrust professor, pressed each of the lawyers before him to clarify how an antitrust complaint could be written, while still consistent with the standards of federal "notice pleading," which simply requires enough information to make it clear why the defendant is being sued, and state a claim.

Michael Kellogg, who represented the phone companies, told the court the pleadings couldn't be vague, and Assistant Attorney General Thomas Barnett went farther, arguing the pleadings needed to specify a place and time for any illegal agreement.

"Parallel activity is ubiquitous in our society," Barnett said as he argued the case for the government. He explained that "the facts need to demonstrate some unlawful action."

Scalia seemed to agree, and said this process of making decisions about competition affects "every business, every day."

Barnett seemed to get nods from justices, while heads were shaking as Richards suggested that economists should be allowed to prove the correct decisions corporate executives should make about competition.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts leaned forward in his chair to say, "companies get proposals all the time. They don't have to do everything that is in their economic self interest, do they?"

"Life is short," Roberts said, and so some companies would limit investments or growth opportunities, because you can't do everything. In that case, how do the companies prove they just made decisions on their own without entering into an agreement?

"They have to document all of that," Richards said, as his time expired.

Supreme Court Considers Whether Local Telephone Antitrust Case Should Proceed (AP)

Associated Press

AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court pressed both sides Monday in the opening arguments of a case that businesses of all stripes care deeply about: how hard should it be to get evidence that a company might be violating antitrust laws?

The case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, with some experts citing it as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years.

The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, including airlines, credit card issuers and trade associations representing the wireless communications and pharmaceutical industries, all of whom have submitted or signed onto friend-of-the-court briefs.

The plaintiff in this case is represented by Milberg Weiss, known for its class-action lawsuits alleging securities fraud against major corporations. The firm filed a lawsuit in 2003 on behalf of William Twombly and all individuals in the continental United States who bought local telephone and Internet service between February 1996 and the present.

The suit alleged that the incumbent local telephone companies, or "Baby Bells," illegally conspired to prevent competition by excluding new local phone companies from their territories and agreeing not to compete against each other in each other's markets.

As part of the original court-ordered breakup of AT&T in 1982, seven regional telephone companies were created to provide local service. The 1996 Telecommunications Act allowed those "Baby Bells" to offer long-distance calling, in addition to local service, in exchange for allowing competitors access to their networks.

The original seven incumbent local phone companies have been reduced to four through mergers and acquisitions: Verizon Communications Inc., which was formed by the merger of Bell Atlantic and GTE in 2000; BellSouth Corp.; Qwest Communications International Inc., which bought Pacific Bell; and AT&T, which was bought by local phone provider SBC Communications.

A federal district court dismissed Twombly's case, finding that Twombly did not allege sufficient facts to indicate that a conspiracy would likely be proven during a trial. But Twombly argued that a conspiracy could be inferred from the so-called "parallel conduct" or behavior of the defendants.

The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court, however, finding in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a "short and plain statement of the claim" and not a detailed set of facts in order to survive a motion to dismiss.

The Baby Bells appealed to the Supreme Court. A low standard, corporations say, would enable "meritless" and "abusive" cases to go forward, forcing many businesses to settle those cases rather than endure the expense of litigation, including the discovery process in which defendants must produce documentation of certain facts for the plaintiff.

Under the standard upheld by the appeals court, "you can go sue half the firms in the economy," Justice Stephen Breyer said Monday.

A higher standard, however, could make it too difficult for individuals to bring valid antitrust cases, Twombly argued, because the only way a plaintiff can get evidence of an agreement among companies to restrict competition is through the discovery process.

If antitrust cases are dismissed too quickly, evidence of such agreements will rarely end up in the hands of plaintiffs, Twombly argued.

Twombly's attorney also said that the telephone companies' refusal to compete against each in each other's territories went against their economic self-interest, which could imply a conspiracy.

Justice John Paul Stevens pressed Michael Kellogg, the attorney arguing the case for the phone companies, on why such allegations were not sufficient for the case to continue.

"How you can say this is not a statement of fact I find mind-boggling," Stevens said.

Shares of the telecommunications companies were mixed in afternoon trading. Verizon Communications dropped 51 cents, or 1.47 percent, to close at $34.24 on the New York Stock Exchange and Qwest fell 19 cents to finish at $7.56 on the NYSE. Meanwhile, AT&T rose a penny to end at $32.68 on the New York Stock Exchange on the NYSE while BellSouth closed down 19 cents at $42.50 on the NYSE.

The case is Bell Atlantic Corporation v. Twombly (05-1126).

Business Set For Antitrust Legal Victory (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098853

Big business appears likely to score a significant legal victory in the US Supreme Court, after a majority of the justices yesterday seemed unwilling to tip the balance of power toward plaintiffs' lawyers in antitrust lawsuits.

The court yesterday heard oral arguments in a case where US consumers are trying to force greater competition in local telephone markets. The plaintiffs in the case, Bell Atlantic v Twombly, have brought a lawsuit alleging that some of America's biggest telephone companies conspired to prevent competition in local telephone services, but they provided almost no detailed evidence of a conspiracy.

Yesterday a majority of the justices appeared unwilling to let the case proceed. Some said it would make it too easy for plaintiffs to allege conspiracy in antitrust cases.

The case could be the most important antitrust case before the court in 20 years, legal sources say. Big business has won all 11 of the court's recent decisions in antitrust cases. A decision in yesterday's case is expected by June.

The case turns on the question: how high a hurdle must private plaintiffs clear to force big companies to reveal private documents that might prove they conspired with others to commit an antitrust violation?

Ruling in the case, a federal appeals court set a fairly low hurdle, arguing that federal law makes no attempt to discourage such lawsuits. But the telephone companies who are the defendants in the suit argued that such a low standard would give plaintiffs' lawyers a powerful new weapon to force big companies to settle even frivolous lawsuits, since the high cost of "discovery" - the production of documents - makes it very costly to fight such suits.

A group of eminent economists urged the justices to reject a low standard for alleging conspiracy in such cases, saying that would impose a litigation "tax" on the US economy.

* The Supreme Court declined to consider restoring a $10.1bn award against Altria Group's Philip Morris USA, in a lawsuit that alleged consumers were misled about the health risks of smoking "light" cigarettes, Lauren Foster writes from New York.

In December the Illinois Supreme Court threw out the case against the nation's largest cigarette maker. Its ruling focused on the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, the federal consumer protection watchdog, had authorised tobacco companies to describe their products as "light" or "low tar". The court found that Illinois state law precludes such suits when a federal agency has acted in this way.

Phone Companies Get Support From Supreme Court In Antitrust Case (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court signaled that it may put new limits on antitrust suits, as justices questioned the basis for claims that Verizon Communications and other local-telephone companies agreed not to compete against each other.

Verizon, AT&T, BellSouth Corp. and Qwest Communications International contend that the lawyers pressing the complaint have offered no evidence of collusion. A federal appeals court ruled against them, letting the case go forward.

In arguments Monday in Washington, members of the nation's highest court faulted the lawsuit for making only a general allegation about an illegal agreement not to compete. Several justices said the companies might have made independent decisions not to venture into each other's home territory.

"Maybe they want to get into the wireless business and think that's a better way to spend their money," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

DOJ_NMG_0098854

Business groups are backing the appeal. DuPont Co., MasterCard International, Visa USA, Northwest Airlines Corp., UAL Corp., Louisiana-Pacific Corp. and several industry trade groups all signed briefs siding with the phone companies.

It's one of two antitrust cases the high court will hear this week.

On Monday, the court also is considering an employment-law dispute involving Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., the largest U.S. tiremaker.

Although a 1996 law sought to encourage new competition in the local-phone business, the largest companies have proven reluctant to challenge each other directly.

The lawsuit, being pressed as a consumer class action by lawyers at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman in New York, says the likely explanation is an illegal agreement. The suit also says the phone companies worked together to keep smaller rivals from making inroads.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said the suit could proceed to the "discovery" stage. That means the companies would have to answer questions about their business practices and turn over documents.

Douglas Richards, one of the lawyers pressing the suit, said the 2nd Circuit approach was a fair one because would-be antitrust plaintiffs rarely have direct evidence of an illegal agreement before filing suit.

"People don't conspire in public parks," Richards said.

Richards drew skepticism from Justice Antonin Scalia, who questioned the wisdom of subjecting the telephone companies to the expense of having to defend against the suit.

"How many buildings will have to be rented to store those documents?" Scalia asked.

Justice Stephen Breyer joined Ginsburg in asking whether parallel conduct by the telephone companies was enough to warrant letting the lawsuit go forward.

Breyer voiced surprise when Richards said consumers, without any additional evidence, could sue four neighboring gas stations that declined to lower pump prices when the cost of oil was falling.

"If you're right, I guess we can engage in this major restructuring of the economy," Breyer said.

The lawyer for the phone companies, Michael Kellogg, said the lawsuit failed to give his clients adequate notice of the basis for the claim. He said courts shouldn't accept "legal conclusions in the guise of factual allegations."

Kellogg drew opposition from Justice John Paul Stevens, who said the consumers had alleged an illegal agreement. "How you can say this is not a statement of fact I find mind-boggling," Stevens said.

Still, several members of the court said they were concerned the allegation of an agreement lacked any details, such as a time or place. Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito,

David Souter and Anthony Kennedy all peppered the Milberg Weiss lawyer with skeptical questions.

The case is a follow-up to a 2004 Supreme Court case. That ruling said consumers can't use a separate section of the antitrust laws to accuse phone companies of failing to open up their networks to competition, as the 1996 law requires. Under U.S. antitrust law, successful damage claims are automatically tripled.

San Antonio-based AT&T is the nation's largest phone company, followed by New York-based Verizon, Atlanta-based BellSouth and Denver-based Qwest. The lawsuit says those four companies control more than 90 percent of the U.S. local-phone business.

The justices will rule by July in the case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 05-1126.

Steelworkers Await Word On New Owner (PTR)

By Joe Napsha, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 28, 2006

Steelworkers at the former Weirton Steel plant are anticipating that a new owner will be announced this week, one that might restart its steelmaking facilities and add 400 jobs, a union official said Monday.

Russia's largest steelmaker, OAO Severstal, is the latest to surface as a potential buyer and is said to be in negotiations to acquire the mill, according to published reports in a Moscow newspaper.

Both Severstal and Arcelor Mittal, the current owner at Weirton, declined to comment on the report, which was in the same Moscow newspaper that recently said Severstal wanted to buy Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp.

"There have been numerous interested parties ... and hopefully we'll have an announcement in the next few days," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at Weirton. Glyptis said he had no firsthand knowledge of the Russian steelmaker's interest in acquiring the former Weirton Steel plant.

The union is expecting a deal to surface because an agreement expires today between Arcelor Mittal and the U.S. Justice Department for Arcelor Mittal to divest itself of the tinmaking plant at Weirton, or one at Sparrows Point, Md., Glyptis said.

The Justice Department reached the deal because of Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor S.A., would give it a corner on tinmaking production in the eastern region of North America. Arcelor Mittal was unable to sell Dofasco Steel of Canada, which also has a tinmaking plant.

If a deal is not reached today, Arcelor Mittal could request a 60-day extension, Glyptis said.

While the antitrust investigation into the Arcelor Mittal merger remains open, the Justice Department will not comment on the agreement, Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said yesterday. Talamona said she could not comment on whether Arcelor Mittal requested an extension.

Among the others interested in buying the Weirton plant is Esmark, a Chicago-based firm that recently purchased Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., Glyptis said. Another potential buyer is former International Steel Group executive Mitch Hecht.

"There is interest among the other parties in restarting the hot end," which would return about 400 jobs to the plant, Glyptis said. The plant employs about 1,300 steelworkers.

Mittal Steel Co., based in the Netherlands, shut down steelmaking facilities at Weirton in November 2005, citing the high cost of raw materials, production and shipping. From that point, steel slabs from Cleveland and Sparrows Point were shipped to Weirton for tin coating.

Steel analyst Charles Bradford, of New York, questioned the validity of reports linking Severstal to the Weirton plant, noting that the company owns a Rouge Steel Co. plant near Detroit, and is building a mini-mill in Mississippi.

Instead, the Russians may be digging for information they can get from the competition, he said.

"Everybody is looking at everybody else," in this time of consolidation in the steel industry, Bradford said.

The possible restart of the steelmaking facilities at Weirton doesn't make much sense because it produces narrow slabs that make for inefficient production, Bradford said.

"I don't know why anybody would want that mill," Bradford said. "I don't think it is how much Mittal wants to sell it for. I think it's how much Mittal has to pay to sell it."

Swift Rejects Ex-CEO's Buyout (WSJ)

By Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Swift Transportation Co. rejected a $2.2 billion bid from its largest shareholder, former Chief Executive Officer Jerry Moyes, and said it will try to negotiate a higher offer from him or other parties.

Mr. Moyes is offering $29 a share for the Phoenix truckload carrier, which represented a 21% premium at the time it was made. A special committee of independent board members said the offer was inadequate.

As of 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, Swift was at $28.36, up 75 cents.

The board committee, which is being advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said it will negotiate with Mr. Moyes for a higher offer. The committee also said it has begun talks with "other potential financial and strategic buyers." The term financial buyers typically refers to private-equity firms. The term strategic buyers usually refers to corporations.

Mr. Moyes's 27.1% stake in Swift could pose an obstacle to a competing bid. In addition, Mr. Moyes, who remains a Swift director, said in a Nov. 3 letter to Chairman Jock Patton that he could be willing to pay more after going through the company's books. A Morgan Stanley unit has offered him as much as $2.74 billion in financing.

The Teamsters union, which was critical of Mr. Moyes when he ran the company, has cited analyst reports valuing Swift at $37 a share and had urged the board to reject the $29-a-share offer.

Google Prepares To Fight Antitrust Battle Over Its Search Rankings (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 28, 2006

Relegated to electronic Siberia by the Google Inc. search rankings, KinderStart.Com Inc. saw its Web traffic plummet and ad revenue evaporate, so it fought back with an antitrust lawsuit challenging Google's popular ranking system.

The 2006 suit in federal court in San Jose, Calif., has been dismissed once, and some observers say that the new amended version's antitrust and free speech claims may face an uphill battle to survive. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel indicated in an Oct. 27 hearing that he may not issue a written ruling until early next year on Google's motion to toss the case.

But the suit raises larger questions about Google's future susceptibility to antitrust claims as the ubiquitous Internet search engine gains steam.

"Google is so large it runs the risk of slamming into the kind of situation that Microsoft found itself in, in terms of bundling its services together," said Robert B. Reich, former labor secretary in the Clinton administration and now professor at the University of California's Goldman School of Public Policy.

"All this means is Google needs to be ready for litigation, even if ultimately it comes out in Google's favor. As a big dominant company playing the pivotal role it plays, it is a sitting duck for all sorts of potential litigation," Reich said.

As such a big player in the Internet industry, "not only do you become a target of antitrust plaintiffs, you also can easily use your market heft in such a way as to impose burdens, or disadvantages, on other players," said Reich.

CRITICISM MOUNTS

Others who watch the high-tech industry closely don't foresee serious antitrust clouds looming on Google's horizon.

"There is no question Google does have market power in its space," said Eric Goldman, law and technology professor at Santa Clara University School of Law in Silicon Valley. "That is a predicate" in antitrust.

"No question Google is the market leader, has the numbers and is setting the market agenda," Goldman said. "But the reality is, it is an extremely competitive market. Their market base is one click away from going to competitors."

Google's patented rating system called PageRank employs an algorithm to rank searches not just by volume of referrals but also by the value of the referring site, scoring sites in what the company says are "objective" standards.

The most valuable spots are the top 10 sites listed in any Google search results, increasing the likelihood of new visitors and more ad revenue.

Google has faced criticism recently for alleged blacklisting of automaker BMW Germany for practices Google considered spamming, which were designed to improve BMW's place in rankings. For that it was allegedly penalized.

And the company has faced other criticisms for censorship after it agreed to filter out certain Web sites that the Chinese government found objectionable. It also removes some references to Nazi paraphernalia in search results in Germany and France to comply with national laws. So far, the U.S. antitrust regulators have not had any problems with Google. The U.S. Department of Justice signed off on Google's $1.65 billion purchase of video site YouTube earlier this month.

At stake in the KinderStart suit is the claim that Google went beyond its objective standards and blocked KinderStart for anti-competitive reasons.

"KinderStart believes the blockage was intentional because KS is a competitor," said Gregory J. Yu, KinderStart's attorney with Global Law Group in San Mateo, Calif.

KinderStart is a Norwalk, Calif.-based search engine company that caters to new parents, educators and nonprofit groups with access to health, education and other material about infants and toddlers up to age 7, according to pleadings in Kinderstart.com v. Google Inc., No. C06-2057JF.

The company Web site, begun in 2000, saw a steady growth in 2005, reaching roughly 10 million page views a month, according to Yu.

But suddenly the company found itself dropped from a spot in the top 10 of Web search results to near invisibility in 2006, even though it did nothing wrong and could not find out from Google why it was backbenched, Yu said.

The suit alleges that KinderStart saw a 70 percent drop in monthly traffic in March 2006 and an 80 percent drop in AdSense revenue, the Google advertising partnership.

Google spokesman Ricardo Reyes, during three days of attempting to prescreen questions, said the company did not have time to answer specific queries, but provided a prepared statement by Hilary Ware, litigation counsel.

"Google's search results function as a recommended reading list, with Google telling users what sites it believes are most likely to be of interest to them," Ware said. "Kinderstart is suing to force Google to say what Kinderstart wants it to say about Kinderstart's site."

GOOGLE 'SLAPP's BACK

Google responded to the lawsuit with what's known as an anti-"SLAPP" motion, stating that the KinderStart claims amounted to strategic litigation against public participation. Anti-SLAPP motions seek to toss out suits that are shown to be efforts to intimidate or silence criticism of the powerful.

Google filed its anti-SLAPP motion arguing that KinderStart improperly sued Google over Google's exercise of its free speech rights, Ware said.

But in an initial June 30 court hearing, Fogel, the San Jose federal judge, put little stock in the anti-SLAPP claim. "Clearly the origins of that statute were to protect citizens who were petitioning the government for redress of grievances," he said. "I think there's a point at which commercial speech is not what the legislature had in mind," he said.

In its most recent motion to dismiss KinderStart's suit, Google's outside counsel, David Kramer of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati in Palo Alto, Calif., wrote, "Google is shielded from all liability both by the First Amendment and federal statutory immunity granted online service providers.

"Recommendations and ratings such as Google's are plainly opinions, entitled to the protections of both the First Amendment and the California Constitution."

Goldman called KinderStart's claim "laughable that they are a competitor of Google." He likened it to an indirect competitor serving a niche market, not the mass-market design at the core of Google.

The suit, fashioned as a class action, alleges Sherman Act, monopolization and antitrust violations, as well as Lanham Act false representation claims, free speech violation, defamation and unfair competition under California state law.

Yu points out Google is used in 60 percent of all U.S. search queries. In 2004, Google attained a market share based on revenues alone that exceeded 80 percent of search-related advertising revenue, according to the complaint.

Yu alleged Google's top two competitors, Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp., are losing market share in relevant markets.

But being popular and widely used isn't the same as being monopolistic.

"If you make a better mousetrap you are entitled to take over as much of the market as you want," said Robert Doyle, antitrust specialist with Doyle, Barlow & Mazard in Washington, D.C. "Google has grown and expanded because it has built a better mousetrap. It only remains questionable when a company the size of Google engages in questionable practices to maintain that position."

Reich sees the warning signs of that in Europe. He has criticized Google in the past for going to European antitrust regulators to complain about Microsoft's new Vista software containing a search button for Microsoft's MSN search engine. Reich has said Google should take care that it doesn't find itself facing similar antitrust complaints for bundled free tools such as Gmail or new small-business applications, traditionally a Microsoft mainstay.

But for purposes of the KinderStart lawsuit, Google's actions in China, France or Germany do not make the company a state actor for purposes of KinderStart's First Amendment claim. Yu's argument would be akin to considering Google a public forum, like a shopping mall, that would have to give KinderStart the access to rankings that it seeks.

"That argument is a dead loser," said Goldman. "It has been made repeatedly against online actors and has never gotten any traction in the courts," he said.

"In reality Google is a media business. They should be protected. Google does what a newspaper editor does; they decide what makes the cut for a newspaper and where to put it." He said that may give them the power to make or break companies, but that's the issue with editors in single-newspaper towns.

By contrast, Reich likened high-technology companies such as Google to telephone companies, which are common carriers. It is representing many businesses -- Internet search engines and browsers are essentially gateways to millions of businesses, he said.

But applying the common-carrier argument to Internet companies may be too radical for judges. "Antitrust hasn't clarified what common-carrier responsibility means, apart from regulated monopolies," as phone companies once were, Reich said.

Google is the economy standard for search engines and "if you can't rely on it to be absolutely neutral in terms of [search result] placement, there might very well be an argument for predatory behavior," he said.

Reich suggested such claims might be more likely to arise as Federal Trade Commission, rather than Sherman or Clayton Antitrust Act, claims.

The FTC legislation is much broader and courts in this era have been particularly reluctant to blaze new trails in antitrust, Reich said.

Goldman also warned that Google must be careful. If it is a runaway success "they may run into antitrust supervision even if it is done cleanly. It could be a victim of its own success." But he found that possibility remote.

Goldman said Google has been disingenuous about the way it markets itself as a neutral provider of technology. "It is doing more than that," he said, again comparing it to a media company. He did acknowledge the company has a "significant issue about transparency." KinderStart and others have said they don't know why their rankings tanked or how to improve their sites to get back in Google's good graces. "You don't know what's going on under the hood," Goldman said of Google's blocking practices.

High Court Case Could Imperil Pending Patents (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 28, 2006

When Kenneth Bass III clerked at the Supreme Court in 1969, his justice, the late Hugo Black, told him confidentially what he thought of patents.

"He told me that in his lifetime, he had seen only one real invention -- the airplane -- and he wasn't even certain about that one," says Bass. "He just didn't like patents."

Bass has to hope the current justices don't share that view today, when the Court takes up what he thinks could be the most important patent decision in 40 years.

Now a partner in the D.C. firm Sterne, Kessler, Goldstein & Fox, Bass is part of the legal team that will be defending a disputed patent in the case of KSR International v. Teleflex, which will be heard today. And Black would probably not like the side Bass is on.

Bass represents Pennsylvania auto-parts manufacturer Teleflex, the owner of a patent on an adjustable automobile gas pedal. Teleflex argues in favor of a controversial standard, used by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit to varying degrees for decades, that enabled Teleflex to get and keep the patent. By requiring patent challengers to produce hard evidence, the standard makes it harder to topple a patent based on the assertion that the new product was an obvious extension of prior ideas.

Critics say the standard protects even the most thinly documented patents, opening the floodgates to junk patents for minor innovations and dubious inventions. KSR lawyer James Dabney, a partner in New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, cites statistics indicating that the number of patents upheld after litigation nearly doubled, increasing from 35 percent to 67 percent, after the Federal Circuit and its standard were created.

Too many easily won patents, critics say, slow creativity and the exchange of ideas, putting "glue, not grease, into the gears of innovation," in the words of a brief by the Progress & Freedom Foundation.

But if Teleflex loses and the Supreme Court devises a less-patent-protecting standard, says Bass' co-counsel Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, it will open a very different floodgate. Because "many millions" of patents were granted under the disputed standard and patents can be challenged at any time, Goldstein says, "If the Supreme Court does decide to make a substantial change, it will call into question innumerable patents." [Goldstein is a contributor to Legal Times.]

That nightmare scenario might ordinarily make the outcome easy to predict. The Supreme Court can't possibly want to throw open millions of patents to costly and complex litigation before juries, right?

TABULA RASA

Maybe, maybe not. In part because of the Court's historic love-hate relationship with patents, as evidenced by Hugo Black's remark, the outcome is hard to predict. Some patent experts think the Court is so unhappy with the proliferation of junk patents -- and with the Federal Circuit for adopting the standard that allowed them to multiply -- that it is willing to blow up the system to fix it. Others think the justices will leave well enough alone, perhaps only fine-tuning the Federal Circuit's standard.

What makes speculating on the outcome of the case doubly difficult is that labels are hard to pin on the justices when patents are involved.

"The personality aspect is an unknown. Unlike with constitutional cases, I don't really have a clue of where the justices will come out," says Bass. "There are no schools of jurisprudential thought among the justices on this, no perception of who is pro- or anti-patent."

Perhaps because of the uncertain outcome, patent attorneys have lined up by the dozens to file amicus briefs. But because business giants can be found on both sides of the issue, some firms were conflicted out, say lawyers involved in the case. Last month, in a rare move, the Court allowed Michigan lawyer Harold Milton Jr. of Dickinson Wright to withdraw a brief he had filed with the court on behalf of Teleflex, after realizing his firm had a conflict.

In another sign of the legal community's ambivalence about the case, Stanford Law School professor and leading patent scholar Mark Lemley, in effect, switched sides. At first he joined petitioner KSR in urging the Court to review the Federal Circuit's standard. But after seeing signs of flexibility in some recent Federal Circuit rulings, Lemley changed his mind and joined a brief siding with Teleflex. He now defends the standard as "the best we've got right now."

That same sentiment, plus a desire for stability in the field, contributed to a lineup in the case that the Teleflex team points to with pride. All of the bar groups that filed briefs -- including the American Bar Association, the American Intellectual Property Law Association, and the Federal Circuit Bar Association -- sided with Teleflex in support of the existing standard.

On the other side, KSR's Dabney sniffs that "you should examine with care the professional interests" of the leaders of the bar groups, adding that "the briefs don't reflect the views of all the members." In an acidic footnote in one of his briefs to the Court, Dabney also expresses wonderment about the bar's interest in stability "in view of the enormous fees that litigation of invalid patent claims can generate."

BURDENS OF PROOF

The briefs are full of ominous predictions about the impact of the case on innovation and the overwhelmed patent system. Solicitor General Paul Clement, joining KSR in the case, says the Federal Circuit standard "imposes significant burdens" on the patent system by forcing examiners to hunt for evidence of obviousness instead of allowing them to quickly dismiss plainly weak patent applications.

But part of the background music in the case is the Court's pendulum swings throughout history on the merits and value of patents.

For most of the 19th century, says Joshua Sarnoff, head of the intellectual property law clinic at American University's Washington College of Law, "patents were a very big deal" for the Supreme Court, with the justices playing their part to foster economic expansion. In a law review article, George Washington University Law School professor John Duffy, part of KSR's legal team, noted that in 1888 the Court heard 12 days of argument, then produced an opinion upholding Alexander Graham Bell's patents on the telephone that filled an entire volume of the U.S. Reports.

In the 20th century, patent litigation went in and out of favor with the Court, in part because of the highly specialized nature of the law, and also because of the occasional anti-monopolist impulses of justices such as Black.

In the 1979 book "The Brethren," an inside-the-Court expose written by Bob Woodward and Scott Armstrong, the Court's disdain for patent cases was documented. According to the book, a 1975 patent case named Sakraida v. Ag Pro was labeled the "cow shit case" among justices and clerks, only partly because it involved the patentability of a system used to clean the floors of dairy barns.

Chief Justice Warren Burger assigned the case to his liberal nemesis, Justice William Brennan Jr., instead of John Paul Stevens, then the Court's junior justice. Brennan was insulted, according to the book, and he wrote the decision himself to spare his law clerks from the humiliation of getting involved. The ruling, which struck down the patent because of obviousness, is cited in numerous briefs in the case now before the justices.

The Court may have thought that it could wash its hands (so to speak) of patent cases entirely when Congress created the Federal Circuit in 1982 to handle appeals in patent cases and a number of other specific areas of law. In fact, until recently, it was rare for the Court to grant review in a patent case, a possible sign that it felt the circuit was handling the jurisprudence well. And when its rulings were reviewed, they were often affirmed.

But in the past four years, the Supreme Court has granted review in nine Federal Circuit cases, including two this term, and none have been affirmed so far.

Critics have hoped for years that the obviousness standard -- a threshold issue for every patent -- would get a fresh look from the high court.

The case in which the Court finally agreed to review it was an unpublished opinion issued in January 2005. At issue is a Teleflex patent issued in 2000 for an adjustable gas pedal for cars, designed to accommodate what KSR's Dabney describes as "the five percent female" -- petite-sized women who need to reach the pedal without getting too close to the steering wheel's airbag. Teleflex sued competitor KSR in the Eastern District of Michigan for patent infringement. KSR countered by challenging the validity of the patent as a too-obvious combination of existing elements. The district court agreed that at least one part of the patent was invalid because it was obvious.

But the Federal Circuit reversed, finding that KSR had not shown enough evidence that because of prior "teaching, suggestion or motivation," the patented product was an obvious development that made it undeserving of a patent.

As Patents Grow More Contentious, Battleground Shifts To High Court (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With the economy increasingly dependent on technological innovation, the Supreme Court is scrutinizing more patent rulings made by a special court that critics say has tilted too far in favor of intellectual-property rights and could be stifling competition.

The high court, which today hears arguments in one of three patent cases on this term's docket, has ruled in recent cases on the side of more flexibility in enforcing such rights. If that trend continues, it could translate into weaker protections for patent holders and promote greater access to inventions.

The Supreme Court's newfound assertiveness on core issues of patent law -- after hearing only a handful of cases in the field over 20-plus years -- comes amid a sharp debate over how to maintain American industry's competitive edge while upholding the protections that reward the risk-taking behind cutting-edge inventions.

In today's economy, for instance, many innovations -- such as software programs, drugs or advanced electronics -- are built on myriad smaller inventions. That has led to disputes between owners of component patents and those who incorporate those pieces into more complex products, leaving federal courts to delineate who owns what.

Mark Lemley, a professor at Stanford Law School and an intellectual-property litigator, says the justices are indicating "that the patent system is out of whack, and needs to be reined in."

Others see the shift as a more neutral response to changes in the marketplace. Kevin Casey, president of the Federal Circuit Bar Association, says the high court's attention reflects the increasing complexity of patent law and the importance of intellectual property to the economy. "I don't by any means think the court has an agenda," says Mr. Casey, a partner at Stradley Ronon Stevens & Young in Malvern, Pa.

To encourage innovation, patents offer the promise of monopoly on an invention's use, ensuring that patent holders reap the rewards of a useful discovery. But that is balanced against the public interest in access to worthwhile discoveries, both for their inherent utility and because today's research underpins tomorrow's inventions. For this reason, only inventions that are deemed useful, novel and nonobvious can be patented -- and patents expire after a set period, currently 20 years.

In the latest of a series of intellectual-property cases, the Supreme Court today will re-examine one of the bedrock doctrines of patent law: "obviousness." At issue is whether the design of an adjustable gas pedal was so obvious as to invalidate a patent at the heart of a dispute between two auto-parts suppliers.

More broadly, the question is whether the federal court that hears patent appeals, which was established by Congress in 1982, has set the right balance in intellectual-property rights. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit was designed to promote uniformity in several areas of specialized federal law, now including patents, trademarks, veterans' benefits, government contracts and federal civil-service claims.

Critics -- including the Bush administration in today's case -- assert that the Federal Circuit has shifted too far toward patent holders, expanding the types of inventions that can be patented and broadening the scope of monopoly a patent affords its holder. The court's defenders say the Federal Circuit was created in part to strengthen patent protections, and that it has succeeded in clarifying the law.

Any federal district court can hear a patent case, but appeals go to the Federal Circuit, located across the street from the White House in a building named for the court's first chief judge, Howard T. Markey. With the Supreme Court rarely reviewing its decisions, the Federal Circuit long had the final word in patent law.

After the Federal Circuit's creation, "the Supreme Court basically got out of patent law," Mr. Lemley says.

That has changed in recent years. The justices heard five appeals from the Federal Circuit in the past three terms -- and didn't affirm it once.

In May, the high court unanimously reversed a Federal Circuit decision that had virtually guaranteed patent holders could bar imitators from continuing to use their invention. Instead, the Supreme Court ruled that judges should consider the same factors used in other types of cases where injunctions are sought, and weigh such issues as whether royalty payments would be sufficient redress and whether the public interest would be served.

In that case, online auctioneer eBay Inc.'s "buy it now" feature had been found to infringe a business-method patent held by MercExchange LLC of Great Falls, Va.

The eBay ruling followed a June 2005 opinion in which the high court decided, again unanimously, that in some cases pharmaceutical researchers could use compounds patented by others if doing so could help develop new drugs. The justices overturned the victory a small patent holder, Integra Lifesciences I, Ltd., had won at the Federal Circuit over Merck KGaA of Germany.

Last month, the justices heard a challenge to a Federal Circuit ruling holding that if a company pays royalties to use an invention, it can't subsequently sue to invalidate the patent. At issue is whether biotechnology company MedImmune Inc. of Gaithersburg, Md., lost the right to contest a patent by agreeing to pay a royalty to Genentech Inc. of South San Francisco, Calif.

In the current term, which began last month, the justices have three patent cases from the Federal Circuit on the docket.

Critics say the Federal Circuit has fostered an expansion of patent rights that has made them both more potent and easier to obtain. The Federal Circuit's rulings have "converted patents from handguns to bazookas, and at the same time stopped requiring permits to get them," says economist Adam Jaffe, dean of arts and sciences at Brandeis University.

The Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, declined to discuss such critiques. "I'm not in the business of responding to what a few professors say," he said in an interview. But, he added, in its history the court has "added considerably greater clarity to the patent law, and a great deal more consistency and maturation to many patent doctrines."

In today's case, the high court turns to the issue of obviousness. KSR International Co., of Ridgetown, Ontario, won a contract to supply General Motors Corp. trucks with gas pedals that could be raised to meet the foot of a driver with shorter legs. Depressing the pedal activates an electronic throttle control that sends gas to the engine. The electronic sensor is attached to the pedal's support assembly and thus moved with it, unlike previous designs, which had the sensor fixed in the housing.

But rival Teleflex Corp. of Limerick, Pa., already made a similar device for trucks produced by Ford Motor Co. Teleflex claimed KSR had infringed its 2001 patent. When KSR refused to pay a royalty, Teleflex sued.

The Constitution authorizes Congress to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Patent law aims to strike a balance that provides an incentive to inventors by guaranteeing a limited-time monopoly on an invention's use, while ensuring that intellectual-property rights are flexible enough to allow research and innovation based on prior discoveries.

As a result, not everything is patentable, including discoveries that are deemed "obvious."

The Supreme Court laid out the obviousness doctrine in 1851. A patent requires more "skill and ingenuity" than that of "an ordinary mechanic acquainted with the business," the court said. The 1952 Patent Act subsequently denied patents to inventions that, in light of "prior art" in the field, "would have been obvious...to a person having ordinary skill in the art to which the subject matter pertains."

After examining other patented pedal-assembly designs, U.S. District Judge Lawrence Zatkoff ruled for KSR. "A hypothetical person with an undergraduate degree in mechanical engineering or an equivalent amount of industry experience" who was familiar with pedal systems "would have found it obvious to attach a modular pedal position sensor" to the support member, the judge wrote. Thus, the Teleflex patent "is invalid for obviousness."

On appeal, however, the Federal Circuit said Judge Zatkoff hadn't properly followed the stricter test it fashioned when an obviousness claim is based on combining prior inventions. Citing prior Federal Circuit decisions, Circuit Judge Alvin Schall wrote that the test was needed to protect patents from "hindsight," saying that is why the court required that "a person of ordinary skill in the art" not only have a motivation to combine the prior-art teachings, but some motivation to combine them in the particular manner claimed.

Many big patent holders, including General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co. and 3M Co., have sided with Teleflex. But other companies, particularly in software and other industries where combinations of prior designs are common, argue against the Federal Circuit's test. Cisco Systems Inc., Hallmark Cards Inc. and Microsoft Corp. have sided with KSR, as has the Bush administration.

The Supreme Court has yet to schedule argument on the third patent case accepted this term, which examines when domestically patented parts assembled abroad fall under U.S. patent protection. Decisions in all three cases are expected by the term's end in June.

As Globe Warms, Can States Force The EPA To Act? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

Arctic sea ice is melting. Glaciers are in retreat. Sea levels are rising. So what is the Environmental Protection Agency doing about it?

That's what a group of state officials and environmentalists want to know.

Seven years ago, they asked the EPA to get involved - to take an initial step in response to scientific evidence that suggests greenhouse gases are causing global warming.

The agency refused, saying there were too many unresolved questions about the causes and effects of global warming. The state officials took their case to court, charging that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to take immediate action.

On Wednesday, the dispute arrives at the US Supreme Court, where the justices must decide whether the EPA is required to take action or whether the agency retains the discretion to decide for itself how best to respond to world-wide environmental threats.

The case will test the authority of special interest groups and state governments to sue federal agencies and force them to adopt certain regulatory policies that they favor. The case could also establish important legal precedents that might help or hinder state efforts to regulate greenhouses gases on their own in the absence of federal action.

On a broader level, the case raises questions about the role of the judiciary in resolving litigation over regulatory policy arguments. Should judges defer to controversial decisions made by administrative agencies on whether or when to pass regulations? Or should judges aggressively enforce what they see as the underlying purpose of statutes that govern agencies?

At issue in Massachusetts v. US Environmental Protection Agency is whether EPA officials acted properly when they declined to issue national regulations limiting the release of four greenhouse gases from new automobile models. The gases are carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxide, and hydrofluorocarbons.

EPA officials say the agency lacks the power to regulate greenhouse gases. The Clean Air Act authorizes the EPA to take action to reduce and control agents that cause "air pollution." But agency officials have concluded that greenhouse gases are not agents of air pollution. They say the Clean Air Act does not address global climate change.

As a fallback position, EPA officials say that even if they do have authority to regulate greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act they also have discretion under the act to decide when to initiate such measures. The officials have said there was scientific uncertainty about global warming and that they wanted to wait for more research and additional action by Congress before crafting an appropriate response.

Massachusetts along with 11 other states, three cities, a US territory, and numerous environmental groups are urging the Supreme Court to order the EPA to faithfully enforce the law as passed by Congress.

"A straightforward reading of the language of the Clean Air Act shows that carbon dioxide and other air pollutants associated with climate change are 'air pollutants' potentially subject to regulation [under the Clean Air Act]," writes Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey, in his brief. "When Congress has spoken as plainly as it has here, an administrative agency is bound to obey that legislative command."

In his brief, US Solicitor General Paul Clement defends the EPA's earlier legal positions. He also argues that Massachusetts lacks the legal standing to bring the lawsuit in the first place. Mr. Clement says Massachusetts officials are unable to draw a direct link between harm to the state and the EPA's decision not to pass the requested regulations.

Massachusetts and other petitioners in the case complain of "profound harms" caused by climate change including the inundation of coastal property, damage to seaside facilities, and additional emergency response costs from more frequent and intense storms. Clement argues that the state's generalized concerns are not enough to demonstrate that such cataclysmic harms are a direct result of the EPA's decision not to regulate.

The specific request was for the EPA to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions from new cars. Such emissions make up only a fraction of greenhouse gases released worldwide.

Clement says that 80 percent of all greenhouse gases are from countries other than the US and that, of US emissions, 70 percent are from nontransportation sources. The solicitor general adds that of the remaining 30 percent, the requested regulation would only affect new vehicles models - leaving the vast majority of emissions in the US and throughout the world not covered by the new regulations.

In effect, Clement says, the threat of global warming is an international threat that requires an international solution. Since the EPA acting alone cannot solve the problem, lawyers from Massachusetts don't have legal standing to try to hold the EPA responsible for a problem it can't solve without international cooperation.

Mr. Milkey says the primary concern of Congress in the Clean Air Act was for the agency to determine whether certain pollutants can reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare. Where they pose such a threat, Milkey says, the agency must act to protect the public.

Pivotal Case On Global Warming Case Confronts U.S. High Court (FINDLAW/AP)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court hears arguments this week in a case that could determine whether the Bush administration must change course in how it deals with the threat of global warming.

A dozen U.S. states as well as environmental groups and large cities are trying to convince the court that the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate, as a matter of public health, the amount of carbon dioxide that comes from vehicles.

Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. It is the principal "greenhouse" gas that many scientists believe is flowing into the atmosphere at an unprecedented rate, leading to a warming of the earth and widespread ecological changes. One way to reduce those emissions is to have cleaner-burning cars.

The Bush administration intends to argue before the court on Wednesday that the EPA lacks the power under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The agency contends that even if it did have such authority, it would have discretion under the law on how to address the problem without imposing emissions controls.

The states, led by Massachusetts, and more than a dozen environmental groups insist the 1970 law makes clear that carbon dioxide is a pollutant - much like lead and smog-causing chemicals - that is subject to regulation because its poses a threat to public health.

A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled in favor of the government in 2005. But last June, the Supreme Court decided to take up the case, plunging for the first time into the politically charged debate over global warming. The ruling next year is expected to be one of the court's most important ever involving the environment.

At issue for now is pollution from automobiles. But the ruling indirectly may affect how the agency deals with carbon dioxide that comes from electric power plants.

In a separate lawsuit, the EPA says the Clean Air Act also prevents it from regulating such emissions from those plants. That claim would be undercut, Bookbinder says, if the high court rules in the states' favor in the auto emissions case.

President George W. Bush has rejected calls to regulate carbon dioxide. He favors voluntary steps by industry and development of new technologies to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases released into the atmosphere.

The United States accounts for about one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions. The amount of carbon dioxide from U.S. motor vehicles, power plants and other industry has increased on average by about 1 percent a year since 1990.

Now that Democrats will control the House and Senate in January after their election victories this month, there is expected to be increased pressure in Congress for mandatory limits on carbon emissions.

Global Warming Goes To Court (NYT)

New York Times, November 28, 2006

The Bush administration has been on a six-year campaign to expand its powers, often beyond what the Constitution allows. So it is odd to hear it claim that it lacks the power to slow global warming by limiting the emission of harmful gases. But that is just what it will argue to the Supreme Court tomorrow, in what may be the most important environmental case in many years.

A group of 12 states, including New York and Massachusetts, is suing the Environmental Protection Agency for failing to properly do its job. These states, backed by environmental groups and scientists, say that the Clean Air Act requires the E.P.A. to impose limits on carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases emitted by new cars. These gases are a major contributor to the "greenhouse effect" that is dangerously heating up the planet.

The Bush administration insists that the E.P.A. does not have the power to limit these gases. It argues that they are not "air pollutants" under the Clean Air Act. Alternatively, it contends that the court should dismiss the case because the states do not have "standing," since they cannot show that they will be specifically harmed by the agency's failure to regulate greenhouse gases.

A plain reading of the Clean Air Act shows that the states are right. The act says that the E.P.A. "shall" set standards for "any air pollutant" that in its judgment causes or contributes to air pollution that "may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The word "welfare," the law says, includes "climate" and "weather." The E.P.A. makes an array of specious arguments about why the act does not mean what it expressly says. But it has no right to refuse to do what Congress said it "shall" do.

Beneath the statutory and standing questions, this is a case about how seriously the government takes global warming. The E.P.A.'s decision was based in part on its poorly reasoned conclusion that there was too much "scientific uncertainty" about global warming to worry about it. The government's claim that the states lack standing also scoffs at global warming, by failing to acknowledge that the states have a strong interest in protecting their land and citizens against coastal flooding and the other kinds of damage that are being projected.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, climate scientists from the NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies, Stanford University and other respected institutions warn that "the scientific evidence of the risks, long time lags and irreversibility of climate change argue persuasively for prompt regulatory action." The Supreme Court can strike an important blow in defense of the planet simply by ruling that the E.P.A. must start following the law.

An Environmental Warning System (WP/AP)

By Vicki Smith

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. -- The Appalachian Trail gives hikers a nearly 2,200-mile trek through mountains, meadows and forests stretching from Georgia to Maine. But to scientists and land managers, it is also a living laboratory that could provide warnings of environmental problems while there is still time to fix them.

A diverse collection of organizations have launched a project to begin long-term monitoring of the trail's environmental health, with plans to tap into an army of volunteer "citizen scientists" and professionals.

Together, they will collect information about air and water quality, the health of plants, and animal migration patterns to build an early environmental warning system for the 120 million people along the Eastern Seaboard.

"It's somewhat like the canary in the coal mine in the sense of using it as a barometer for environmental and human health conditions," said Gregory Miller, president of the Silver Spring-based American Hiking Society.

The Appalachian Mountains are ideal for the project because they are home to one of the richest collections of temperate-zone species in the world. They also have a variety of ecosystems that blend into one another -- hardwood forests next to softwood forests next to alpine forests. The trail along the mountain chain passes through 14 states and eight national forests.

The idea for the project, the Appalachian Trail Mega-Transect, is in its infancy, but it has support from the National Park Service, the U.S. Forest Service, Cornell University, the National Geographic Society and Aveda Corp., an environmentally conscious beauty-products company.

"We're really after two things," said Brian Mitchell, a coordinator with the Park Service's Northeast Temperate Network in Woodstock, Vt. "We want to get a better understanding of what's happening on the trail so we can better manage it. The other side is we want to take the lessons we learn from the trail and show people that what's happening on the trail does actually affect us."

High ozone levels, for example, can reduce plant photosynthesis and growth and speed up aging and leaf loss. In humans, they can affect the lungs, respiratory tract and eyes, and increase susceptibility to allergens. Atmospheric deposition -- airborne sulfur and nitrogen deposited in the soil by rain and snow -- can affect farming and crop growth.

An example of the environmental changes along the trail is smog in the Great Smoky Mountains in Tennessee and North Carolina, said David Startzell, executive director of the Appalachian Trail Conservancy in Harpers Ferry, W.Va.

"People will read that on 25 or 30 days in a given year, it's considered unhealthy to walk on the Appalachian Trail, and we think that's going to grab people's attention more than if they just read about air-quality trends in general," he said.

That is also why volunteers will be critical to the project's success. It's one thing for people to read about technical reports on bird migration, acid rain or air quality, Startzell says. "We think it's another thing when people learn about that firsthand by actually helping to collect that information," he said.

Mitchell hopes that within the next year, the project will have at least two flagship programs for volunteers. He says volunteers could help with such tasks as measuring tree diameters, taking photographs to illustrate visibility, tracking the arrival times of migratory birds and dating the blooming and leaf loss of trees.

Advocates hope the project will help drive changes in public policy and personal behavior.

"Part of our hope is that as people become more aware of trends affecting those lands, they'll be motivated to take action," Startzell said, "whether that means switching to a hybrid car or just conducting their own way of life in a little more energy-efficient manner, or going to a town hall meeting and advocating for more open space."

Killing The Dead Zones (WP)

LAST YEAR was particularly bad for the Chesapeake Bay. Among its many problems, 4.5 percent of the bay's water had extremely low levels of oxygen saturation during the summer, creating anoxic "dead zones" that killed off valuable ecosystems. But according to a study issued recently, only 1.8 percent of the bay was anoxic this summer, encouraging the reestablishment of vital food chains. A separate evaluation released last week also highlighted a modest increase in the bay's overall health.

What made the difference? Diligence on land may have prevented more nitrogen and phosphorus from feeding into the bay than in past years. But Beth McGee, a scientist at the private Chesapeake Bay Foundation, says human efforts should get only a small fraction of the credit. Anoxic water, a summer phenomenon, is caused by polluted runoff that flows into the bay during the spring. A dry spring, such as the one the region experienced this year, means less runoff and, therefore, fewer dead zones -- even if the region is inundated later on, as it was in June. The foundation, which still gives the bay's health a grade of D, also claims that even if all the projects to which states around the bay have committed are carried to completion, they will reduce annual pollution in the bay by only about 40 percent of their stated goal by 2010.

Still, bay states are improving their record on protecting the estuary, if too slowly, and they have time to expand their programs. Maryland encourages its farmers to plant cover crops to absorb nitrates and reduce runoff, a program paid for in part by the state's useful Bay Restoration Fund. The Maryland Department of Agriculture has approved the subsidized planting of about 290,000 acres of cover crops for this fall -- a number that should rise in future years. Virginia, which lags behind Maryland in its bay cleanup efforts, should guarantee revenue to do the same -- so that farmers will be able to rely on timely support over many harvests. Both states should also expand programs that help farmers pay for other agricultural improvements, such as the construction and maintenance of riparian buffers, which are effective and natural pollution trappers.

Maryland's incoming attorney general, Douglas F. Gansler, ran on a platform of improving the bay by using the federal Clean Water Act to go after large agricultural polluters -- even those out of state. That may also help Maryland meet its pollution reduction goals.

Gun Background Check System Crashes (AP)

WASHINGTON - An FBI computer system that quickly screens gun buyers' backgrounds for criminal activity crashed several times over the past two days, officials said Monday.

At times, the National Instant Criminal Background Check System was on the blink for up to a half-hour on Sunday and Monday - potentially allowing buyers to purchase firearms without being screened if sellers gave up on making the required check.

The computer crash was blamed on a technical glitch that was being worked on Monday evening, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. "It's a performance issue that we've never encountered before," he said

It was unclear when the glitch would be fixed.

The system, located in Clarksburg, W.Va., generally receives between 30,000 and 50,000 requests for background checks on a daily basis, peaking on the weekends, Bresson said. It usually processes the requests within 30 minutes.

U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Consider Case Involving Professor And His FBI File (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of a Nobel Peace Prize-nominated law professor who wants the U.S. government to expunge his FBI file.

A federal appeals court found that information the government gathered on Cherif Bassiouni is pertinent to authorized law enforcement activity as part of President George W. Bush's campaign against terror. The records are important for evaluating the reliability of FBI intelligence sources, the appeals court found.

The government argued in the lower courts that even though Bassiouni is not a member of any terror organization, agents probably will continue to receive information about him because of his travels in the Middle East.

Bassiouni, an Egyptian who teaches in the United States, is serving the United Nations as an independent expert on human rights in Afghanistan and was chairman of the U.N. Security Council's commission to investigate war crimes in the former Yugoslavia.

In 1999, Bassiouni was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize for work on international criminal justice and for his contribution to the creation of the International Criminal Court.

Bassiouni was among the U.N. human rights experts expressing concern about possible irreversible psychiatric symptoms in some terrorism suspects from virtual solitary confinement at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Former Sheriff Pleads Not Guilty To Involvement In Drug-selling Scheme (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - ROANOKE, Virginia-A former sheriff pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges that he took part in a scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals with a dozen former and current officers.

H. Franklin Cassell, 68, and two Henry County sheriff's deputies and a captain in the economically distressed county pleaded not guilty. The other defendants will be in court Wednesday.

The indictment returned Oct. 31 said Cassell looked the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations, stole guns and other evidence and then resold cocaine, steroids, marijuana and other drugs to the public.

Cassell is charged with impeding a federal investigation and money laundering. If convicted, he faces up to 53 years in prison and a $1.25 million (â,¬950,000) fine.

Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, drug distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury.

A former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, agreed to cooperate with investigators. His planned guilty plea Monday was delayed because his lawyer was ill, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant.

A civilian, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty Monday to racketeering conspiracy under an agreement with prosecutors and may testify for the government, Bondurant said.

Prosecutors said the scheme began in 1998.

Cassell announced his retirement two weeks ago.

Former Henry Sheriff Enters Not-guilty Plea (RTD)

Richmond Times Dispatch, November 28, 2006

ROANOKE -- Former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell pleaded not guilty yesterday to trying to thwart a federal investigation into a drug-dealing ring allegedly run by some of his deputies.

Later, in the same federal courtroom where Cassell pleaded not guilty, the Henry man whose arrest prompted the indictment of Cassell, along with 12 of his employees, pleaded guilty to a single count of participating in a racketeering conspiracy. William R. Reed, 35, is to be sentenced in U.S. District Court at a later date and could testify at Cassell's trial.

On Nov. 2, federal and state authorities arrested 20 people in Martinsville and across the county, charging them with taking part in a racketeering scheme in which members of the sheriff's department resold drugs they had seized from dealers, stole drugs and weapons held in the custody of the sheriff's department and then lied to federal investigators to hide their activity.

Among the 20 were Cassell and 12 current or former employees in the sheriff's department. Cassell, Henry's sheriff since 1992, retired Nov. 13.

Yesterday, after Cassell's plea, his attorney John Lichtenstein said he is glad the plea is out of the way so he can begin the fight to clear Cassell's name. "Now the process can begin," he said.

Federal agents began their investigation of Cassell's department in March 2005, when U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Philadelphia tipped off their counterparts in Roanoke that a package containing 2 kilograms of ketamine, a sedative used as a date-rape drug, was in the mail and on its way to a Martinsville house.

The agents arrested the package's recipient, Reed, who told them the house was owned by Henry Sgt. James Alden Vaught. Reed said he paid Vaught in cash and ketamine to use the residence as a drug drop, and that he had helped the officer sell 2 kilograms of cocaine that had been seized from drug dealers, according to the federal indictment handed up Oct. 31.

When agents confronted Vaught, he confirmed Reed's story and implicated other officers, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant Jr. said in court yesterday. Vaught, who resigned shortly after Reed's arrest, agreed to wear a wire and captured more than 100 hours of conversation with 25 people. Among those secretly recorded was Cassell, who allegedly was taped offering to co-sign a loan for Vaught to help him launder $10,000 in drug money.

Cassell, 68, is charged with two counts of obstructing justice, money laundering, making a false statement and misprision, or unprofessional conduct.

Bondurant said Cassell knew of drug dealing within his department, and "he chose not to act."

Also yesterday, three of the indicted officers pleaded not guilty to taking part in the alleged racketeering scheme. Vaught, appearing without an attorney, told U.S. District Judge James C. Turk that he plans to plead guilty.

Henry Co. Civilian Pleads Guilty The Man Had Accepted A Drug Delivery That Prompted Agents To Investigate The Sheriff's Office. (RT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, November 28, 2006

A civilian who helped the feds build a case against members of the Henry County Sheriff's Office pleaded guilty to reduced charges on Monday, and a former sergeant who also cooperated is expected to follow suit.

William Randall Reed, 35, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering in exchange for dismissal of five other charges.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents conducted an undercover delivery of ketamine, a date rape drug, at a Henry County residence in March 2005.

According to court records, Reed's acceptance of the package served as the springboard for the investigation, which eventually resulted in the indictment of former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell, 12 current and former deputies and seven civilians.

Reed directed agents to James Alden Vaught, then a sergeant with the sheriff's office and the owner of the house where the ketamine was delivered. Reed had paid Vaught in cash and ketamine to use the house as a drop, officials say.

Reed also told investigators he had helped Vaught get rid of two kilograms of cocaine the sergeant had seized in a raid in 2001.

Vaught resigned from the department and agreed to wear a wire, eventually helping to record at least 100 tapes worth of conversations with two dozen people, according to prosecutor Tom Bondurant.

Bondurant said officials eventually learned that deputies were falsifying destruction orders for drugs, then selling them in the community. Other deputies are accused of buying steroids and distributing them, and Cassell is accused of obstructing the federal investigation, officials say.

Bondurant said Vaught has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering, but Vaught's attorney was ill and could not be there for a guilty plea hearing.

However, Vaught has already signed the agreement, which indicates that a second conspiracy charge against him will be dropped.

Vaught and Reed each face up to 20 years in prison, but the U.S. Attorney's Office will request reduced sentences for both men if they continue to cooperate, records show.

That means if co-defendants go to trial, Reed and Vaught may be expected to testify against them, Bondurant said.

Reed also is in trouble in Pennsylvania, where he already pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy charge in Philadelphia that is also related to shipments of ketamine. None of the 16 other defendants in that case is linked to the Henry County case, Bondurant said.

Attorney Mark Cedrone, who is representing Reed in Pennsylvania, said his client may be sentenced at once for both cases, but that "requires a lot of hoops to jump through."

Both men are free on bond pending their sentencings.

Also on Monday, Cassell and nine other defendants, including his second in command, Maj. James Keaton, were arraigned on their charges and pleaded not guilty.

Bondurant said he expected the remaining defendants to be arraigned this week and plead not guilty to their charges.

No trial date has been set in the case.

Cassell, Others, Plead Not Guilty (MB)

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, November 27, 2006

Former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell pleaded not guilty today in Roanoke to allegations that he looked the other way while officers in his department engaged in alleged illegal activities.

Cassell, along with 12 former and current members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a 50-page, 48-count federal indictment that includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges.

Cassell faces five counts alleging his participation in a money laundering scheme, obstruction of justice, false statement to a federal agency and misprison (failing to tell law enforcement of a felony).

Attending the hearing with his wife, Margaret, and defense attorneys, the former sheriff spoke briefly, stating his full name, address and birth date during the arraignment hearing.

“Not guilty,” Cassell replied when asked for his plea.

Former major James Keaton and deputies Steven Preston and Walter Hairston also entered pleas of not guilty for their alleged involvement.

James Vaught, a former sergeant with the sheriff' office, has filed a plea agreement in which he will plead guilty to racketeering conspiracy, but on Monday, he entered a not guilty plea because his attorney is hospitalized and unable to attend the hearing.

William Randall “Randy” Reed, one of seven individuals charged in the indictment, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy in a plea agreement which calls for the dismissal of other charges.

The matter is continued until late-January or early February, when the court will consider motions related to the case.

If convicted, Cassell could face 53 years in jail and/or a $1.25 million fine.

Court Expands Protections For Medical Marijuana Users (LAT)

By Maura Dolan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — People charged with transporting marijuana may avoid conviction if they can show that the drug was for their personal medical use, the California Supreme Court ruled Monday.

In a 6-1 decision, the state high court said California's medical marijuana law protects patients who transport even relatively large quantities of the drug if they can show that the amount was consistent with their medical needs and recommended by a licensed physician.

The court interpreted a 2004 law passed by the Legislature to address uncertainties that followed voter passage of the Compassionate Use Act of 1996. The attorney general's office said the ruling would affect a handful of cases.

Monday's decision "expands the defenses that can be used for medical marijuana," including transportation and possession for sale, said Maureen J. Shanahan, who represented the defendant in the case.

Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, said prosecutors had hoped the court would make it more difficult for marijuana sellers to use a medical defense but said the court's clarification of the law was helpful.

DOJ_NMG_0098870

The court reached its decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, who was arrested in Huntington Beach in 2001 while carrying more than a pound of marijuana in his truck. The stash included several small baggies, two large bags and an electronic scale.

Wright was charged with possessing marijuana for sale and with transporting it.

Wright had asked that jurors be instructed that he did not commit a crime if they determined the marijuana was recommended by a doctor. A physician testified that he had recommended Wright use marijuana to alleviate pain, abdominal problems and emotional stress.

The doctor said Wright preferred eating marijuana, which requires a larger amount to get the same effect as smoking it. The doctor said Wright needed a pound of marijuana every two to three months.

The trial judge ruled that the medical marijuana law passed by voters did not apply because the amount was too large and Wright was transporting it. But the judge permitted Wright to present evidence of medical use to rebut the possession for sale charge.

Wright was convicted of transportation and possession for sale. An appeals court overturned the conviction on the grounds that the jury should have been given a medical marijuana instruction.

The California Supreme Court agreed that Wright was entitled to such an instruction but refused to overturn the conviction. The court said the judge's error was "harmless" because the jury had the option of convicting Wright only of possession, a misdemeanor. Instead, the jury "found beyond a reasonable doubt that he possessed the drug with the specific intent to sell it," wrote Justice Carlos Moreno for the majority.

Justice Marvin Baxter wrote separately, saying he agreed that Wright's conviction should stand but disagreed that Wright was entitled to a medical marijuana defense.

"The overwhelming evidence that defendant possessed the marijuana with the intent of selling it precluded a reasonable doubt as to its personal medical purpose," Baxter wrote. "This evidence prominently included the electronic scale, the presence of which the defendant never explained."

COURT ALLOWS PROTECTIONS FOR PATIENTS TRANSPORTING POT (BCN)

Bay City News Wire, November 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (BCN) -- The California Supreme Court ruled today that legal protections for patients who transport medical marijuana apply retroactively to cases that were underway by 2003.

The ruling, issued in San Francisco, concerns a 2003 state law that clarified California's medical marijuana law, which was passed by state voters in 1996 as the Compassionate Use Act.

The Compassionate Use Act protects seriously ill patients from being prosecuted in state court for using marijuana when they have a doctor's approval.

The protections apply only to state court prosecutions and not to criminal prosecutions in federal court. Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law.

The later law, passed by the California Legislature in 2003 and entitled the Medical Marijuana Program, was intended to clarify the Compassionate Use Act and address some additional issues.

Among other provisions, it extended similar legal protections to medical marijuana patients who transport the drug. It also established a program for issuing identification cards to qualified patients.

The case before the state high court was an appeal by Shaun Wright, a Huntington Beach man who was convicted in Orange County Superior Court of transporting marijuana and possessing it for sale. Wright was sentenced to a year in jail and released on probation after six months.

He was arrested in 2001 after police received a tip that his pickup truck at a car wash "reeked of marijuana." Police found one pound and three ounces of marijuana along with a scale.

Wright said he needed the marijuana to alleviate chronic pain from a bicycle accident and stomach problems from a parasite.

DOJ_NMG_0098871

He argued in his appeal that the jury should have been instructed that transporting marijuana for his personal medical use could be a defense against a criminal charge of transporting marijuana.

The state high court agreed that the 2003 law applied to his case because his appeal was pending at when the law was passed.

Justice Carlos Moreno wrote, "We agree that the Medical Marijuana Program applies retroactively to cases pending at the time of its enactment and, therefore, to the present case."

But the court said Wright's conviction didn't need to be automatically overturned. It said the jury's finding that he possessed marijuana with the intent to sell had by implication rejected his claim that he was transporting the marijuana for his personal medical use.

The panel sent the case back to Orange County Superior Court for further proceedings on Wright's claims that there were also other errors in jury instructions.

Man's Conviction Upheld In Medical Marijuana Case (CBS2)

CBS 2, November 28, 2006

(CBS) SANTA ANA An Orange County man's felony conviction for transporting marijuana was upheld Monday by the California Supreme Court despite its ruling that later law allowing a medical marijuana defense for transportation applies retroactively.

The decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, 43, resolves an important question regarding the Medical Marijuana Program, legislation adopted in 2004 to promote the implementation of Proposition 215 that in 1996 legalized marijuana for medicinal use, Nathan Barankin of the state Attorney General's office said.

That question, Barankin said, is whether the law applies retroactively "and it does resolve that issue for state law purposes."

However, it only affects a handful of cases that were brought before the 2004 law took affect and are still "open," or under appeal, Barankin said.

Wright, who was found with more than a pound of marijuana in his truck during a search by Huntington Beach police on Sept. 20, 2001, was not allowed to raise a medical marijuana defense.

A doctor testified that he had prescribed the drug for Wright, and Wright testified that he took the drug for a shoulder injury that prevented him from working as a carpenter, and abdominal pain from a stomach parasite.

Wright testified that he began using marijuana for his medical condition in 1991.

The prosecution argued that the amount of marijuana recovered in the truck indicated more than enough for personal use, that it was broken up into separate packages and that Wright had an electronic scale, which he never explained.

The defense argued that Wright needed higher amounts of marijuana because he ate it rather than smoked it and that it was broken up into packages by potency for different uses.

The Supreme Court found that the jury deciding Wright's case should have been allowed to consider a medical marijuana defense, but that the error was "harmless," meaning it would not have affected the jury's decision.

The court found that the jury had been given the option of convicting Wright of the lesser crime of simple marijuana possession, but convicted him of possessing marijuana for sale and transporting marijuana.

"In such cases the issue should not be deemed to have been removed from the jury's consideration since it has been resolved in another context, and there can be no prejudice to the defendant since the evidence that would support a finding that only the lesser offense was committed has been rejected by the jury," the decision stated.

Barankin said that the justices "said that even if he was given the opportunity to assert (the medical marijuana) defense, the jury's conviction would not have changed."

The decision sends the case back to the Court of Appeal, where other issues raised by Wright could result in the conviction being overturned, his attorney Maureen Shanahan said.

Wright was sentenced to a year in county jail and placed on three years formal probation, Shanahan said.

Barankin said he did not anticipate the conviction would be overturned. "In our view, this was the strongest legal argument he had to make," Barankin said.

Shanahan said the appellate court decision in the Wright decision also found that the 2004 legislation was retroactive, but a different circuit found the opposite.

"That was the reason the court took our case," she said. Barankin said the state Supreme Court "saw the case as an opportunity to clarify the law on the application of medical marijuana defenses."

Medical Marijuana: Dopey Decision (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 28, 2006

The Washington Supreme Court, for hardly the first time in judicial history, has rendered a ruling that is at the same time legally correct and morally wrong.

Yes, as the court ruled Thursday, state law enacted by the 1998 passage of Initiative 692 does require that anyone mounting a "compassionate use" defense in a marijuana-related crime must meet specific criteria.

And, yes, Sharon Lee Tracy failed that test. The California doctor who approved her use of medical marijuana was not licensed in Washington and thus doesn't meet the I-692 standard.

The 6-3 majority also rejected Tracy's attempt at a Constitution-based defense, in part because she failed to produce a copy of her California medical marijuana card. "It appears," the court says, "that the card was never returned to her after the police seized it at the time of the original search." She couldn't make her case because the cops never gave her property back?

"While we are not without sympathy," Justice Tom Chambers intoned for the majority, "it is Tracy's responsibility as a petitioner to provide an adequate record for appellate review. ..."

Tracy "suffers from a hip deformity, migraine headaches, a series of eight corrective surgeries following a ruptured colon and bowel condition and has been disabled since 1998." But Skamania County insisted on prosecuting her for marijuana?

Where the cops and courts failed, lawmakers can succeed, by rewriting the law to recognize medical marijuana prescriptions from any licensed physician.

Warning Issued On Dangers Of Methadone (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Filed at 10:44 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- People starting treatment with methadone have died and suffered life-threatening side effects, health officials said Monday in warning of the dangers of overdosing on the painkiller.

Overdoses of the increasingly popular narcotic can cause slow or shallow breathing and dangerous changes in heart beat that patients might not feel, the Food and Drug Administration said.

Those side effects, including reports of deaths, have been seen in patients starting methadone treatment for severe pain or who switched to the drug after using other strong narcotic pain relievers, the FDA said in a public health advisory.

The FDA warned that methadone only provides pain relief for four to eight hours, but can linger in the body for eight to 59 hours. That can lead patients to take more of the drug before it has been eliminated by the body, causing the drug to build up in the body to toxic levels, the FDA said.

Doctors should prescribe methadone carefully and closely monitor patients on the drug, the FDA said. Doctors also should thoroughly instruct patients how to take the painkiller, warning them not to take more than prescribed without first checking with the doctor, the agency added.

Methadone use is rising, especially for the treatment of pain, with more than 2 million prescription dispensed in 2003, according to the FDA. Increased reports of deaths and serious injuries have accompanied that greater use.

In 2003, methadone was listed as a cause of 2,452 unintentional poisoning deaths in the U.S., up from 623 in 1999, according to the National Center for Health Statistics.

The FDA also said it updated the label for the methadone product Dolophine to include new dosing and other information.

A spokesman for Boehringer Ingelheim Pharmaceuticals Inc., whose Roxane Laboratories subsidiary makes Dolophine, did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Methadone is similar to morphine and is most widely used to treat severe pain. The drug also is used in the treatment of heroin addiction.

FDA Warns Methadone Users Of Serious Side Effects,Overdose (DOW)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has issued a health advisory for methadone after it reviewed reports of death and life-threatening side effects in patients taking the pain drug, the agency said Monday.

Methadone, marketed as Dolophine, is a narcotic pain medicine similar to morphine. Often, the drug is given to addicts who are trying to break their heroin habit.

According to the advisory, posted on the FDA's Web site, methadone can cause slow or shallow breathing and "dangerous changes in heart beat that may not be felt by the patient." In addition, accidental overdose could happen because the substance stays in the body for more than eight hours, when pain relief from a dose lasts about four to eight hours.

For those reasons, patients should take methadone exactly as prescribed, shouldn't start other medicines or dietary supplements without supervision and should be aware of overdose signs, the agency said.

Dolophine is marketed by Boehringer Ingelheim Corp.'s subsidiary Roxane Laboratories Inc.

A company representative wasn't immediately available to comment.

War On Drugs Strengthens Afghan Mafia (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

Afghanistan's war on drugs has been marred by corruption that has strengthened the grip of an increasingly powerful mafia on the country's narcotics trade, a report by the World Bank and United Nations said.

Over the past five years, the British-led counter-narcotics strategy had penalised the country's poorest farmers and strengthened networks of organised crime, consolidating the trade among a tiny elite of traffickers, the damning report said.

"Around 25 to 30 key traffickers, the majority of them based in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

Afghanistan's interior ministry, which oversees the police, had been "captured" by powerful traffickers and was used to facilitate the drugs trade.

"Those driving the drug industry must be brought to justice and officials who support it sacked," said Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the UN Office of Drugs and Crime.

"Interdiction efforts especially need to target high-level profiteers whose wealth magnifies their potential for corrupting the state," the report said.

Strategies aimed at short-term reductions in opium production in the worst affected areas could do more harm than good, fuelling "discontent and strengthening the insurgency in the volatile south of the country".

Far from leading to sustained declines in total national cultivation, a successful reduction in one province often led to increases elsewhere, or cultivation in the province itself rebounded the following year, such as in Helmand province after 2003.

To achieve long-term success in the battle against drugs eradication, the report found that efforts should be concentrated in the six Afghan provinces where there was relatively little opium cultivation to build up a line of defence against the spread of the trade. "Rural development programmes are needed throughout the country and should not be focused primarily on opium areas, to help prevent cultivation from further spreading," said Alastair McKechnie, World Bank country director for Afghanistan.

Efforts to eradicate opium crops had strengthened corruption by giving police an opportunity to collect bribes, which hit hardest the poor farmers and labourers who could not afford to pay off authorities.

"Wealthier opium producers pay bribes to avoid having their crops eradicated, greatly reducing the effectiveness of counter-narcotics measures and gravely undermining the credibility of the government and its local representatives," the report said.

Afghanistan produced a record opium harvest in 2006, with total cultivation increasing by 59 per cent and production by 49 per cent. The bulk of opium growth this year was concentrated in Helmand and a few other highly insecure and insurgency-ridden provinces in the south.

Even in this record year, opium took up less than 4 per cent of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, with only an estimated 13 per cent of the population involved in poppy cultivation, which the report said was cause for hope.

UK Troops At Risk Over Plan To Stop Afghan Opium Crop (FT)

By Jimmy Burns In London And Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

Afghan government plans to eradicate poppy farming in southern Afghanistan risk drawing British troops into fierce fighting with an already embittered localpopulation, military officials and diplomats in the country have warned.

The governor of Helmand has promised to push ahead with a drug eradication programme early in the new year in the southern province where British troops faced unexpectedly fierce battles during the summer.

Local farmers have this month begun to plant for a new opium harvest as fears grow that the Taliban may exploit tensions developing between Nato and the local drugs barons and the farmers who work for them.

Brigadier Jerry Thomas, the UK's Camp Bastion commander, told the Financial Times that while he had the troops he needed in the Task Force's southern base, the drug eradication programme risked putting new strains on security.

"It is important that the programme is carefully targeted at the needy not the greedy . . . it will be a challenge to our hearts and minds campaign," he said.

Helmand province, where the bulk of Britain's 5,200 troops are based, saw a 162 per cent increase in the area used to cultivate opium poppy last year as a result of local officials profiting from the trade and efforts by insurgents to encourage opium cultivation.

A US official said this year's opium harvest inHelmand could be almost as large as last year and, without successful eradicationof the crop, international funding for future counter-narcotics efforts could be in doubt.

"The military is very focused on stability, but we have to look at the benefits of having some eradication when up to one-third of the UK's heroin comes fromHelmand province," said a western official in Kabul.

"Could anyone justify going to the Afghan government and asking to have no eradication In Helmand? It would look very suspicious."

Helmand has been relatively quiet since British troops withdrew from Musa Qala, a district in the north of the province, in late September, but eradication of the crop that many Afghan farmers depend on for their livelihood could reignite tensions.

The onset of colder weather has failed to reduce the violence in the country's restive south. A suicide bomber blew himself up at a crowded restaurant in south-eastern Patika province, killing 15 people and injuring24 yesterday. Separately, one Nato soldier and an estimated 57 insurgents were killed in fighting in four areas of southern Afghanistan at the weekend.

The destruction of poppy crops would centre on the districts of Nad Ali, Nawa and Nari Seraj, along the Helmand River and not far from the provincial capital of Lashkar Gah, whichBritish troops are hopingto use as a showcase forreconstruction and development.

Major Luke Knittig, a Nato spokesman, said that troops from the Nato-led Inter-national Security Assistance Force would assist the government with the eradication programme. But he cautioned: "You will not see Isaf troops in the fields lopping off the tops of poppies."

Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, November 28, 2006

U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank.

The report, released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades.

The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops.

Opium has remained the nation's most lucrative crop by far, and drug traffickers — through incentives and intimidation — have kept farmers in the opium business across Afghanistan, which the United Nations says produces about 87% of the world's opium. Last year, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, Afghanistan produced 4,100 metric tons of opium, nearly as much as the biggest harvest in 1999. The United Nations predicts a record harvest in 2007.

Today's report describes how opium farmers' flexibility has helped harvests increase. When government officials end the opium trade in one province, opium brokers typically move cultivation and trade elsewhere, the report says.

Counter-narcotics efforts also have fueled corruption, the report says. Farmers who can afford it have bribed local officials to preserve opium crops, while the poorest farmers have been driven deeper into debt when their crops are destroyed, the report says. Investigators found several instances in which farmers planned to replant opium to pay their debts.

The report also says local government officials sometimes help drug lords drive competitors out of the market in exchange for a cut of the profits or protection payments.

Antonio Maria Costa of the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime has recommended focusing agents on areas with less opium cultivation to keep such farming from spreading and help establish an alternative economy. The U.S. State Department's Anne Patterson, acknowledging "there is no silver bullet" to the opium problem, has said much of the growth in production is in areas with weak local governments.

Mo. Group Home Fire Kills 10, Injures 24 (AP)

By Marcus Kabel, The Associated Press

AP, November 28, 2006

ANDERSON, Mo. -- An early morning fire broke out in a group home for the elderly and mentally ill Monday, killing 10 people and injuring two dozen others in a blaze that the governor said was being treated as a crime.

The blaze reduced the privately run Anderson Guest House to a skeleton of cinder blocks and stunned this rural community of about 1,800 people tucked in the Ozark hills of southwest Missouri.

Gov. Matt Blunt said investigators were treating the fire as suspicious.

"We're not saying it is definitely a crime scene, but we are treating it as if it is and trying to determine if the fire was set by somebody who had a nefarious motive," Blunt said.

The home had 32 residents and two employees inside when the fire was reported around 1 a.m. The dead ranged in age from early 20s to elderly. Another 18 people were taken to hospitals, and six were treated at the scene, authorities said.

One of the dead was a worker in the home, and the other nine were residents, Blunt said. Authorities did not plan to release names until Tuesday because relatives of two victims haven't yet been notified.

Officials refused to say how the victims died or whether they had any warning. The home had fire alarms but no sprinklers.

One person was in serious condition at Joplin Hospital. All the other survivors who went to area hospitals were either in good or fair condition, or had been treated and released.

The home is a residential care center licensed by the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services. The facility also has a license from the state Department of Mental Health that allowed mentally ill residents to live at the home and receive treatment elsewhere.

Asked whether two staff members were enough to look after 32 residents, Blunt said that was up to state health officials.

"Again, it was late at night," the governor said. "That would impact to some degree the amount of care that is necessary."

Neighbor Steven Spears, 47, saw the blaze erupt through security cameras posted outside his home.

"I saw the front door blow open with fire," Spears said. "I know most of them (the residents). I've talked to all of them at one time or another. It still hasn't hit me."

The home is operated by Joplin River of Life Ministries Inc. Robert Dupont, its executive director, issued a statement expressing sadness and saying all displaced residents were being cared for with the help of local agencies.

"This is a very tragic situation that has saddened all of us at Joplin River of Life Ministries," he said.

At the company's offices in Joplin, investigators interviewed Dupont and group home residents, including some survivors.

Dupont, 61, was convicted of conspiracy to commit fraud in 2003 and sentenced to 21 months in prison for taking part in a scheme to bilk the federal Medicare program by steering patients from group homes he owned _ including the one in Anderson _ to hand-picked doctors, according to federal records. Those doctors, in exchange, falsely certified that the patients needed home health services from two companies Dupont owned or co-owned.

Repeated attempts seeking comment from Dupont on Monday, including a visit to his home, were unsuccessful.

Authorities were trying to determine whether the blaze was linked to a smaller fire at the facility Saturday morning, said Assistant Fire Marshal Greg Carrell. No one was injured in that fire, which was still under investigation when the second blaze began.

Inspectors from the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services, which licenses the facility, cited it in March for several health code violations pertaining to food storage and preparation, as well as for allowing a resident to take more than the prescribed dose of an inhaler and not requesting criminal background checks for new employees as quickly as required by law. But none were related to fire safety.

But two other group homes the company operates were cited for fire-code violations in 2003. Fire equipment in one Joplin-based home was found to have been intentionally disabled, records show. Another facility in nearby Carthage was cited for failing to undergo an annual fire inspection and to ensure staff members could unlock rooms from the outside in case of emergency, the Joplin Globe reported.

Monday's blaze was one of the worst fires at a health care facility since 2003, when a patient suffering from dementia and multiple sclerosis, set fire to her bed and burned down a care center in Hartford, Conn., killing 16 residents. Six months later, in September 2003, a fire killed 15 patients in Nashville, Tenn.

Recently, the federal agency that oversees the safety of nursing homes asked for comments about a proposal to require all nursing homes to have comprehensive sprinkler systems. The rule would not address group homes like the one in Anderson because such facilities are not subject to the same federal oversight.

U.S. Marshals Service To Help Track Sex Offenders (AP)

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) The federal government will soon get involved in tracking down sex offenders in Maine who avoid registering with police.

The U.S. Marshals Service in Maine is being trained in the new responsibilities as part of a federal sex offender law passed in July, said John Cooper, the chief deputy U.S. marshal for Maine.

The new law creates a national sex offender database to allow law enforcement and communities to know where convicted sex offenders live and work. It gives the Marshals Service the task of tracking down offenders who dodge their obligations.

``We have resources and databases that local agencies don't have," Cooper said.

Maine and other states in recent years have created registries that list people convicted of certain types of sex crimes. The registries are viewed as informational and safety tools for police and the public.

But officials say there are a number of weaknesses in the system.

In Maine, failing to register with local police or the state is a crime, but only a misdemeanor that hasn't been listed on national databases that alert police to people who are wanted in other states.

Police say another weakness in the system is figuring out who should take the lead in searching for a sex offender who fails to register or report to police as required.

The federal law helps by bringing uniformity to what has been a hodgepodge of different state laws and requirements as well as assigning federal agents to track down unregistered offenders.

``One of our biggest concerns is if someone moves from Portland, we don't know where they go," said Portland police Lt. Vern Malloch.

The new law, the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, is named for Adam Walsh, who was kidnapped in 1981 from a Florida mall when he was 6 years old and whose remains were found 100 miles away two weeks later. His father, John Walsh, has been an advocate for child safety legislation and hosts the TV program ``America's Most Wanted."

Cooper said the Marshals Service is suited to the task of finding sex offenders who don't register because of its ability in finding fugitives. The Marshals Service also has lent its expertise to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children to help find at-risk youths.

IMMIGRATION:

Fence Plan Alarms Landowners (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 28, 2006

EAGLE PASS, Texas — Ranching magnate Bill Moody's vast holdings spread across three Texas counties and include 35 miles of frontage along the Rio Grande, where thousands of illegal immigrants and smugglers have crossed from Mexico into the USA. They have worn paths through Moody's pastures, cut his fences and stolen some of his cattle.

From his perch on the front lines of the battle against illegal immigration, Moody would seem to be the type of person who would embrace the federal government's most provocative effort to stop illegals from entering this country: a plan to build 700 miles of fence along the 2,100-mile Southwest border, including Moody's land. Instead, Moody is a powerful voice in a growing alliance of border landowners and local law enforcement officials who oppose a fence.

Most everyone here agrees that more border security is needed to curb illegal immigration. Ranchers such as Moody and Dob Cunningham, who has a 700-acre spread north of here with 2 miles of river frontage, say they often give Border Patrol agents access to their land to help the agents track down illegals.

However, the fence plan — the centerpiece of an immigration bill President Bush signed last month — has come to reflect the disconnect between many landowners here and officials in Washington who see the project as a key part of the nation's strategy to slow illegal immigration. Here, where the impact of illegal immigration is greatest, the fence is widely viewed as an economic and environmental threat. In Eagle Pass, a city of 25,000 that is 95% Hispanic, it's also seen as a rejection of the region's tradition of shared cultures and open ranges.

Like many ranchers and local law enforcement officers, Cunningham believes the U.S. government should focus on hiring more and better-trained Border Patrol agents rather than erecting the proposed double-walled barrier. He fears the fence would deny him access to the Rio Grande's waters that are a lifeline for his cattle and for the migrating wildlife sought by hunters who lease parts of his ranch.

Cunningham also isn't happy about the possibility of having to give up a strip of his land along the river to the U.S. government for fence construction. “We'll fight it tooth and nail,” he says, including filing lawsuits to stop the fence, if necessary. “This might work west of El Paso, where there is nothing but sand and hills. Not here.”

Moody, whose land was a backdrop for the film version of the cowboy saga Lonesome Dove, says there are enough fences here, and that the boundary between the USA and Mexico should remain natural: “The River,” as he calls it.

The bill Bush signed does not include money to build the fence, and it's unclear how aggressively Congress will pursue the multibillion-dollar project once Democrats assume leadership of the House and Senate in January.

Supporters of the plan, including Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., say the success of a fence along 10 miles of the border south of San Diego suggests that fences at other heavily traveled crossings would help curb illegal immigration.

Hunter says the government will develop plans to preserve border landowners' access to water. As for the potential condemnation of property, he says the "overwhelming" need for a secure border should outweigh other concerns. Russ Knocke of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) says landowners and law enforcement officials "will be key partners in the effort to secure the border."

Matt Brockman, executive vice president of the 14,000-member Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers Association, says economic and environmental questions — notably landowners' concerns about access to the Rio Grande — should be enough to stop the project.

"I don't think it's as easy as slapping up a fence," Brockman says. "It's alarming to us. We could be talking about hundreds of thousands of acres that could be condemned" for construction.

As the fence plan made its way through Congress, law enforcement officials here were dubious.

Maverick County Sheriff Tomas Herrera and Val Verde County Sheriff D'Wayne Jernigan say they constantly are seeking more money to protect residents from crimes involving illegal immigrants, including burglaries, vandalism and cattle thefts. However, Jernigan says skepticism about the fence planned for parts of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas is such that local officials have not discussed it.

"Trust me, it's not gonna happen," Jernigan says. "There's not gonna be a fence. I have landowners here who put it this way: 'Over my dead body.' "

There are about 12,500 Border Patrol agents in the USA, up from 9,000 before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Bush has vowed to boost the number of agents to 18,000 before he leaves office in January 2009. All but slightly more than 1,000 of the current agents are deployed along the Southwestern border, according to DHS.

As the number of agents patrolling the border has increased, the number of illegal immigrants arrested has declined. The DHS has said that is an indication that the increased security discourages people from trying to enter the USA illegally. DHS reported nearly 1.1 million arrests at U.S. borders in the budget year that ended in September, down from nearly 1.2 million the previous year. About 98% of the arrests occurred along the U.S.-Mexican border.

The use of National Guard troops to beef up border security, along with increased efforts to deport illegal immigrants from nations other than Mexico, have been key factors in reducing border arrests, Knocke says. Even so, the flow of illegals into the USA continues.

Cunningham says that in recent years, thieves cutting through his land have stolen ranch equipment and threatened his neighbors. Some have returned to Mexico with a few of his cows.

"I feel like Sam's Wholesale Club," says the 72-year-old retired Border Patrol agent, flashing a smile under his frayed cowboy hat. "I live with this all the time."

However, it hasn't been enough to make Cunningham support building a fence along the Rio Grande. He says increasingly aggressive patrols and better use of technology — not a fence — are keys to improving security.

Cunningham notes that he has allowed the Border Patrol to place a security camera tower atop a scenic peak on his property that overlooks the Rio Grande. He says the camera gives agents a broad view of what federal authorities have designated as a prime corridor for smuggling illegals and drugs.

Maverick County Sheriff Herrera agrees with Cunningham. He says there is recent evidence indicating that boosting law enforcement officers' presence along the border deters illegal immigration more efficiently than would a costly fence.

Since two state-funded border-crime initiatives were launched last December, Herrera says, Maverick County has seen a 65% decline in burglaries linked to illegal immigrants. The programs, launched with grants of more than $360,000 to each of Texas' 16 border counties, allowed Herrera in Eagle Pass to pay overtime costs to double the number of sheriff's deputies on each shift, from six to 12.

State troopers and agents from the Texas Department of Parks and Wildlife patrolled the region as well. Herrera says the operations provided a "second line of defense" that allowed the Border Patrol to focus directly on the border.

Herrera believes the increased law enforcement presence contributed to a drop in arrests of illegals in the 55 miles between Del Rio, Texas, and Eagle Pass. Arrests there fell from 68,506 in 2005 to 42,636 this year, U.S. Customs and Border Protection reports.

"Boots on the ground will do the work," Herrera says.

Hunter offers his own set of numbers that he says boosts the argument for a fence.

Before construction of a 10-mile stretch of fence between San Diego and Tijuana, Mexico, in 1994, authorities caught more than 500,000 illegals there each year. The number dropped to about 100,000 by 2002 before ticking upward recently, Border Patrol spokeswoman Wendi Lee says. Meanwhile, violent crimes linked to illegals, including murders, robberies and assaults, fell 46% in the San Diego area after the fence was built, she says.

"The fence brought order to an extremely dangerous border," Hunter says. Before the fence, he says, there was "lots of fear." Now, "people don't have to worry about smugglers coming through."

Some smugglers, however, have begun using more isolated crossings in the Southwestern desert, where hundreds of illegals have died in summertime heat, says Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network, an immigrant rights group in Arizona. More than 200 illegals have died crossing the southern Arizona desert since October 2005, the group says.

"The unintended consequence of the border-security buildup has been to strengthen the smuggling groups" that use more desolate and dangerous routes to elude border agents, Allen says.

In the legislation authorizing the new fence, Hunter says he identified "primary smuggling corridors" to be barricaded, including stretches between Del Rio and Eagle Pass and Laredo to Brownsville. Hunter believes that many landowners and other critics of the fence eventually will adopt the view of Ernie Davis, who operates a 30,000-acre ranch 50 miles northwest of Laredo.

Davis says parts of his land, about 20 miles inland from the Rio Grande, have been plundered by illegal immigrants, drug traffickers and thieves. In the past two years, five vehicles have been stolen from the ranch, Davis says, and burglars often have targeted his home.

"I'm for anything that would limit the illegal border crossings," Davis says. "I would support (Hunter) on this fence, with the idea that it would help control this thing."

However, Davis acknowledges that the issues are different for ranchers with land along the river. "If I had river frontage, I would be concerned. There's not an easy answer to any of this."

The worn fairways of the Eagle Pass Golf Course, about 100 yards across the Rio Grande from Piedras Negras, Mexico, have become a well-traveled gateway to the USA. Night and day, illegals emerge from the river's murky water and dash across the course, sometimes interrupting play.

"You see ladies with kids running right across the fairway," says David Chisum, who manages the nine-hole course. He acknowledges that most people might assume he would want a fence here, if for no other reason than to protect the course's 115 members or speed the pace of golfers' play. However, Chisum reflects many residents' pragmatism when it comes to the thorny issue of illegal immigration.

"We really haven't had any major damage here," he says, except perhaps for the thefts of a few flags that can be seen whipping in the wind from some porches in Piedras Negras. Chisum says most of those who play the course understand the peculiar hazards here.

"I don't think a fence would help us," he says. "I like seeing the river. People here understand that sometimes you just have to wait and allow people to cross before you hit."

Cintas Warned Against Firing Immigrant Force (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

A Mississippi Democrat in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee has warned the nation's largest uniform supplier it faces criminal charges if it follows a White House proposal to recheck workers with mismatched Social Security numbers and fire those who cannot resolve the discrepancy in 60 days.

Rep. Bennie Thompson said in a letter to Cintas Corp. it could be charged with "illegal activities in violation of state and federal law" if any of its 32,000 employees are terminated because they gave incorrect Social Security numbers to be hired.

"I am deeply troubled by Cintas' recent policy change regarding the Social Security Administration's 'no match' letters," Mr. Thompson said in the Nov. 2 letter. "It is my understanding that hundreds of Cintas' immigrant workers have received these letters. I am extremely concerned about any potentially discriminatory actions targeting this community."

In June, President Bush proposed new guidelines concerning "no-match" letters from the Social Security Administration, saying he wanted to make it easier for employers to verify workers' eligibility and continue to hold them accountable for those they hire.

The Department of Homeland Security followed up on that announcement yesterday, formally releasing new regulations to help businesses comply with hiring requirements intended to reduce the hiring of illegal aliens -- including setting guidelines for businesses when handling "no-match" letters from the Social Security Administration.

The proposed regulation is subject to a 60-day public comment period.

"Most businesses want to do the right thing when it comes to employing legal workers," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. "These new regulations will give U.S. businesses the necessary tools to increase the likelihood that they are employing workers consistent with our laws.

"They also help us to identify and prosecute employers who are blatantly abusing our immigration system."

But Mr. Thompson called the "no-match" letters a threat to workers who fail to reverify their information and called Cintas' actions a "rash enactment of a proposed DHS regulation." He said that by implementing "this incomplete regulation," Cintas could be in violation of federal immigration law.

The seven-term congressman also said before the proposal becomes law, it must go through a rule-making process, "which could radically change the regulation or kill it all together."

Cintas has issued letters to 400 employees in five states telling them they will be indefinitely suspended if they cannot resolve their mismatched Social Security number within 60 days.

"Cintas, like all employers, has a legal obligation to ensure all employees are legally authorized to work in the U.S.," the firm said in a statement. "Cintas has not terminated any employees due to the Social Security mismatches and plans to continue its policy of placing these employees on indefinite leave until they produce the required documentation."

In his letter, Mr. Thompson said his "apprehension" over the proposed policy was echoed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which said the proposal could result in "circumstances in which employers have incentives to take actions that violate ... non-discriminatory provisions."

As Homeland Security Committee chairman, he would set the panel's agenda. Earlier this month, he also said Democrats planned to "revisit" legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan.

Under existing rules, when a Social Security number does not match a name on a tax or employment eligibility document, the government sends a "no-match" letter asking that the discrepancy be resolved. Of 250 million wage reports the government receives each year, as many as 10 percent belong to employees whose names do not match their Social Security numbers.

"Identifying businesses that are habitually flagged for submitting mismatched Social Security numbers would bolster our worksite enforcement efforts," Mr. Chertoff said.

Speed Bump At The Border (NYT)

Washington

Democrats preparing to take over Congress appear to have a perfect issue for the party of the left: the rich are getting richer, but sizable productivity gains and rising corporate profits are not paying off for the working and middle classes. All boats are not rising with the tide.

The picture is a paint-by-the-numbers portrait of the greedy picking the pockets of the needy. The villains are C.E.O.s, investment bankers and corporate managers who refuse to pass on profits in the form of higher wages. The victims are workers who struggle to deal with an increasingly unreliable and, for many, unrewarding marketplace — producing more while under the constant threat of job, health care and pension loss.

The success of candidates attacking outsourcing and trade agreements like Nafta, combined with high Democratic margins among economically pessimistic voters, clearly point to middle-class wage stagnation and growing inequality as significant factors in the election this month.

Politically, the result has shifted the balance of power within the Democratic Party in favor of the protectionist wing, and especially in favor of such major unions as the Teamsters, the steelworkers and the autoworkers, all key party supporters with money and manpower.

The strengthening of the Democrats' protectionist wing is virtually certain to force to the surface a second, and closely related, internal conflict between the party's pro- and anti-immigration wings. This conflict among Democrats remained submerged while President Bush and the Republican House and Senate majorities fought without resolution over the same issue.

"Immigration is a difficult issue for the Democrats; it cuts in complicated ways," says Stephen Ansolabehere, an M.I.T. political scientist who helped conduct an Internet survey of 37,000 voters. The Democratic Party made major gains in the Mountain West, he says, and many of these voters are "populist with a lot of nativism," firmly opposed to the more liberal immigration policies of key party leaders.

A solid block of Democrats who won this month — Jon Tester, James Webb, Sherrod Brown and Heath Shuler included — is inclined to put the brakes on all cross-border activity (otherwise known as globalization): trade, outsourcing and the flow of human labor. Nolan McCarty of Princeton, writing with two colleagues, has provided some empirical data supporting the argument that immigration has led "to policies that increase economic inequality." Significant numbers within the Democratic Party agree with this reasoning.

Globalization "needs to be controlled and slowed down because of the brutal destruction and vast imbalances of wealth it causes," Jeff Faux, a stalwart of the protectionist wing on the Democratic left, writes in Dissent magazine. "The nihilistic vision of the world as an accelerating treadmill of constant insecurity, jobs with longer hours and shorter pay ... the triumph of dog-eat-dog competition ... is a vision of hell."

The protectionist wing will likely hold sway at least in the first few months of the 110th Congress. Over time, however, Faux and his allies are likely to fail. The forces of international competition have proved more powerful than any government, and advocates of aggressive policies to constrain them face a porous, borderless and now highly electronic international economy. Legislation can require American companies to distribute profits to workers, but it will be virtually impossible to enforce as competition razes companies playing by those rules. For the moment, Democratic chances of restoring more equal patterns in the growth of wages are bleak.

Barney Frank, representing members of the House who would like to stake out middle ground, has proposed a "grand bargain." If corporate America agrees to equitable wages, Democrats will back free trade and eased regulations. "What we want to do is to look at public policies that'll get some bigger share of the increased wealth into wages, and in return you'll see Democrats as internationalists," he said.

Even if the deal were cut, the odds are strong that the global economy would prevent American business from keeping its promise. The sooner Democrats realize that they — and, more important, their constituents — are up against a wall, the sooner they will seriously focus their attention on how to climb it.

Biden: Blame Immigration Woes On Mexico (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Filed at 1:12 a.m. ET

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) -- Sen. Joe Biden, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's incoming chairman, wants to get tough with Mexico, calling it an "erstwhile democracy" with a "corrupt system" responsible for illegal immigration and drug problems in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0098882

Biden, D-Del., was in Columbia on Monday in his first postelection trip to this first-in-the-South presidential primary state as he continues to line up support for his presidential bid.

During a question-and-answer session before more than 230 Columbia Rotary Club members, Biden was asked about immigration problems.

Biden, who favors tightening the U.S.-Mexico border with fences, said immigration is driven by money in low-wage Mexico.

"Mexico is a country that is an erstwhile democracy where they have the greatest disparity of wealth," Biden said. "It is one of the wealthiest countries in the hemisphere and because of a corrupt system that exists in Mexico, there is the 1 percent of the population at the top, a very small middle class and the rest is abject poverty."

Unless the political dynamics change in Mexico and U.S. employers who hire illegal immigrants are punished, illegal immigration won't stop. "All the rest is window dressing," he said.

An even bigger problem are illegal drugs "coming up through corrupt Mexico," he said. "People are driving across that border with tons, tons -- hear me -- tons of everything from byproducts for methamphetamines, to cocaine, to heroine."

Covering a variety of topics, Biden kept most of the crowd in their seats for an hour -- twice as long as scheduled.

"I warn all of you, all of you making more than a million bucks -- I hope you all are -- I'm taking away your tax cut," Biden said. "I'm not joking."

The extra revenue would generate $75 billion a year and pay for a backlog in national security and local law enforcement programs, Biden said.

Biden's appeal for bipartisanship captured Bruce Rippeteau, a former Rotary president who says he's in the Genghis Khan wing of the Republican Party.

He "was saying some important things in a nonpolitical way," Rippeteau said.

"I want to compliment him about what he didn't say," Wilson said. "He never one time mentioned weapons of mass destruction."

Biden will lead the Foreign Relations panel because Republicans around the nation lost seats in the Nov. 7 elections. That tide didn't reach Republican-dominated South Carolina, where the GOP maintained its four U.S. House seats and Democrats kept their two.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Gates May Take Pentagon Job In December (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 28, 2006

Robert Gates, the former CIA director who is President Bush's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, is likely to assume the Pentagon post before year's end if he is confirmed by the Senate as expected, officials said Monday.

Eric Ruff, the Pentagon press secretary, said Gates will have his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee early next week, with a vote expected by the full Senate by Dec. 12 or 13. In preparation for the hearing, Gates is receiving a series of briefings by senior Pentagon officials, Ruff said.

Even if Gates is confirmed as expected, it is unclear when he would be sworn in to his new duties, Ruff said.

"It's somewhat of a fluid situation," he said.

Another administration official, who would discuss the Gates matter only on condition of anonymity, said that if confirmation goes as expected, then Gates would be sworn in well before the end of the year. No date is set.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination on Nov. 8.

Ruff said Gates, who is president of Texas A&M University, may have university business to attend to in the days following his confirmation hearing, but it was unclear whether this would delay his swearing in.

There has been speculation that the Pentagon transition would be put off until the end of December in order to give Rumsfeld the distinction of being the longest-serving secretary of defense since the post was created in 1947.

Rumsfeld is the only person to have held the job twice. The first time, he served for 14 months, from Nov. 20, 1975 to Jan. 20, 1977. His current tenure began Jan. 20, 2001. If he were to stay until Dec. 28, his combined tenures would surpass the longevity record held by Robert S. McNamara, who served from Jan. 21, 1961 to Feb. 29, 1968.

Ruff said, however, that the timing of Gates' takeover has nothing to do with the longevity record.

"I can assure you that is not a factor on the secretary's mind," Ruff said.

Long Haul A Radar Unit's Journey Reflects Hopes, Snafus In Missile Defense (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

PEARL HARBOR NAVAL STATION, Hawaii -- Towering over this historic site is a radar precise enough to track a baseball hurtling through space at 15,000 miles an hour. But the vessel carrying the radar has sprung leaks and blown out electrical circuits.

Such mundane problems have kept this vital part of the nation's defense against missile attacks stuck in the wrong harbor. If all had gone according to plan, the $950 million radar rig, known as SBX, would be operating now off the Aleutian Islands in Alaska and ready to defend against threats from North Korea. Instead, after a three-year odyssey from Norway to Texas and around South America, the 28-story-high converted oil platform is in Hawaii, 2,000 miles and months away from its final destination.

The journey of SBX is a microcosm of the Defense Department's unfinished missile shield, a dream since Ronald Reagan's 1983 plan dubbed Star Wars. Under President Bush the U.S. has poured nearly $50 billion into the program. The Pentagon says it has put the system on alert more than 10 times and the U.S. already has a "limited" ability to shoot down enemy warheads. Yet the program's high-tech breakthroughs are at times undermined by technical snafus, and real missile defense always seems off in the future.

One big step forward came in September, when U.S. military personnel using satellite sensors, radar and long-range interceptor missiles that are part of the real missile shield shot down a test warhead in space over the Pacific. The success went some way toward answering critics in Congress who have demanded tests that resemble real-world situations.

For defense contractors and the Pentagon, which is spending $9.3 billion this year on missile defense, the September test was a vindication. "The last 10 months have been extraordinary in terms of accomplishment," says Patrick Shanahan, a vice president at Boeing Co., principal contractor on the system that includes SBX. "I think the program has reached its stride."

Mr. Shanahan was brought in to fix the system in early 2005 after interceptor missiles failed to leave their silos in two consecutive tests. The problems prompted the Pentagon to dock Boeing $107 million in contract fees.

Critics nowadays generally concede the feasibility of knocking missiles out of the sky. But many believe the idea is either too expensive or too error-prone to make it worth rushing into operation.

North Korea's recent moves have lent urgency to the debate. The Communist state tested a long-range missile in July and exploded a nuclear device in October, although its tests showed it has yet to master the technology.

The original Star Wars concept conjured up images of space-based launchers blasting Soviet nuclear missiles out of the sky. Today, that idea is on hold, partly because of concerns about militarizing space. The Bush administration's main missile-defense system has ground sites in Alaska and California, where 13 interceptor missiles stand ready to be fired.

The Boeing system calls for early-warning radar to get a first glimpse of the enemy missile launch. An interceptor missile is then fired. As it flies, this missile is supposed to receive the exact coordinates of the enemy missile and, if all goes well, the two will collide in space. It's the equivalent of hitting a bullet with a bullet.

The system lives or dies on highly accurate radar to pinpoint the attacking missile's trajectory. That's where SBX, or sea based X-band radar, comes in. It's an advanced form of X-band radar, which emits a concentrated high-frequency beam to collect images.

Officials say SBX can not only produce detailed images of incoming warheads but also distinguish a decoy from the real McCoy. The Pentagon hopes to capitalize on SBX's mobility -- it sits on a self-propelled converted oil rig -- to deploy it closer to perceived threats and shave critical minutes off response time. At a top speed of 10 knots, though, SBX would take a while to reach a faraway global hot spot.

The Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency oversees several other missile-defense systems that complement the program led by Boeing. For defense against shorter-range threats, Lockheed Martin Corp. is directing the Aegis system, which fires interceptor missiles from ships. It has done well in tests. A separate Lockheed project to build improved satellites that detect enemy missile launches is emerging from years of performance problems and cost overruns.

The overall goal is "layered defense" -- getting several shots at the enemy projectile before it hits American soil. The Boeing system that was tested in September is the crucial middle layer. It has the broadest time window to succeed, but still only minutes. A missile could complete its journey from North Korea to the U.S. mainland in 20 minutes.

See a video2 of the SBX vessel's enormous radar.

Shrouded in a 10-story-high dome, the SBX radar sits atop the semisubmersible oil rig like a giant golf ball on a tee. The Teflon-coated, Kevlar-like fabric of the inflated dome is designed to withstand winds up to 150 miles an hour. Inside, the radar soars toward the roof, its octagonal face covering 4,100 square feet. It swivels on a circular track and can tilt skyward.

The radar, built by Raytheon Co., contains 45,000 electronic modules that transmit and receive data. SBX's radar can send multiple beams in different directions, changing their aim in fractions of a second. That lets the radar track several objects at once and compensate for the rig's movement in ocean swells.

The Pentagon originally figured it would put X-band radar on land and picked out a site on Shemya Island, a speck of rock at the western tip of the Aleutians. But the radar program stalled during the Clinton administration, which feared that building elements of a national shield would breach the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

In 2001, President Bush pulled the U.S. out of the treaty, and the Pentagon soon began developing the X-band. The Pentagon, following an idea of Raytheon engineer David Greeley, at first chose to put X-band radar at sea merely to collect test data on missile trajectories from different angles. Officials liked the idea so much that they made sea-based radar a permanent part of the system.

Boeing bought a Russian-built rig in Norway in 2003 and towed it to Brownsville, Texas, to install engines and adapt the vessel for the 2,200-ton radar and a crew of 100. Around that time, the Pentagon announced it would base the radar in Adak, in the middle of the Aleutian chain, and set the end of 2005 as the target date for its arrival. SBX would be moored in a sheltered port that doesn't ice over and would be well-located for tracking Asian missile launches.

Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska, a staunch advocate of missile defense, nevertheless questioned the wisdom of having such a valuable sensor floating in the treacherous North Pacific. "I hope your people are nautical enough to know what you're doing," he told Air Force Lt. Gen. Ronald Kadish, then Missile Defense Agency director, at a Senate hearing. The general replied that he had reviewed a century's worth of local wave patterns and had confidence in SBX's naval architects and Boeing.

SBX progressed through the next two years despite mishaps in other parts of Boeing's program. In December 2004, a flawed line of software shut down the test launch of an interceptor missile. Two months later, a mechanical support arm failed to retract, again stranding the interceptor missile in its silo. "This was not rocket science," says Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, who had recently become director of the Missile Defense Agency. Dismayed by the mishaps, Gen. Obering toughened the testing plan and drove a shake-up in program leadership at the Pentagon and Boeing.

By late 2005, it looked as if SBX might come close to meeting its target for arriving in Alaska. After trials in the Gulf of Mexico, it was hauled 15,000 miles around South America -- the rig is too big for the Panama Canal -- and it arrived in Hawaii in January of this year. The trip to Alaska seemed around the corner, but in March, alarms went off in SBX's engine room. A leaky valve caused water to flood into SBX's pontoon. The rig had to return to Pearl Harbor for repairs to the flaw, which an independent panel later called a "major casualty."

Then in June, an electrical fault tripped circuit breakers, forcing SBX back into port for two more weeks of repairs. Such problems are typical during the initial "shakedown" phase of a new class of ship, says Tom Alexiou, Boeing's SBX program manager. Most important, adds Paul Smith, a Boeing radar manager, there haven't been major issues in the "far more complex" task of integrating the radar with other ship systems.

In fact, the radar was performing well enough that the Pentagon diverted SBX from its tests to free it up to monitor North Korea's missile launch in July. Then it delayed SBX's preparations for Alaska again so the radar could participate in a test on Sept. 1, the most important U.S. missile-shield trial to date. In the test, an "enemy" missile with a real warhead fired from Alaska was destroyed by an interceptor missile launched from California.

Floating off the California coast, SBX successfully tracked both missiles and their warheads as they collided, says Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly, who oversees the ground-based missile-defense program. It was a "watershed event," he says, because it shows SBX could do its job once it's hooked up to the missile shield's command structure.

When SBX returned to Pearl Harbor in Hawaii last month after the test, the Missile Defense Agency and Boeing laid out a feast on board: a whole roast pig, Alaskan king crab and Hawaiian chicken lau lau. Outside, the rig and its white-domed radar dwarf the sunken battleship USS Arizona and the USS Missouri at the Pearl Harbor World War II memorial. Government tour guides there already are weaving SBX into the local heroic folklore, recounting feats of the radar's precision alongside older war tales.

SBX will participate in another test in December. Col. John Fellows, the Pentagon's manager for SBX, says staying near Hawaii makes it easier to iron out kinks and join the tests, although officials are eager for the radar's permanent deployment. "We're pressured on both sides," he says.

In any case, further issues must be sorted out before the trip to Alaska. The independent panel hired by the Pentagon concluded in June that while SBX "is an inherently rugged and suitable platform," the vessel needs 47 modifications before it goes into service. Among them: a better plan for operating in harsh winters and steps to ensure the rig is protected against being rammed by boats. Senior program officials call the modifications minor and say they have agreed to almost all of them.

The panel also noted that maintaining morale poses a challenge. SBX's crew is composed mostly of defense-industry employees and merchant mariners hired by Boeing subcontractors. Only a handful of shipmates are servicemen. Civilian mariners rotate only every 56 days, much longer than work cycles for comparable oil-industry jobs. Leisure consists of a gym, a basketball hoop on the deck and movies under the stars, though plasma TVs and more DVDs are on the way.

Funding for SBX's mooring in the Aleutians, previously cut in another headache for project managers, has been restored, but construction won't be finished until next August, says Col. Fellows. The latest projection for the trip to Alaska is some time next year.

Democrats To Receive Bush Budget Warning (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

President Bush will try to work out a deal on spending with the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but will be prepared to veto bills that exceed his total budget or that slice away at defense needs, said Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman.

"With the Democrat leadership, we'll try to be transparent and we'll try to be clear in our concerns upfront, and I hope we can work things out without resorting to a veto. But if necessary we will resort to a veto," Mr. Portman told The Washington Times in an interview about the upcoming budget and the Democratic control of Congress.

Democrats took both houses of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections. Mr. Portman, a former six-term congressman from Ohio, has assumed the role of go-between, making use of his relationships with many of the top lawmakers to find areas of cooperation on annual spending and on thorny issues such as Social Security.

He has spoken with incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate budget committees, and Sen. Max Baucus, who will head the Senate Finance Committee. He also has a meeting scheduled with Sen. Robert C. Byrd, the West Virginia Democrat who will head the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Some conservatives have argued that Democratic control of Congress will give Mr. Bush a sense of more freedom to use his veto powers without causing conflict with congressional leaders in his own party.

Mr. Portman said he expects presidential vetoes of spending bills in the last two years of Mr. Bush's administration. The president has vetoed only one bill in his six years in office. The House sustained that veto, against a measure to expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

"The veto, not to pass the buck, but a lot of it depends on the Democratic leadership," Mr. Portman said. "If they choose to try to work things out, we will be in a position to try to do that. We would rather try to make progress. The president is not interested in scoring political points over the next two years; he's interested in getting things done."

Mr. Portman said a center-right coalition could emerge on issues such as spending and extending the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, particularly since the rate of taxes as a percentage of the economy -- at 18.4 percent -- is higher than the 18.2 percent average over the past four decades.

"It's not that we are undertaxed as much as we need to get our spending in line with our revenue. That's the fundamental basis on which we should be able to build a majority on a number of issues," he said.

Annual federal spending has mushroomed during Mr. Bush's presidency, from $1.86 trillion in fiscal 2001 to $2.67 trillion in 2006. The Congressional Budget Office forecast spending to rise to $2.8 trillion by the end of the 2007 fiscal period. Much of the increase has been in federal entitlements for programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, which have ballooned from $1 trillion in 2001 to $1.42 trillion in 2006.

The director, interviewed last week in his office at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, said opportunities could arise to streamline or cut specific programs. The administration has achieved little toward those goals with a Republican-led Congress.

The White House hopes Democrats are willing to eliminate public education programs that aren't showing results and to put the money into those that are more promising.

Mr. Bush has sent budgets to Congress with the understanding that lawmakers would change the distribution of money, but threatened a veto if the total exceeded his limit. He also has threatened to veto defense spending bills if they were altered by Congress too much.

Mr. Portman is deep into the process of receiving 2008 budget requests from agencies and departments and returning them with suggestions and changes.

He has not received a total discretionary spending cap and said it is too early to determine whether discretionary spending can be reduced.

Potential flash points for a spending fight include the fiscal 2008 budget, the first chance Democrats will have to put together a framework for spending. It will give them part ownership of the federal deficit for the first time and force them to take a position on tax increases.

Contractors Face More Scrutiny, Pinched Purses (WP)

By Griff Witte And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

After riding high for five years, government contractors are bracing themselves for increased oversight, tighter budgets and stepped-up regulations as Democrats take over on Capitol Hill and vow to keep a closer eye on how companies spend taxpayer dollars.

Every company that does business with the government could feel the impact, but contractors that benefited most from work in Iraq and Afghanistan, from homeland security initiatives or from Hurricane Katrina are especially likely to be under the microscope. Big-ticket weapons programs are also expected to garner special attention, and it may become more difficult to get a no-bid contract, according to industry observers.

"The pendulum has clearly swung back in a hard way," said David Nadler, an attorney for government contractors with the Dickstein Shapiro law firm. "Everything contractors do is going to be subject to scrutiny. They need to understand that they're in a different environment."

Most incoming chairs of congressional committees have not said specifically which contracting areas they intend to scrutinize. But the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm, gave Hill leaders some ideas earlier this month.

In a 44-page look at areas in need of oversight, GAO investigators focused substantial attention on contractors. The government spent $388 billion on contracts last year, the GAO said, and much of that money is exposed to "potential waste and misuse" because of the way the government buys goods and services.

Meanwhile, congressional workers are getting ready. In September, the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, began holding seminars for Hill workers of both parties on how to conduct investigations, including sessions on the anatomy of a government contract and skits in which oversight hearings were acted out. About 150 people have attended the sessions, said Jennifer Gore, the group's spokeswoman.

"Younger staff members were not quite sure what Congress's role is," she said. "We knew they needed to get a review on what congressional power really is, how it works, and why it's so important."

Richard Moorhouse, a contracting attorney with Greenberg Traurig, said he is advising clients with high-visibility contracts to be ready to testify on Capitol Hill at a moment's notice.

"They should be preparing themselves," Moorhouse said.

Increased oversight is not the only potential change. Analysts say spending priorities are likely to shift, especially at the Pentagon, where growth has already begun to slow.

During the past few years, the defense industry has been shielded from significant cuts by supplemental spending bills Congress passed to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. But now, some of the military's largest weapons programs may be in danger of being scaled back.

"In general, Democrats prefer people to weapons in their military outlays," said Loren Thompson, a defense industry consultant and chief operating officer of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington think tank. "What that means is that when they are going to buy weapons, they think first of the Army. Those are the soldiers, those are the war fighters."

Some contractors have already begun to feel the difference. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, contractors were rewarded for proposing cutting-edge systems that pushed the technological envelope. But after repeated cost overruns and delays with those high-risk ideas, safer solutions are back in vogue. Earlier this month, Boeing won a coveted $15 billion helicopter program using an updated version of its 50-year-old, war-tested Chinook.

"The notion that comprehensive networking and cutting-edge sensors can solve our military problems has been confounded by the experience of Iraq," Thompson said.

Perhaps sensing the changing environment, Lockheed Martin recently began giving presentations on the state of the defense industry, arguing that military spending is a small part of the gross domestic product.

That logic may prove a tough sell with Democrats who campaigned for office this fall on a platform of cleaning up corruption that has been intertwined with contractors. Former Republican representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.) pleaded guilty to taking bribes from contractors, and Halliburton became a favorite target of Democrats who thought Republicans were reluctant to scrutinize the politically connected firm's billions of dollars of work in Iraq.

"One thing you can be assured of is that we will do aggressive oversight," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), who is set to lead the Homeland Security committee.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), a frequent critic of Halliburton, is to become chairman of the Government Reform Committee in January, and he has indicated that he plans to introduce legislation to put contractors on a shorter leash. His Clean Contracting Act is aimed at curbing no-bid deals, limiting the use of subcontractors and closing loopholes that Waxman says open the door to abuse.

Rep. Janice D. Schakowsky (D-Ill.), meanwhile, plans to revive legislation that would require more oversight of military contractors in Iraq. "This Iraq experience has made the case for aggressive monitoring of contractors," Schakowsky said. "This is a foggy area where billions and billions of taxpayer dollars are being spent, and we have no sense of how or what they are spending or doing."

Industry groups are fighting greater regulation, arguing that such proposed laws would hamstring contracting officers and prevent the government from getting goods and services when it needs them.

"Many Democrats have had the impression, and they are feeding the impression, that contracting is a process that is fundamentally broken. But there's not a scintilla of evidence that that is the case," said Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an industry trade group.

Soloway said he welcomes closer scrutiny of the industry but only under certain conditions.

"It could be largely political, or it could be part of a very substantive look at a very complex set of processes," Soloway said. "If it's the latter, it might be beneficial. If it's just about 'gotcha,' it will exacerbate the problems."

Group Wants Hastert Deal Investigated (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A government watchdog group Monday called for an official investigation into whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert broke the law by pushing for federal funding of a highway project near land he owned west of Chicago.

Hastert (R-Ill.) and two partners turned a profit of more than $3 million last year on land they bought and sold near the proposed route of the Prairie Parkway—earnings that the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington say the investors got because of federal funding pushed by Hastert.

The group is asking the Justice Department to investigate Hastert's actions.

"It looks like Hastert may have broken the law," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of CREW. "You are not allowed to use the legislative process purely for your own personal financial benefit, which is what appears to have happened here."

An aide to Hastert declined to comment Monday on the group's call for an investigation. But when the Tribune reported the story this summer, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the speaker simply made a well-timed real estate investment on the land, located between 3 and 5 miles from the highway route.

"For 26 years, the speaker has been a proponent of the Prairie Parkway to address the transportation challenges in northeast Illinois," Bonjean told the Tribune in June. "None of the properties purchased by the speaker are near enough to the Prairie Parkway to be affected by the proposed highway."

Republicans have accused CREW of being a left-leaning organization. Sloan describes it as a non-partisan watchdog group.

FOX News, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi will meet Tuesday with Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings, and those with knowledge of Pelosi's thinking told FOX News that Hastings will be told he is not going to be the next chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

Though no formal decisions have been announced and Pelosi aides say the situation remains fluid, they suggest that the meeting at Pelosi's Capitol Hill office was requested by Hastings so he could bow out of the race before Pelosi denies him the job.

"He knows he's not going to get it," said one senior House Democratic aide. "The question is why he didn't bow out long ago."

In comments over the weekend, Hastings left the impression he was resigned to not receiving the chairmanship from Pelosi, due in large measure to his impeachment from the federal bench in 1989 for conspiring to accept a bribe from two convicted racketeers, and then, according to the Senate impeachment trial, lying to cover it up.

Pelosi aides have been scrutinizing the House and Senate proceedings in the Hastings impeachment, FOX News has learned, and apparently don't like what they have seen.

"It's ugly," said one Pelosi aide. "It's just really, really bad."

Hastings has public support from many quarters, including from Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who will lead the Financial Services Committee next session.

"Alcee Hastings has served in the Congress for a long time, since the events that were the cause of the impeachment. I think he's entitled to be judged" on his performance since then, Frank told "FOX News Sunday."

No schedule has been set for Pelosi to name an Intelligence Committee chairman except that the position must be filled by Jan. 4, 2007, when the 110th Congress convenes.

Texas Rep. Silvestre Reyes is the most-often mentioned candidate for the post. He is next in line after Hastings. Rep. Jane Harman of California, the current ranking member of the panel, has already been told by Pelosi that she won't be given the chairman's gavel.

An Intelligent Choice For A Key Panel (WP)

By Terence J. Anderson

No one can reasonably question Alcee Hastings's qualifications to serve as chairman of the House intelligence committee. For seven years he has been one of the committee's hardest-working members. In 1996 he was selected to represent Congress as a member of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and two years ago he became the first American elected president of the assembly. He is highly intelligent, a fact acknowledged by friend and foe alike, and during his seven terms in the House he has been an effective politician and consensus builder.

Ruth Marcus[op-ed, Nov. 1] and others have argued, however, that Hastings should not be appointed chairman because of the Senate's decision 17 years ago to remove him from the federal bench. Such arguments ignore important facts that should be considered before the next speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, decides on the chairmanship.

First, no "jury" that heard and considered all the evidence has been convinced that Hastings was guilty. In 1983 the trial court jury that heard the evidence and arguments on both sides voted to acquit. Six years later, the Senate delegated the task of hearing the evidence to a Senate Impeachment Trial Committee. The 12 senators on that committee were the only members who actually heard all of the evidence, and there was no alleged crime on which the required two-thirds of those senators voted to convict. One year later a Florida Bar committee examined the evidence and decided that it was not enough to justify formal proceedings that would question Hastings's fitness to practice law. Those who now cite isolated events to argue that Hastings was guilty ignore the rest of the facts. Each of the "juries" that considered all of the facts found that he should be acquitted.

Second, in any fair view, perceived political necessity was a significant, perhaps decisive, factor in the decision to remove Hastings from the bench. Most observers thought the 1983 acquittal ended the matter, and the House made no effort to initiate impeachment proceedings at that time. But that acquittal brought passionate reactions from some powerful officials. Hastings's exoneration meant that the FBI and the Justice Department had shot themselves in the foot. It meant that U.S. attorneys would have to prosecute criminal cases based on evidence gathered and presented by FBI agents before the very judge they had unjustly attacked but failed to remove from the bench.

The other federal judges who had served with Hastings in Florida welcomed his return to active service. It was John Godbold, then chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta, who decided that the situation was intolerable and that Hastings had to be removed. He appointed and chaired the committee that prepared the report the Judicial Conference of the United States certified to the House of Representatives in 1987 for "consideration of impeachment." Only then did the House initiate impeachment proceedings.

Third, senators who had not heard the evidence filed statements that make it clear that some voted for removal not because they were convinced Hastings was guilty but because they believed he had not proven his innocence. For example, Robert Dole, the Senate minority leader then, said he had voted to remove Hastings because for him the issue was, "Would the Senate vote to confirm Alcee Hastings if he were nominated by the President today?" Similarly, Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) explained that he had voted for removal because: "Like 'Caesar's wife,' [federal judges] must be, simply, beyond reproach, even suspicion."

In contrast, senators who had heard the evidence thought the House failed to prove Hastings's guilt. For example, Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Impeachment Trial Committee, and Vice Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), both of whom had heard all the evidence, filed separate statements explaining why they had concluded that it was neither clear nor convincing enough to support a vote to convict.

Fourth, no senator suggested that the Senate should impose the additional sanction authorized by the Constitution, that Hastings should be disqualified "to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States." Those who object to his appointment as chairman of the House intelligence committee because of the Senate's decision to remove him from the bench 17 years ago need to explain why we should not also respect the Senate's decision then that he should not be barred from holding an office of honor and trust.

Hastings could have avoided all this by simply resigning after the 1983 acquittal. He would have earned substantially more as a lawyer than as a judge. He could have successfully run for the office he now holds without the baggage his detractors cite. He did not. He endured those burdens and fought to protect the office of federal judge rather than his own interests. That is not the conduct of a guilty man.

Hastings was appointed seven years ago to serve on the intelligence committee, a position requiring the highest trust and honor. No one questioned his fitness then. His work on the committee has vindicated the decision to entrust him with the nation's most important secrets. Such questions arise now, in the context of one party's loss of control of Congress and in an obvious attempt to undermine the nation's confidence in the leadership of the newly elected controlling party. They are the kind of distraction the new leadership should ignore.

The writer is a law professor at the University of Miami. He represented Alcee Hastings in all matters related to his judicial office from 1981 to 1993, including the trial of his impeachment in the Senate. His e-mail address istanderso@law.miami.edu.

Bush Approval Ratings Slip (WSJ)

President Bush's approval ratings fell to the second-lowest of his presidency, according to a new Harris Interactive poll.

According to the telephone poll, conducted between Nov. 17 and Nov. 21, 31% of U.S. adults called Mr. Bush's job performance "excellent" or "good" -- down from 34% who gave a positive assessment in a late-October poll; 67% said his performance is only "fair" or "poor," up from 63% in the previous survey2. The president's lowest approval rating in a Harris poll was 29% in May 2006.

Despite recent changes in Congress, Republicans and Democrats continued to receive low marks. Thirty-six percent of respondents said Democrats are doing an "excellent" or "good" job, better than the 29% in September. Democrats' highest positive rating was 68% in October 2001, a month after the 9/11 attacks. Meanwhile, Republicans' approval rating remained unchanged from September at 24%, and also well below their October 2001 high of 67%.

The post-election poll found that 31% of adults now believe things in the U.S. are going in the right direction, compared with 58% who think things have "pretty seriously gotten off on the wrong track." Last month, 27% saw the U.S. going in the right direction, while 63% said things were off track.

Methodology:

The Harris Poll was conducted by telephone within the U.S. between Nov. 17 - 21, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 1,001 adults. Figures for age, sex, race/ethnicity, education, region, number of adults in the household, size of place (urbanicity) and number of phone lines in the household were weighted where necessary to bring them into line with their actual proportions in the population. With pure probability samples, with 100% response rates, it is possible to calculate the probability that the sampling error (but not other sources of error) is not greater than some number. With a pure probability sample of 1,001, one could say with a 95% probability that the overall results would have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points.

The Honorable Gentleman From Orleans And New York (WP)

By David Segal

PEEKSKILL, N.Y. -- With any luck, the most embarrassing photograph taken of you in the 1970s is stashed away in a box that nobody will ever find. John Hall, the newly elected Democratic congressman from the 19th District of New York, is not that lucky.

There he is, standing shirtless and smushed against his equally shirtless band, Orleans, for the cover of their fourth album, "Waking and Dreaming." In the pre-gay-awareness days of 1976, the fellas just sort of seemed, you know, chummy -- perhaps on the way to a group sauna or something like that. But even then, at age 28, Hall found the image a little cheesy.

"The photographer had us take off our shirts for about two minutes during that shoot," Hall recalls, sitting at a cafe here last week. "And the record company said, 'This is a really striking image.' "

Fortunately for Hall, "Waking and Dreaming" featured not just several cubic feet of frisky man-flesh, but also "Still the One," a hit that sparked more anniversary-party conga lines than any other song in history. It even turned up as an ABC promotional jingle for a couple of years, and it -- along with Orleans's other wussy-rock classic, "Dance With Me" -- has ka-chinged in Hall's bank account for some three decades now. He wrote both tunes with his former wife, Johanna, and the pair get paid every time the songs are played on the radio.

Once we forgive Hall for penning such excruciatingly unshakable couplets as "You're still the one who can scratch my itch / You're still the one and I wouldn't switch," let us acknowledge his singular place in American history: He is the first professional rock musician elected to Congress.

No, we're not counting Sonny Bono, because he didn't play an instrument, at least not onstage. And before you start complaining that "Dance With Me" isn't "rock" enough to count, note that before Orleans was founded in 1972, Hall was a sought-after session guitarist who played with Taj Mahal and Little Feat and was once summoned to Bob Dylan's SoHo loft for two weeks of improvised jamming.

"I was in awe of him," says Hall, who was barely out of his teens at the time. "I'd been listening to 'Just Like a Woman' for years -- there I was, playing my guitar over it."

It's hard to believe that the bearded and topless Hall of 1976 and the Hall wearing a suit and tie today are the same man. It's not just that he would blend in at a board meeting of any Fortune 500 company -- he is tall and serious and pretty formal. He actually sounds like a politician, too: He can speechify in that earnest and somewhat tedious way that only politicians can.

No offense, but you've never met anyone who toggles so quickly between gripping anecdote and soporific spiel. With little prodding, Hall will talk about the time in 1974 that Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band opened for Orleans at a high school in Maine. ("He was supposed to play for 45 minutes. He played for 2 hours and 45 minutes.") And he is happy to describe the time he rode in a limo with Janis Joplin to her last show at Madison Square Garden. ("There was no way she could walk down a street and not be recognized.")

But frankly, he'd rather talk up his slate of left-leaning goals, such as raising the minimum wage, weaning the nation off fossil fuels or pushing for universal health care.

The surprising thing is that he has always been this way. His Orleans band mates say that in the '70s, Hall would launch into a politically charged monologue in the middle of a concert, grinding the festivities to a temporary halt.

"It was one of the hallmarks of our shows," says Larry Hoppen, who sang both of Orleans's hits. "We'd be playing, and inevitably John would start going off on the issue of the day. It's one thing to make a passing comment. It's another to do a five-minute, detail-oriented diatribe about nuclear power."

The progressive-minded geek and the virtuoso musician have coexisted in Hall for as long as he can remember. He was raised in Upstate New York, the son of a Westinghouse engineer, and started playing piano at the age of 4. A stellar student, he entered Notre Dame at 16, though he quit after a year, deciding that music was his calling. He wound up in New York, where he and Springsteen -- then leading his first band, the Castiles -- took turns onstage at Cafe Wha? in the West Village.

"We'd play six sets per night," Hall remembers. "It was $6 per guy in the band, plus all the potato chips and ice cream we could eat."

After a few years of session and solo work, he helped start Orleans, naming after the New Orleans rhythms the band members loved. But not long after the group's hits slid off the charts, Hall split for a solo career, which never quite took off. Along with Bonnie Raitt, Jackson Browne and Graham Nash, he formed Musicians United for Safe Energy to fight nuclear power, and he helped organize a series of benefit concerts, eventually packaged in a film and a rather extravagant triple album, "No Nukes/The MUSE Concerts for a Non-Nuclear Future."

Hall returned to Orleans in 1984 and he has recorded and toured with the band off and on ever since. (The group released the widely ignored "Dancin' in the Moonlight" earlier this year.) His only experience with elective politics was a two-year stint as an Ulster County legislator, and the noisy protests he made when the Bush entourage used "Still the One" at campaign stops in 2004. (The song was quickly dropped.)

Nobody took his campaign very seriously, even he after he won the primary. The 19th District is largely made of New York City suburbs that tilt Republican, and for six terms the congressional seat there belonged to Sue Kelly, who in 2004 won 60 percent of the vote. She had $900,000 on hand for the general election; Hall had $57,000.

As with nearly every campaign this year, things got ugly. A few weeks before Election Day, the Kelly campaign jump-started a direct-mail attack, accusing Hall of radical left-wing views and charging that he wanted to raise taxes and socialize medicine. For an added measure of humiliation, one mailing included a reprint of the cover of "Waking and Dreaming."

"The point," says Jay Townsend, Kelly's campaign spokesman, "was basically to say, this guy isn't serious enough to send to Washington."

Hall kept harping on Iraq, and when the Mark Foley page scandal broke, Kelly was sideswiped by questions from Hall and the media about her tenure several years ago on the House Page Board. Meanwhile, late-night satirist Stephen Colbert showed up in the district to interview Hall, and the pair performed an impromptu a cappella duet of "Dance With Me."

Hall won by 4,300 votes.

"I don't quote George Bush very often, but I think I will here," says Hall. "They misunderestimated me."

In a way, Hall's new job has simply broadened the audience for his lectures, from the Orleans crowd to the C-SPAN crowd. Not that this will change his message. Asked if he will keep sticking it to the Man now that he is the Man, Hall responds with a quick story.

"I already met a couple lobbyists from Raytheon during orientation in Washington, and I just told them what I think is wrong with their missile system. Maybe they'll write checks to my next opponent. I don't care. I got into this race because my wife told me to stop yelling at the TV."

Washington Wire (WSJ)

November 28, 2006; Page A14

We'll soon find out if the loss of both houses of Congress was enough of a shock for Republicans to check into the Hazelton rehab center for spending addicts. GOP Doctors, er, Senators Jim DeMint (South Carolina) and Tom Coburn (Oklahoma) have been staging an intervention so their colleagues don't risk another overdose before they ride off into the minority.

The drama played out on the Senate floor recently as the pair blocked GOP Appropriators from passing spending bills for Fiscal Year 2007 unless they stripped out special-interest "earmarks." You could almost feel the withdrawal shakes coming on, as the Members contemplated a year without pork.

The agriculture bill, for example, includes a new $4.9 billion "emergency" handout for farmers, courtesy of North Dakota Democrat Kent Conrad. Millions more would have been directed to Alaskan salmon research, Montana sheep, New York geese and animal-waste management in Kentucky. The 10 remaining Senate spending bills (and nine in the House) are estimated to contain some 12,000 earmarks. If GOP leaders couldn't pass these bills individually, the scheme was to wrap them all into one giant "omnibus" bill whose innards no one would ever be able to inspect.

Enter the two rebel Senators, who rallied enough of their mates to block any omnibus bill containing earmarks. The result is that the GOP Senate may return next week for its final lame duck days and instead pass a "continuing resolution" that would fund the government at 2006 levels, kicking 2007 decisions over to the Democratic majority in January. By Mr. Coburn's estimate, taxpayers would save about $17 billion if Congress takes this approach.

That prospect has the usual spenders howling that the world will soon end if they don't get their fix. The Social Security Administration is warning that it would have to furlough "every employee"; we'll believe that when we see it. Meanwhile, a source from Housing and Urban Development claimed that "thousands" of poor people "would end up out on the street." Please.

It is true that once Democrats are in control next year they will be able to impose their own spending priorities. But Senators DeMint and Coburn have said the GOP spenders could still impose their policy preferences for 2007 in individual bills if they'd merely abandon their earmarks. Their refusal to do so suggests they care more about their own projects than they do about other policy matters.

All of the special-interest shouting is a familiar bit of bad Washington theater designed to scare Congress into spending more. But what do Republicans have to lose now that they've already lost their majority? On the other hand, what they could gain is some of the fiscal respect they abandoned in recent years. By leaving behind a lower spending "baseline," they'd also make it harder for Democrats to break the bank next year.

So rather than denounce Senators DeMint and Coburn, their GOP brethren should thank the pair for offering this tough love to help break their addiction. It's more love than the voters just showed them.

Stocks Fall As Investors Take Profits (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

Stocks fell sharply on Monday, with a weakening U.S. dollar and tepid sales at retail giant Wal-Mart Stores giving investors the opening they were looking for to cash out some of the profits they've booked during the market's four-month surge.

The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500 index each sank more than 1% for the first time since July 13. The losses were spread across many sectors, including technology and financial services, that had been strong performers in recent months. Overseas markets also retreated.

Investment pros said the decline was not surprising given Wall Street's strength this year, especially through its seasonally weak period in September and October. They attributed the sell-off largely to profit taking by big institutional investors that are sitting on sizable recent gains.

"This is more of an excuse to sell rather than a real reason to sell," said Marc Pado, U.S. market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald. "This isn't the start of something big."

The Dow sank 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, its biggest decline since a 1.5% slide on July 13.

The S&P 500 was off 19.05 points, or 1.4%, to 1381.90. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index skidded 2.21%, tumbling 54.34 points to 2405.92.

Smaller stocks, which have rallied sharply in the last month, fell more than blue chips. The Russell 2,000 small-stock index was down 20.18 points, or 2.6%, to 772.10. It was the biggest loss since the index dropped 2.7% on July 20.

The declines seemed muted compared to the extended rally of recent months. Even after its decline on Monday, for example, the Nasdaq is up 19% since July 21 and 9.1% for the year.

The Dow is up 13.1% since Jan. 1, and the S&P 500 has gained 10.7%.

Stocks historically sag after Labor Day before recovering at Thanksgiving and rallying into Christmas.

But the post-Labor Day slump didn't happen this year. Stocks moved higher after the Federal Reserve paused in its string of interest-rate hikes as hopes grew that it could slow economic growth without triggering a recession.

Market pros say institutional investors knew a downdraft would eventually come, and were prepared to sell at the first whiff of bad news.

That opportunity came Friday, when the dollar fell to a 20-month low against the euro amid concerns about a weakening U.S. economy. Stocks declined in light trading Friday, but absorbed a bigger hit Monday when most traders returned from the holiday weekend.

Stocks "can actually go down as well as up," joked Phil Roth, a technical analyst at New York brokerage Miller Tabak & Co. "I'll be darned."

The dollar continued to lose ground Monday, with the euro trading at $1.313, from $1.309 Friday.

As stocks declined, some investors looked to the U.S. Treasury bond market as a safe haven. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note fell to a nine-month low of 4.53%, from 4.55% on Friday. Yields decline as bond prices rise.

Also adding to Wall Street's unease was the news out of Wal-Mart. The retail behemoth disclosed Saturday that sales at stores open at least one year fell 0.1% this month, its first such drop in a decade.

On Monday, shares of Wal-Mart fell $1.29, or 2.7%, to $46.61.

Wal-Mart's sales slump overshadowed more upbeat reports from the long Thanksgiving weekend, the first big weekend for holiday sales. The National Retail Federation said Sunday that spending this past weekend was up 18.9% over last year, boosted in part by sales of big-ticket items such as high-definition televisions.

But Wal-Mart is considered a retailing bellwether, and other merchants also posted declines Monday.

Federated Department Stores, which owns big chain stores including Macy's and Bloomingdale's, subtracted $1.27, to $41.84. Electronics retailer Best Buy dropped 71 cents, to $54.37. Discounter Target dipped 64 cents, to $57.07, while Big Lots fell 76 cents, to $22.42.

In other markets highlights:

Technology and financial issues, which have been among the market leaders this year, took some of the hardest falls Monday. Among tech firms, Google lost $20.25 to $484.75 and Cisco Systems fell $1.04, to $25.80.

Among banking concerns, Wall Street powerhouse Goldman Sachs slid $8.49, to $193.11, while rival Merrill Lynch sank $3.38, to $89.21.

Airline stocks descended as crude oil prices rose to $60.32 a barrel, from $59.24 Friday. UAL, the parent of United Airlines, sank $2.81, to $41.63. AMR, which owns American Airlines, declined $1.90, to $32.20. Among the discounters, Jet Blue dropped 92 cents, to $13.79 and Southwest fell 44 cents, to $15.81.

An AG Edwards & Sons analyst lowered his recommendation from "buy" to "hold" on several major hotel chains, sending their shares lower. Hilton Hotels $1.70 to $32.10, Marriott International gave up $1.54 to $44.91 and Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide subtracted $1.92, to $63.46.

Stocks Fall Sharply On Concerns About Slowdown (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Stocks suffered their biggest drop in four months today, as concerns about a weak holiday shopping season fed into broader anxiety about the slowing economy.

It was a day with little for investors to cheer, with the dollar continuing its slide against the euro and the price of a barrel of oil rising.

The decline on Wall Street spoiled what had been a steady run-up in stock prices in recent weeks. In the past month and a half, the Dow Jones industrial average broke through 12,000 for the first time, while the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose to its highest point in six years.

But some of that investor enthusiasm faded, pushing the three leading stock market indexes into retreat today. The S.&P. 500 lost 19.05 points, or 1.4 percent, to 1,381.90, its first close below 1,400 since Nov. 16. The Dow shed 158.46 points, or 1.3 percent, to 12,121.71. The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 54.34 points, or 2.2 percent, to 2,405.92.

Some of the steepest losses came in the shares of retailers like Wal-Mart, whose troubles reverberated throughout the stock market. The world's largest retailer reported Saturday that its sales in November fell for the first time in 10 years. Despite signs that retailers on average fared well during the first weekend of the holiday shopping crunch, the poor results from Wal-Mart raised questions about how much consumers will spend this season.

"The question has always been whether the consumer would be able to hang in," said Stuart Schweitzer, a global markets strategist with J.P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management. "If Wal-Mart's news is indicative of the potential for broader disappointment, that is worrisome."

With the economy slowing down — the nation's gross domestic product expanded at an annual rate of 5.6 percent in the first quarter but only 1.6 percent in the third — strong consumer spending is needed to keep growth from becoming too sluggish. But as the fall in the stock market suggests, there is still considerable uncertainty about how much of a slowdown could be.

That uncertainty has put strain on the value of the dollar in recent days. On Friday, the dollar's weakness pushed the euro above $1.30 for the first time in a year and a half. The dollar's decline deepened today on concerns that the United States economy would falter while economies in Europe grow stronger. The euro rose to $1.3133 late this afternoon.

The decline in the value of the dollar on Friday came on a light and shortened holiday trading day for Wall Street. Analysts said the losses in the stock market were in part an acceleration of the sell-off that began on Friday after the dollar tumbled.

But other factors contributed to the drop, analysts said, including an apparent desire by investors to cash out. After the stock market's recent rise, some sort of correction was inevitable, they said.

"You've been up 131 days without a 1 percent correction; that's just unnatural for equity markets," said Henry McVey, chief United States investment strategist for Morgan Stanley.

Wal-Mart's Forecast, Weakening Dollar Send Stock Indexes Tumbling (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

U.S. stock markets dropped sharply yesterday, spurred by higher oil prices, a weakening dollar and an unexpectedly glum sales forecast from Wal-Mart.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed down 158.46 points, to 12,121.71 -- a 1.3 percent loss. Twenty-seven of the 30 Dow stocks traded lower.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 19.05 points, to 1381.90, a drop of 1.4 percent. The Nasdaq composite index tumbled 54.34 points, to 2405.92, a 2.2 percent loss.

Investors weren't encouraged by the dollar's performance against the euro, which reached $1.3128 late yesterday in New York. Earlier, the euro traded at $1.3172, a 20-month high against the dollar. The dollar has been falling in recent days on concern about potential economic weakness in the United States and about the country's huge trade deficit and other global imbalances.

The stock pullback came on what retailers called Cyber Monday, a day they hoped would bring in colossal sales on their Internet sites.

Wal-Mart had already been trying to boost sales by cutting prices on items such as the Amazing Amanda Doll (to $69 from $99.97) and a Panasonic 61-inch TV (to $2,297 from $2,597). The retailer's Web site also offered 97-cent shipping on some products.

But Wal-Mart disappointed investors over the weekend when it announced that it expected sales at stores open at least a year to decline 0.1 percent this month. That would represent the retailer's first monthly drop in same-store sales since 1996.

Yesterday's stock sell-off also was driven by a 1.8 percent jump in crude-oil futures, fueled by reports that Saudi Arabia's oil minister may support a cutback in production at the next meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Light sweet crude for January delivery gained $1.08 to settle at $60.32 a barrel.Movers

Wal-Mart fell $1.29, to $46.61.

Lowe's rose 40 cents, to $1.33.

J. Crew fell $3.07, to $40.21.

Ford fell 36 cents, to $8.16.

Dow Drop A 'much-needed Correction'? (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098898

NEW YORK — The Dow, which has been hitting new highs almost daily, suffered its worst point drop in more than four months Monday as investors fretted over the falling value of the U.S. dollar and a weak sales report from the nation's largest retailer.

However, some Wall Street strategists said the 158.46-point drop to 12,121.71 suffered by the Dow Jones industrial average was long overdue given the Dow's uninterrupted run-up in recent weeks.

"It was simply a much-needed correction," says Rod Smyth, investment strategist at Wachovia Securities. "I genuinely believe this (selling) has been building."

Still, the broad market sell-off, which resulted in sizable losses for virtually every type of stock — blue chips, technology names and both large- and small-capitalization stocks — grabbed the attention of a complacent Wall Street caught up in Dow fever.

"It doesn't feel good no matter how high the market is when it starts falling," says Stuart Schweitzer, global strategist at JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management.

While it's difficult to glean too much from one day of trading, a number of theories emerged to try to explain the selling:

•Preserving gains. It's been a big year on Wall Street, and investors sitting on sizable gains with the Dow up 13.1% for the year might have decided to pocket those gains by selling, says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors.

•Avoiding fallout of the slumping dollar. The greenback fell to a 20-month low vs. the euro Monday, exacerbating fears that foreigners would lighten up on their considerable holdings of U.S. stocks and bonds, Johnson says.

A weaker dollar hurts foreign investors holding U.S. securities, because the gains on those dollar-denominated assets shrink when they are converted into such local currencies as the euro. But some debunked the notion that foreigners were selling U.S. assets Monday because the price on the 10-year Treasury bond held steady, a sign that heavy selling from abroad was absent, Schweitzer notes.

•Avoiding Wal-Mart-like weakness. After Wal-Mart Stores said sales at its stores open at least a year dipped for the first time in more than a decade in November, investors were left wondering whether the problem was specific to Wal-Mart or whether it was signaling that the economy is softer than economists believe it is.

Smyth says Wal-Mart didn't have a huge negative impact on trading: "I didn't get the impression investors were worried about Christmas sales." That sentiment was backed by ShopperTrak RTC, which reported that Black Friday sales were up 6% vs. a year ago. In another sign of strength, the S&P retail index fell just 1.2% Monday, less than the broader market.

Stocks Tumble On Retail Fears; Dow Drops 1.3% (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay And Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average suffered its biggest drop since mid-July as stocks tumbled, hurt by signals of faltering retail sales, another drop in the dollar and higher oil prices.

Some Wall Street pros also said the stock market was due for a pullback, following more than a month of fresh records and last week's holiday-shortened trading.

The blue-chip Dow slid 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, up 13% on the year. One of the weakest components was Wal-Mart Stores, which dropped 2.7% after the retailing giant reported a November decline in same-store sales, its first monthly drop since 1996. That sparked broader concerns about a weak holiday shopping season throughout the retail industry to end the year.

Four other Dow components fell at least 1.7%, and only three finished in the black, eking out small gains. One gainer was Exxon Mobil, which edged up 0.1%, after crude oil rallied on concerns about supply from the Middle East.

Oil futures for January delivery rose $1.08, or 1.8%, to $60.32 a barrel, though oil is still off 1.2% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Except for energy producers like Exxon Mobil, such moves hurt shares of most companies because higher energy costs hurt consumers' ability to spend on other goods and services through the economy.

Rising interest rates overseas have hurt the dollar recently, a trend that continued in stark fashion yesterday. The euro rose to $1.3126, a 20-month high against the greenback, compared with $1.3097.

The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fared even worse than the Dow in percentage terms, off 2.2%, or 54.34 points, to 2405.92, up 9.1% on the year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.4%, or 19.05 points, to 1381.90, up 11% on the year.

Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, still figures the market is generally headed higher through the end of the year. But he said stocks were probably due for a short-term drop, considering that the S&P 500 hasn't had a decline of 2% from a high since mid-July.

That streak is still intact, since the broad index now stands 1.7% off its recent high set last Wednesday. "This is the longest period without a 2% correction in 20 years," said Mr. Bianco. "It just shows you how strong the market has been that we have to think in these terms now."

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note inched up 5/32, or $1.5625 for each $1,000 invested, driving its yield down to 4.534%, its lowest level since early February.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1; bonds rose. The 30-year bond rose 10/32 to yield 4.614%.

The dollar was mixed.2 While falling on the euro, the U.S. currency rose to 116.08 yen.

Shoppers Shake Off Housing Slowdown (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — A sharp slowdown in the housing market isn't darkening consumers' moods as feared, suggesting they will continue to be a source of strength in the economy through this year and possibly into 2007.

Results from the first few days of the key holiday shopping season point to increases in retail sales from a year ago, despite a mediocre performance at Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer.

With consumer spending accounting for more than two-thirds of U.S. economic activity, spending gains are good news for the broad economy as it faces a number of headwinds, including the housing slowdown and turmoil in the automobile industry.

“A lot of the worries out there about consumers … are all much exaggerated,” National City chief economist Richard DeKaser says.

The holiday shopping season accounts for about one-fifth of all retail sales for the year and for some retailers, such as those that sell toys, it can account for 40% of annual sales, according to the National Retail Federation.

One fear going into the season was that the slowdown in the housing market would weigh on consumers.

With homes taking longer to sell and prices dropping across much of the USA, Americans might be feeling less wealthy and less in a mood to spend.

But more than 140 million people shopped over the Thanksgiving holiday weekend, spending an average $360.15, up 18.9% from a year ago, according to the NRF.

DeKaser and other economists, including those at Bear Stearns, Global Insight and First Trust Advisors, say the so-called wealth effect of the housing market is far overshadowed by strength in the job market and rising incomes.

“The big picture is, ‘How healthy are consumers?' And I continue to believe we are pretty well off,” says Timothy Rogers, chief economist at consulting firm Briefing.com.

“The underlying conditions (that determine spending) are employment and income growth,” he says. “Those two things are really quite positive right now.”

The unemployment rate was 4.4% in October, the lowest in 5½ years, according to government statistics.

Employers are raising wages and increasing workers' hours. In October, average weekly earnings after adjusting for inflation rose 1.7%, the second-consecutive monthly gain and the biggest increase in more than a decade.

Lower gasoline prices are also working in consumers' favor. The national average price at the pump for regular gasoline was $2.246 Monday, down 79 cents from this year's peak of $3.038 in August, according to the Energy Department.

Massachusetts To Sue Big Dig Firms, Alleging Negligence In Deadly Collapse (WSJ/AP)

BOSTON -- Massachusetts is preparing a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the companies that worked on the Big Dig highway tunnel project, alleging their negligence led to the ceiling collapse that killed a woman, a spokesman said Monday.

Attorney General Tom Reilly is seeking unspecified damages for repairs, loss of tunnel use and toll revenue and other economic factors, spokesman David Guarino confirmed Monday. The lawsuit was to be filed Monday or Tuesday, he said.

"This lawsuit is more than just about money, although we will be seeking monetary damages," Mr. Reilly told a local radio station earlier Monday. "What this case is has always been about is the tragic death of Milena Del Valle. That could have been any one of us."

The lawsuit, to be filed in Suffolk Superior Court, alleges project manager Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Modern Continental Construction Co. were "grossly negligent" in constructing the ceiling that collapsed. The suit also names Gannett Fleming, the firm that designed the I-90 connector tunnel; as well as companies that supplied the epoxy or ceiling bolts used to hold up ceiling panels.

Four of the concrete panels, each weighing about three tons, fell on a car in which Del Valle, a 38-year-old from Boston, was a passenger July 10. Gannett Fleming also is being sued for breach of contract, Mr. Guarino said.

Representatives of Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Cambridge, Mass.-based Modern Continental didn't immediately return calls seeking comment Monday. Both organizations have previously said they stand behind their work. Representatives of Gannett Fleming also didn't immediately respond to a call seeking comment.

Ms. Del Valle's family filed a wrongful death lawsuit in August against many of the same companies as well as the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, the agency that oversees the $14.6 billion highway project, the most expensive in U.S. history.

The Big Dig replaced the old elevated Central Artery that ran through the heart of Boston with a series of tunnels, ramps and bridges. The project has been plagued by leaks, falling debris, delays and other problems linked to faulty construction.

States Give Failing Grade To Graduation Rates (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

BOSTON

For decades, college gates have opened wider and wider to the American public, with more whites and minorities attending than ever before. But that expansion is under strain in the face of rising costs and faster growth of minority populations long left behind in the march to graduation.

A new report released Monday from the National Conference of State Legislatures sounds the alarm: For every 100 ninth graders, only 18 will enter college and finish within six years.

"These results simply are not good enough," concludes the report, which was compiled by a bipartisan commission over 18 months.

To help more students earn diplomas, higher education and the states that oversee much of the system need to tackle spiraling tuition, poor college preparation, and the lack of help to keep students moving toward a degree, say experts.

"Colleges have to take seriously the responsibility for graduating the kids they admit," says Thomas Mortenson, an analyst with the Pell Institute for the Study of Opportunity in Higher Education. "And if they don't, maybe they ought to pick up the student loan burden of the people who don't finish."

The report lays much of the blame at the ballooning price of a bachelor's degree, which is more than double the rate of inflation. For example, over the past five years, average tuition has climbed 35 percent, adjusted for inflation, at four-year public colleges, according to the College Board in New York. Inflation rose 13.8 percent over the same period.

Two-thirds of college students must borrow money to pay for their education. Loan debt by student borrowers at public colleges jumped from $8,000 10 years ago to $17,250, according to inflation-adjusted figures from the American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

States such as Indiana, Georgia, and Oklahoma are taking steps to aid college students and their families. And reducing the student-loan rate is an "early action" item on the agenda for the Democratic-controlled Congress.

And there are some positive trends. Graduation rates for those who start college are finally inching up after years of setbacks, says Mr. Mortenson. And the share of Americans with postsecondary degrees is higher across all major ethnic categories.

But it's taking students a longer time on average to complete degrees, and the process is saddling them with more and more debt. "The state is short-changed on its return on investment in these students," says the NCSL report.

States have significant control over higher education - and a real economic interest in its success. Wisconsin spends roughly $1 billion on its university system, which generates $10 billion annually to the state's economy, according to a University of Wisconsin report.

Across the country, higher education boosts tax revenues, cuts dependence on welfare, and boosts community service among other social benefits, according to the Institute for Higher Education Policy in Washington.

Despite the payoffs, states have cut back their commitment to higher education, according to the NCSL, shifting more of the burden to those paying tuition.

And the federal government Pell Grant program "has fallen apart," says Mortenson. If grants had kept up with the rises in tuition, the average Pell Grant would be around $10,000, rather than $4,000, he says. Instead, much of the new assistance for students comes in the form of loans.

The financial burdens appear to be making it more difficult for low-income students to complete a degree. Of students starting at a four-year college in 1996, only 50 percent of those from households making $25,000 or less ended up with a bachelor's degree by 2001, compared with 74 percent of students from households making $70,000 or more.

Working while in school also depresses graduation rates. In those same years, 65 percent of those who did not work graduated, while only 31 percent who worked full time did so.

There are also wide disparities in college attendance and completion rates between ethnic and racial groups, with Hispanics and blacks lagging behind whites and Asians.

The costs of higher education, as well as poor preparation for college, are holding back many minority students, experts say.

To tackle the problems faced by disadvantaged students, several states are tying financial incentives to long-term commitments from students long before they enter college.

Indiana is striking a bargain with its poor and lower-middle-class eighth graders: Maintain at least a 2.0 grade point average through high school, stay out of drugs and alcohol, and take the right set of classes, and we'll pay your in-state college tuition.

Last year, some 15,000 eighth graders enrolled in the 21st Century Scholar Program, and 125,000 have enrolled since the program started in the mid-1990s.

"It's increased a lot of the high-school graduation rates. It's certainly increased the number of low-income students going to college," says Nick Vesper, director of policy and research at Indiana's State Student Assistance Commission in Indianapolis.

Studies are only being done now, however, to determine if the program is boosting college degree completion rates.

Mr. Vesper describes the initiative as an "early intervention program" since it works with kids years before they enter the college-application process to get them the tutoring, mentoring, and course work needed to be successful in college.

Oklahoma offers a similar program. Texas has a variation on the theme: Finish college within five years and maintain a 3.0 grade point average and all tuition loans will be forgiven.

The granddaddy of all state-scholarship programs is in Georgia, which launched its HOPE scholarship program in 1993 and has given more than $3 billion in funds to some 900,000 students.

State legislatures also have control over the spending of public colleges and universities, meaning they could in theory drive down tuition increases by curbing spending. But higher education - both public and private - is under tremendous pressure to provide more amenities to students.

"It's a very careful balance and tightrope that we walk in trying to make sure that we appeal to our market's almost insatiable interest in buildings and resources and technology and accoutrements, and then their absolute need and cry for controlled cost," says Mary Grondahl, head of admissions at the College of Saint Rose in Albany, New York.

Panel: States Should Set Education Goals (USAT)

USA Today, November 28, 2006

A higher-education panel created by the National Conference of State Legislatures agrees with most of the points raised by a national commission created by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. But there's one major exception: It says states, not the federal government, must be at the center of a nationwide higher-education reform movement. Higher education "can get short shrift in tough budget times because it has the built-in funding source of tuition," says the report, released Monday. But, it says, states spend $70 billion a year on higher education and provide more funding and regulation of colleges and universities than any other level of government. The government's involvement centers on funding academic research and financial aid for low-income students, the report says. "Each state's systems, traditions, strengths and weaknesses are unique. States need the flexibility to set their own goals," says commission co-chair Denise Merrill, a state representative in Connecticut.

Demand for exotic pets may pose threat

A booming demand in the USA for exotic animals, captured in the wild and brought into the country with little or no screening for disease, leaves Americans vulnerable to a virulent outbreak that could rival a terrorist act, suggests a report. More than 650 million critters — from kangaroos and kinkajous to iguanas — were imported legally into the USA in the past three years, according to U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service documents obtained by the Associated Press. Countless more pets — along with animal parts and meats — are smuggled across the borders as part of a $10-billion-a-year black market that's second only to illegal drugs. While exotic pets can be cute and fashionable, The Journal of Internal Medicine estimates that 50 million people worldwide since 2000 have been infected with zoonotic diseases — animal-borne diseases that jump to humans — and as many as 78,000 have died.

Whales have brain cells similar to humans

Humpback whales have a type of brain cell seen only in humans, the great apes, and other cetaceans such as dolphins, according to a new finding by scientists. This might mean such whales are more intelligent than they have been given credit for, and it suggests that the basis for complex brains either evolved more than once or has gone unused by most species of animals, researchers reported Monday in the science journal The Anatomical Record. The brain cell (called a spindle neuron) was located in the cortex in areas comparable to where it is seen in humans and great apes. The finding may help explain some of the behaviors seen in whales, such as intricate communication skills, say researchers.

Parents fingerprinting kids, taking DNA

Many parents across the country are swabbing the inside of their children's mouths to get a DNA sample just in case the youngster is ever kidnapped, runs away or has an accident. News reports about child abductions and TV shows such as CSI: Crime Scene Investigation are helping drive the interest in keeping records that could be used to identify remains, hair or blood. "It's the CSI mentality: that DNA is going to be the answer to any problem that comes up," says Jerry Nance of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. He notes that missing children who are murdered or never heard from again make up only about 2% of the 850,000 children who are reported missing every year.

American Red Cross fined for violations

The Food and Drug Administration has fined the American Red Cross a record $5.7 million for violating blood-safety laws and the terms of a 2003 consent decree. The fine covers quality assurance, inventory management, control of non-conforming blood products, donor screening and blood component manufacturing issues that turned up during a 2005 inspection of a Red Cross facility in West Henrietta, N.Y. Red Cross spokesman Ryland Dodge said the organization is reviewing the FDA letter that announced the fine.

3 GOP-Led House Races Remain In Dispute (WP/AP)

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Nov. 28 -- Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) won reelection Monday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required.

Unofficial results announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy by 1,055 votes, or 0.4 percent of the vote.

An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than 0.5 percent.

The race was one of a handful that had remained unresolved across the country since Election Day.

Pryce lost Franklin County, the district's most populous, but she retained her overall lead, thanks to votes she picked up in two other counties.

In North Carolina, election officials said a manual recount of randomly chosen precincts will take place Wednesday and Thursday in the 8th District race between Rep. Robin Hayes (R) and Democrat Larry Kissell. Hayes leads by 329 votes.

And Florida officials will start an audit Tuesday of electronic voting machines in the 13th District House race between Democrat Christine Jennings and Republican Vern Buchanan. The state certified Buchanan the winner by 369 votes, but Jennings contested, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned.

The Campaign Is Still On (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Forget recounts; in Texas, there is an actual campaign. Representative Henry Bonilla, a Republican, faces a runoff on Dec. 12 after failing to gain a majority of votes on Election Day. (Texas is one of a few states that require runoffs when no candidate breaks 50 percent.)

Mr. Bonilla, left, won 48.6 percent of the vote. His opponent, Ciro Rodriguez, led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent.

The race is a hangover from the redistricting battle: when the State Legislature redrew the map in 2003, Mr. Rodriguez lost his seat in another district, and Mr. Bonilla was made safer in his. But the map was redrawn this summer after the Supreme Court threw out the Texas plan, restoring some balance between the parties. KATE ZERNIKE

Poll: Giuliani, McCain, Obama Rank High (WP/AP)

By John Christoffersen

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Americans have the warmest feelings about former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, according to a poll released Monday that scores the popularity of national leaders.

The Quinnipiac University's "thermometer reading," taken the week after the Nov. 7 election, asked voters to rate their feelings for 20 leaders on a scale of 0 to 100.

Giuliani, a Republican weighing a presidential bid in 2008, scored the highest at 64.2. Obama and McCain, who are also considering a 2008 campaign, finished next at 58.8 and 57.7.

President Bush was 15th out of 20 while his secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, was fourth and former President Clinton fifth.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton scored ninth of the 20 leaders with a score of 49. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic nominee who was roundly criticized before the election for suggesting that students who don't study could end up stuck in Iraq, came in last at 39.6.

Kerry later apologized for what he said was a botched joke.

Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the next House Speaker, improved her standing, moving from last to 12th in a few weeks. The next Senate Majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid, was 19th.

"As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions," said Peter Brown, assistant poll director. "They are well-regarded and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but four in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion."

The telephone poll was conducted from Nov. 13-19. Quinnipiac surveyed 1,623 registered voters nationwide and the poll has a sampling error margin of plus or minus 2.4 percentage points.

Giuliani Tops Most Popular U.S. Politician Polling (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Rudolph W. Giuliani is the most popular politician in America, according to a new survey. The former New York City mayor, a likely candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, tops a list of 20 leaders whose popularity with registered voters was measured in a new survey by Quinnipiac University.

The survey asked respondents to rate their feelings about the 20 leaders on a "thermometer reading" scale of 0 to 100. Mr. Giuliani finished with a 64.2 rating. Trailing closely were Sens. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican, who tallied 58.8 and 57.7. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was the top-ranking woman in the survey, finishing just behind Mr. McCain with a 56.1 rating.

"As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions," said Quinnipiac assistant poll director Peter A. Brown. "They are well-regarded, and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but 4 in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion."

Despite concerns that his liberal views on social issues will hurt him with Republican primary voters, Mr. Giuliani continues to lead the field in nearly every publicly released presidential poll.

President Bush did not fare nearly as well, coming in at number 15 with a 43.8 rating. Former President Bill Clinton topped Mr. Bush with a 55.8 rating and a fifth-place finish. However, Mr. Bush did top 2004 rival Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, who finished 20th in the survey, with a 39.6 rating.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, finished ninth in the survey with a 49-point ranking. Mrs. Clinton is now considered the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi finished in 12th place, with a 46.9 rating. That marks a substantial increase for Mrs. Pelosi, who did not make the top 20 in the last Quinnipiac survey.

"In September, most Americans did not know enough about U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, and those who did didn't like what they knew," Mr. Brown said. "Now, perhaps because everyone likes a winner, she has increased her standing with the American people."

Miss Rice's high rating in the survey was particularly impressive considering she is the only individual placing in the top 10 who has not previously sought elected office. Excluding Miss Rice, seven of the top 10 are considered likely presidential candidates in 2008.

"I was very excited to see how well she did," said Richard Holt, a founding member of the National Black Republican Association. "She'd make an excellent candidate."

Survey respondents also named Miss Rice as the most powerful woman in America, topping Mrs. Clinton 45 percent to 29 percent. Twenty-three percent selected Mrs. Pelosi.

However, Mrs. Clinton topped Miss Rice in the same survey when respondents were asked which female leader they think is best qualified to serve as president.

Fifty-six percent said Mrs. Clinton is most qualified to serve as president. Miss Rice finished a close second with 50 percent. Meanwhile, 47 percent said they do not think Mrs. Pelosi is qualified for the White House.

Can The GOP Find Its Center? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

"The center does not try to read anybody out of the party," the experienced Republican politician declared. "But the farther you go in either direction, the greater the inclination to read others out." He deplored party purges as "political cannibalism" and insisted: "The center must lead."

That was Richard M. Nixon, about a week after Barry Goldwater's landslide defeat at the hands of Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964.

Nixon was to succeed in reconstituting a Republican center that propelled him to the presidency four years later. But that center could not hold. As J. William Middendorf II recounts in "A Glorious Disaster," his book on the Goldwater campaign with the pitch-perfect title, the movement led by the conservative Arizona senator, not Nixon, shaped the Republican future.

This fall's election defeat was inglorious for Republicans because it ratified Nixon's original worries about the cost of chasing away the GOP's moderates and revealed that the Barry Goldwater-Ronald Reagan political settlement has expired.

You wouldn't know that listening to Republican congressional leaders who still think all will be well if the party just hugs the old conservative faith a little harder.

Thus did House Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio promise "to fight for a smaller, less costly and more accountable federal government." Thus did the great conservative hope, Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, promise to steer the Republican Party "back to the principles of limited government, fiscal discipline and traditional moral values."

But such boilerplate will not solve the new problems Republicans confront.

The first is obvious: The party's credibility on national security has been shattered by the failure of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq. Many Republicans know this, which is why President Bush's biggest problem in his last two years will be not the Democratic opposition to the war but the growing ranks of Republican political pragmatists who want to separate themselves from Bush's Middle East venture.

The second is less obvious but no less important: Pro-market libertarians and pro-family social conservatives are more aware than ever that their respective values and interests do not coincide.

In an article in the latest issue of the conservative Weekly Standard, Yuval Levin, a fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, explains the tension between the market and the family as clearly as anyone has:

"The market values risk-taking and creative destruction that can be very bad for family life, and rewards the lowest common cultural denominator in ways that can undermine traditional morality. Traditional values, on the other hand, discourage the spirit of competition and self-interested ambition essential for free markets to work, and their adherents sometimes seek to enforce codes of conduct that constrain individual freedom. The libertarian and the traditionalist are not natural allies."

Levin acknowledges that the policy fixes he proposes (including health-care portability, long-term care insurance and school choice) are "barely a start" to what needs to be done for those in what he calls "the parenting class." Still, he identifies a central conservative problem.

The difficulty, of course, is that a conservatism that cares only about "limited government," "fiscal discipline" and preaching about "traditional moral values" will shy away from Levin's practical, problem-solving approach by government that might involve -- horrors! -- new or different kinds of spending.

That's one reason the decline of the moderate Republicans hurts the party: The moderates were always looking for innovative ways to use government for practical ends. And as an electoral matter, the 2006 vote proved that if Republicans lose too many of their moderate members in areas such as New England, the mid-Atlantic states and the Midwest, they no longer have a majority. Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, said moderates had, to no avail, warned their leadership of "the consequences of pushing a legislative agenda kowtowing to the far right in our party."

The flight from a solution-oriented politics designed to deal with the pressures on working- and middle-class families had the final effect of driving many of the onetime Reagan Democrats, the "security moms" and disaffected men over to the Democrats, who enjoyed strong gains in the large swath of households in the $30,000 to $100,000 annual income range.

The GOP desperately needs to disenthrall itself from old thinking. Some inventive Republican presidential candidate might study the policy playbook of a politician who liked to condemn "the brain-dead politics of both parties." His name was Bill Clinton.

Crash The Parties (USAT)

By Don Campbell

USA Today, November 28, 2006

I was young and naive — maybe even delusional — when I began covering Congress and national politics in 1972. But I quickly formed several impressions about the men (and the few women) who wielded power on Capitol Hill and in the two major political parties.

Most of them seemed to be decent people who treated political opponents with respect, or at least basic civility. They were motivated by the pursuit of power, to be sure, but did not use that pursuit to justify character assassination of the opposition as the first line of offense. When the times demanded it, they seemed willing to put the nation's interest ahead of their own political interest — not that the two were always at odds. I even liked some of them.

After I left Washington 20 years later, in 1992, my perspective changed 180 degrees. It was as if those who work in Washington and those who live outside it occupy separate universes.

Columnist Finley Peter Dunne's bartender, Mr. Dooley, famously said that "politics ain't beanbag," and I agree. I have a strong stomach, but the partisanship and political slander that in the past decade have come to characterize virtually every utterance have driven me to become nauseated almost every time a Washington politician appears on my TV screen.

I had given up hope and interest in politics until I recently had conversations with two old political hands whose judgment I still respect.

Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Democrat Jimmy Carter's underdog campaign for the White House in 1976, and Douglas Bailey, the veteran Republican consultant and co-founder of the daily online news briefing The Hotline, have teamed up to lead a grassroots movement that promises an alternative to the partisanship that has polarized Washington. The objective of their movement, called Unity08 (www.unity08.com), is to use Internet balloting to forge an independent national ticket for 2008 in which the presidential nominee is from one major party and his or her running mate is from the other major party. Anyone can form a ticket and run, and the organizers hope eventually to attract some recognizable names.

Though such a proposition might sound fanciful, the founders of Unity08 are absolutely serious. To be sure, the technological and logistical hurdles are imposing, but the organizers are methodically moving ahead.

The Internet will be key to Unity08's success. Organizers will use it to raise money and to identify questions to ask candidates on such issues as education, global terrorism, health care, energy independence and corruption in Washington. Unity08 will play down what its organizers call "important but not crucial" issues such as abortion, same-sex marriage and gun control.

The operating premise is that both major parties have been hijacked by extremists on the left and right, leaving a wide swath of voters in the middle without choice or voice. No one should be fooled by the make-nice talk that followed the recent congressional elections. It won't last. But Bailey calls it a "breath of fresh air" that moderates showed some signs of reasserting themselves on Nov. 7.

Bailey recalls that until the 1990s, the major parties traditionally fought over swing voters and split-ticket voters, but he says that both have essentially abandoned that practice. The polarization that comes from catering to the political extremes, Bailey notes, has been exacerbated by cable television news and talk shows that highlight partisan and combative views.

The trend is further fueled, Bailey says, by the entrenchment of partisan incumbents in Congress who owe their political success to state legislators who draw them safe congressional districts and to the Washington lobbyists who line their pockets with campaign cash. Incumbents who, I would add, have reasonably concluded that if they spread enough political pork and constituent service around, the voters will ignore the partisanship that has left them gridlocked on policy issues that matter.

The challenges that Bailey, Jordan and crew face are sizable, starting with the likelihood that political hackers, crazies in the blogosphere and those invested in the status quo — think Washington lobbyists — will try to sabotage the online operation. They will also have to build organizations in all 50 states to get on the general election ballot, after Unity08 nominees are chosen in online voting sometime next year. They are not assuming, as the Howard Dean campaign in 2004 apparently did, that online support automatically translates into turnout on Election Day. They also must create and implement a set of rules that will pass muster with the Federal Election Commission.

But there are just as many reasons to think that they could be a big player in two years: The power of the Internet to organize and communicate, hinted at in 2004, is enormous. By operating mostly on the Internet, Unity08 will have maximum flexibility in deciding when it wants to do things, unlike the political parties, which are bound by rigid schedules and the need to rent convention halls. Jordan sees this as a key advantage.

Moreover, presidential candidate Ross Perot proved in 1992 that you don't have to be aligned with either party to be a major force. He ran one of the wackiest campaigns in modern history and drew nearly 20 million votes.

Ultimately, Jordan says, Unity08 will be a success if it provides a "jolt of reality" to the two major political parties. Now it's up to the American people to provide the electricity.

Doing The Primary Shuffle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Move over, Iowa. Make way, New Hampshire.

Four days after the midterm elections, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a former Democratic presidential nominee vying to play that role again, flew to Greenville, S.C. His running mate in 2004, former Senator John Edwards, appeared in Columbia, S.C., the next weekend. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware addressed about 200 people yesterday at a Rotary Club in Columbia. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa had plans to swing through South Carolina early next week after appearing in Nevada as he introduces himself to voters as a presidential candidate.

It is not that anyone is writing off Iowa and New Hampshire. But the Democratic Party's decision to shuffle its presidential primary schedule, so that Nevada's caucus closely follows Iowa's and South Carolina gets a primary week of its own after New Hampshire's, is changing the early rituals of campaigning, forcing contenders to extend themselves in more states.

The change could hurt candidates like Mr. Vilsack, an Iowan, while benefiting others like Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina. But they are all going to be spending more time on airplanes.

"It's a long trip from Las Vegas to Columbia, S.C.," said Jeff Link, an aide to Mr. Vilsack. DAVID D. KIRKPATRICK

Ex-RNC Chief Set For State Party (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Virginia Republicans say they expect Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to be named the new head of the state party.

"I think he's probably the nominee for that post," Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling, a Gillespie supporter, told The Washington Times. "He's got the background, knowledge and experiences to do the job."

Republicans yesterday told The Times that Mr. Gillespie's election appears imminent now that the other front-runners for the spot -- former Lt. Gov. John H. Hager and Chuck Smith, chairman of Virginia Beach's Republican Party -- dropped out of the race last week in a telephone conference call with the state executive committee.

"I know of no one else whose name is still in the ring," Mr. Smith said. "My understanding is that John Hager and I were the only other two names."

"It was a pretty easy sell," Attorney General Robert McDonnell said. "Ed is an extremely accomplished political figure. He is a proven winner from Northern Virginia who knows how to do grass-roots and raise money."

Mr. Gillespie has lived in Virginia for 13 years.

The official election is scheduled for this weekend at the 23rd annual Donald W. Huffman Advance at the Homestead Resort in Hot Springs -- a Republican retreat where grass-roots activists and elected officials kick off the 2007 state legislative campaign season.

Wayne "Bubba" Ozmore, chairman of the 4th Congressional District Committee, said that tapping Mr. Gillespie for the position would be like "putting a Formula One race car on a NASCAR track."

"He's built for speed and has run at high levels, but you can also get bumped and bruised on the NASCAR track, so it could be interesting," he said.

A New Jersey native who started his career on Capitol Hill as a Senate parking lot attendant, Mr. Gillespie has built a strong reputation as a Republican strategist.

In 1994, he was a top aide to then-Rep. Dick Armey, Texas Republican, and helped draft Republicans' "Contract with America," which many credit with winning Republicans control of the House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years.

In 2000, Mr. Gillespie served as a senior communications adviser for the presidential campaign of then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush and as communications director for his 2001 inauguration.

Mr. Gillespie was a campaign strategist for Sen. Elizabeth Dole in 2002. Mrs. Dole, North Carolina Republican, won by the biggest margin of victory of any Senate candidate in the state in more than 25 years.

From July 2003 to January 2005, he served as chairman of the Republican National Committee. He was the first chairman in 80 years to oversee the re-election of a Republican president while maintaining majorities in both chambers of Congress.

He currently works for Quinn Gillespie and Associates, a bipartisan political consulting firm he co-founded in Washington.

Mr. Gillespie's anticipated selection as party chairman comes as Virginia Republicans mull over why they have fallen short in recent statewide races.

Democrats have won the last two gubernatorial elections, and James H. Webb Jr. secured Democratic control of the U.S. Senate by thwarting the re-election bid of Sen. George Allen, a Republican, this month.

Republicans say they must concentrate on keeping majorities in both chambers of the General Assembly. Next year, all 140 seats in the state Senate and House of Delegates are up for election.

The party also must be ready to replace Sen. John W. Warner if he decides to retire after his term ends in 2008 and field a viable candidate for the 2009 gubernatorial race.

Last week, Mr. Gillespie sent a letter to Virginia Republicans asking them to support his candidacy and outlining his vision for the state party.

He said Republicans must be a bottom-up party, foster unity within the party, increase fundraising operations and promote a positive message "that resonates with voters."

"I am proud to be a Virginian," he wrote in the letter. "I am proud to be a Republican. I would be proud to be Chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia, and would work hard to make you proud if you find me worthy of that position."

Court Rejects Maine School Vouchers Case (AP-Y)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court decided Monday not to plunge into the issue of school choice, passing up a dispute over a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools.

A conservative group, the Institute for Justice, had asked the justices to take the case. The group is representing eight Maine families who would receive public tuition funds but for the fact that their children attend religious schools.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and President Bush's homestate of Texas had weighed in, saying in filings to the Supreme Court that Maine is unconstitutionally discriminating against religion.

Vouchers are championed by the president and many conservatives who call them a ticket out of dismal and dangerous public schools. However, those who champion public education say that vouchers divert already-scarce resources from a system badly in need of repair.

School districts in 145 small towns in Maine that have no high schools currently offer tuition for 17,000 students to attend high schools of their choice, public or private, in-state or out-of-state. But religious schools are no longer on the list. Maine's school system dates back to 1879.

In 1980, the state attorney general said the program violated the U.S. Constitution's Establishment Clause. The Maine Legislature made it law in 1983.

Last April, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court ruled that restrictions on tuition vouchers are a valid, constitutional enactment. The court said the state attorney general and the legislature were motivated by a desire to respect and comply with the Constitution rather than any religious hostility.

Dick Komer, the senior litigation attorney for the Institute for Justice, said Maine is engaging in blatant government discrimination against parents who choose religious schools and that it is "appalling that the nation's highest court" lets it continue.

In upholding the exclusion of religious schools from the system, the Maine court relied on a 2004 U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding a Washington state college scholarship program prohibiting the use of scholarship funds for pursuit of a devotional theology degree.

The Institute for Justice said the Maine case gives the justices an opportunity to make clear that its 2004 decision only carved out a narrow exception to the general rule requiring equal treatment of religious and nonreligious options.

In asking the Supreme Court to take the case, the Maine families cited the court's 2002 decision allowing the use of public funds in inner-city Cleveland to underwrite tuition at private or parochial schools if parents retain a wide choice of where to send their children.

The Maine case is Kevin and Julia Anderson v. Durham School Department, 06-132.

No Tax Money For Stem Cells (LAT)

By Sigrid Fry-revere

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

CANDIDATES WHO promised to advance stem cell research fared well in this month's elections. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said that stem cell therapy has "the biblical power to cure," and others have touted public funding for stem cell research as key to finding cures for everything from Parkinson's disease and multiple sclerosis to hundreds of rare immune and genetic disorders.

Politicians are right that stem cells hold the promise of incredible medical progress. But we won't achieve the promised results if we insist on public funding of the research. In fact, government-funded research has proved bureaucratic, expensive, wasteful, fickle and divisive. Since 2003, five states — Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Connecticut and California — have pledged billions of dollars to support stem cell research. But political opposition has prevented all but a few million dollars from reaching researchers. This year, six more states pledged funds — but none have paid up. In 2004, California voters approved Proposition 71, which provided $3 billion in public funds for stem cell research. Two years later, challenges to its constitutionality are still pending. Religious and taxpayer groups lost a first round in court, but their appeals, or any other state attempts to fund stem cell research, are likely to be tied up in court for at least another year.

Luckily for California, several private philanthropic organizations have loaned the state $14 million to start providing grants. This confirms the conclusions of a September 2005 article in the Journal of the American Medical Assn., which found that when public funding for research lapses, private funders almost always step in to take up the slack, often funding projects at a higher rate than did the government.

Other states have had similar experiences. The Ohio governor earmarked $19.4 million for Case Western University for stem cell research, but the Legislature banned it. Funds pledged by Illinois and New Jersey — $10 million and $5 million, respectively — are tied up in legislative limbo because politicians can't agree on what types of stem cell research should be funded and where the money should come from. Only one state got it right: Missouri. This month, voters passed a ballot initiative amending the Missouri Constitution to protect the right to pursue and benefit from any stem cell research or therapies allowed under federal law or available to other Americans. Government funding was not the issue; it was the need to guarantee that research could proceed without political interference. The Stowers Institute for Medical Research was standing by with $2 billion in funding. Once the amendment passed, research began within days.

Such private funders are also more efficient than government at doling out research money. After paying administrative costs and interest on the bonds that will have to be issued, Californians will end up forking over more than $6 billion for less than $2.8 billion for stem cell research.

To be sure, private organizations attach strings. Many want access to lab financial records, and some discontinue funding if dissatisfied with how research is conducted. But such accountability is important in research. And when stem cell research is not a political football, less time and money is wasted on campaigns, bureaucracy and litigation. More important, those who object to the research aren't forced to fund it.

The development of in vitro fertilization provides a perfect model. For years, researchers lobbied government to fund IVF, but amid Luddite cries that "test-tube babies" would lead to societal ruin, funding was denied at every turn. As a result, the federal government didn't spend a cent on the development of IVF. Scientists complained that there would be a brain drain away from the U.S. to countries where such research was publicly funded, and that the U.S. would fall behind in the development of new reproductive technologies. None of these gloomy predictions came true. Today, infertility treatment is a $16-billion-a-year industry in the United States.

The stem cell debate evokes déjà vu. Geron Corp. has already invested twice as much in stem cell research as the federal government, and Harvard University has received more requests for money to fund such research than the National Institutes of Health. Some estimate that the stem cell industry will amount to $10 billion by 2010.

Stem cells hold more promise than any breakthrough since Watson and Crick discovered the structure of DNA. But governments should not make promises that they cannot keep due to political opposition and their own inefficiency. The false hope that the government is taking care of stem cell research will only inhibit private donors and investors from stepping up to the plate.

We should legalize stem cell research in all its forms, protecting universities and private organizations from the uncertainties of political whims — and leave it at that.

Dial Joe-4-Chávez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez is an ally of the Iranian mullahs, a supporter of North Korea, a close friend of Fidel Castro and a good customer for Vladimir Putin's weapon factories. Now he's also a business partner of Joseph P. Kennedy II.

The former Democratic Congressman describes the deal he's cooked up with Mr. Chávez as charity for low-income consumers of heating oil. But it's worth asking what the price of this largesse is to Venezuelans and to U.S. security interests.

The arrangement is this: Mr. Chávez's Citgo -- a Houston-based oil company owned by the Venezuelan government -- is supplying home heating oil to Mr. Kennedy's Citizens Energy Corporation at a 40% discount. Citizens, a nonprofit outfit, says it passes the savings onto the poor, aiming to help 400,000 homes in 16 states that would otherwise have trouble heating their homes. In the process, Mr. Kennedy happens to get a high-profile publicity plug. If you think you qualify, says the television ad that drew our attention to this partnership, just dial 1-877-Joe-4-Oil.

Generous Joe is not the only one polishing his public image here. In the mold of the Castro strategy of sending armies of "doctors" and "teachers" among the Latin American poor, Mr. Chávez is trying to shape U.S. public opinion in the hope that more gringos will come to see the Chávez government as benevolent.

Massachusetts Democrats seem especially eager to help. In a September 29, 2005, "confidential memorandum" addressed to "President Hugo Chávez" and uncovered by a Congressional committee, William Delahunt (D., Mass.) gushed that it was a "pleasure" to have met with the strongman "to discuss your generous offer." The Democrat advised Mr. Chávez to steer his oil through Mr. Kennedy's nonprofit and declared that "from a public relations perspective" the discount oil scheme "is an extraordinary opportunity to address urgent needs of people living in poverty, while showcasing the compassion of your nation."

Compassion? If fighting poverty is the goal, Mr. Delahunt would do better to remind Mr. Chávez that charity begins at home. The U.S. is far richer than Venezuela and since Hurricane Hugo took power in 1999 Venezuelan living standards have suffered despite soaring oil prices. Annual inflation averaged more than 20% between 2001 and 2005, imposing a tax on the poorest. Meanwhile, an insecure investment climate has taken a harsh toll on private-sector employment and shrunk the middle class.

In his eight years in power, Mr. Kennedy's business partner has also polarized Venezuela with his class warfare, rewritten the constitution, politicized the judiciary, the electoral council and military, and announced he plans to rule until 2021. Freedom

House now ranks Venezuela 34th out of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere in press freedom. Only the Cuban press is more repressed.

Transparency International puts Venezuela second to last in the Hemisphere in its 2006 "corruption perception index." And then there was that revealing rant against President Bush ("the devil") at the United Nations in September. Even Mr. Delahunt criticized his Venezuelan buddy after that one.

But Mr. Kennedy keeps on trucking. Last week in a telephone interview with the Washington Post, he defended his Chávez subsidy deal as "morally righteous," arguing that the Citgo contribution to his nonprofit is only "one-half of one percent" of Citgo oil and product sales in the U.S.

We dialed Joe-4-Oil ourselves to ask directly whether it is also "righteous" to assist an anti-American tyrant at the expense of the Venezuelan people. In between berating our reporter for daring to ask such a thing, Mr. Kennedy said that Mr. Chávez has done "so much more" for the poor than any previous government. As for democracy, he said there was "ample room for improvement in the ways that people get elected in Venezuela as well as in Florida." Mr. Chávez chose his partner well.

Israeli Premier Makes An Offer To Palestinians (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 27 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, trying to build on a shaky cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, on Monday offered Palestinians a series of incentives, including negotiations and a prisoner release, if they turned away from violence.

The offer was made in what was billed as a major policy speech, but it contained little that was new. The timing was important, though, because Mr. Olmert and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, are eager to bolster their own political positions, begin a serious dialogue and stop a bloody cycle of violence.

President Bush will be in Jordan this week to discuss Iraq and other regional issues. On Sunday, Jordan's king, Abdullah II, warned of "the strong potential of three civil wars in the region, whether it's the Palestinians, that of Lebanon or of Iraq."

Expectations are high that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice may come here after Jordan to try to solidify the fragile attempt at reconciliation that Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert are discussing, which may include an extension of the cease-fire to the West Bank.

In his speech, Mr. Olmert appealed to Palestinians to turn away from militant resistance and make a commitment to peaceful negotiations for an independent state. "You, the Palestinian people," he said, "are standing in these days at an historic crossroads."

If the Palestinians can form a new unity government that satisfies international standards and release a captured Israeli soldier, Mr. Olmert said, he will respond by immediately meeting with Mr. Abbas, releasing hundreds of Palestinian prisoners, reducing checkpoints and moving toward a further withdrawal of Israeli settlers from the occupied West Bank.

He promised that Israel would also then release to the Palestinian Authority the $50 million a month in taxes and duties that Israel has collected for the Palestinians but withheld — more than $500 million so far this year — contending that Hamas, the governing Palestinian faction, is a terrorist group.

But those steps, essentially confidence-rebuilding measures, are far short of serious negotiations to end a conflict that is nearly 60 years old.

One of the new elements in the speech was more subtle, an Israeli official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the content of the speech publicly. He pointed to Mr. Olmert's praise for moderate Arab countries like Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Persian Gulf states that "strive for a peaceful solution to the conflict between us." Mr. Olmert said he found parts of a 2002 Saudi peace initiative to be "positive," the first time an Israeli leader has done so, the official said.

The Saudi initiative, supported by the Arab League, offered normal relations with Israel in return for an Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 boundaries, the establishment of a Palestinian state and a just solution to the issue of Palestinian refugees. Mr. Olmert has said that Israel will not return to the borders predating the 1967 Arab-Israeli war but that it is willing to negotiate land swaps.

"I intend to invest efforts in order to advance the connection" with the moderate Arab states, he said, "and strengthen their support of direct bilateral negotiations between us and the Palestinians."

Palestinian reaction was cautious. Hamas, which does not recognize Israel's right to exist, was unenthusiastic. A spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government, Ghazi Hamad, said Mr. Olmert had not specified borders and was not willing to release enough prisoners. Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator and aide to Mr. Abbas, said that "most important is to sustain the cease-fire" and extend it to the West Bank "in the next few days." That would "pave the way for a political horizon," he said.

Within hours of Mr. Olmert's address, delivered in the Negev town of Sde Boker at a commemoration for Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, Palestinian militants in Gaza fired two rockets toward Sderot in Israel, despite the cease-fire. One landed in Gaza, the other in the Sderot cemetery. There were no reported casualties.

Responsibility for the rocket fire was taken by Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, a group that belongs to Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction. Mr. Erekat asked for patience.

The militants said they were responding to the killing of two Palestinians and the arrest of 15 in an Israeli raid on Monday in the West Bank, where a truce is not in effect and where Israel discovered a bomb factory on Sunday.

One of the dead was a militant commander, Abdel Razek Bahar, 22, of the Popular Resistance Committees; the other was a passer-by, Fatma Nezal, a 55-year-old woman, Palestinians said. The Israeli Army said its forces had been fired on and were returning fire.

Mr. Olmert argued to the Palestinians that the election of Hamas and "the uncompromising extremism of your terror organizations" have not brought Palestinians closer "to achieving the goal that I'm convinced many of you share to establish a Palestinian state." Hamas argues that Israel does not make concessions through negotiations, but only when faced with "resistance to occupation."

Mr. Olmert said that "in the framework" of talks and the "road map," an internationally backed outline for peace negotiations, Israel "will agree to the evacuation of many territories and communities we have created," a reference to Jewish settlements built since 1967 in the West Bank, which are regarded as illegal by much of the world. Mr. Olmert was elected in March on a program to carry out a withdrawal of up to 80,000 Israeli settlers from part of the West Bank.

But with the violence in and around Gaza and the war last summer with Hezbollah in Lebanon, the idea of unilateral withdrawals has been sharply criticized in Israel, and Mr. Olmert shelved his plan. He seems to be trying to revive the idea, but in the context of talks with Mr. Abbas.

Olmert 'ready To Free Jailed Palestinians' (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

The Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert said publicly for the first time on Monday that Palestinian prisoners would be released if a captured Israeli soldier were freed first.

Mr Olmert also offered humanitarian concessions in return for an end to violence soon after a truce was announced in the Gaza Strip and days ahead of a visit by George W. Bush, US president, to neighbouring Jordan for talks with Iraqi prime minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The Palestinians said they were ready for peace talks immediately but Mr Olmert set various conditions before the resumption of any direct discussions. The conditions included the release of Corporal Gilad Shalit, captured in June, and the formation of a new government to replace the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

Palestinians welcomed the possibility of efforts to ease humanitarian conditions, made worse under a western aid boycott since Hamas came to power in March. But they still doubted Israel's intention to create a Palestinian state that is viable and settle thorny issues that remain at the heart of the conflict, such as the division of Jerusalem and refugees.

Mr Olmert made no mention of an earlier plan to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank, a policy shelved after the summer war against Hizbollah in Lebanon.

"I think the Israelis are working towards something like parallel unilateralism whereby both sides make moves, perhaps towards some sort of interim Palestinian state, but the process falls short of full bilateralism," said an advisor to the Palestinian leadership.

Mr Olmert did make reference to an initiative recently revamped by moderate Arab states, offering full normalisation of relations with Israel in return for an internationally recognised Palestinian state.

Countries such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan have been pressing Washington over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying it would make it easier for them to present a common front on a host of regional crises, from the violence in Iraq to Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"I have been following with great appreciation the serious efforts made by these [Arab] states to bring about a cessation of violence in the region and I respect their sincere desire to create a new atmosphere between us," said Mr Olmert.

Mr Bush was expected to focus on Iraq during his visit to the Jordanian capital Amman tomorrow (weds) and Thursday. Palestinian officials also said there was a possibility of Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's Palestinian president, meeting Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, also in Amman this week.

No talks between Mr Bush and Ms Rice and any Israeli officials were scheduled. "At this point in time, it's probably best if Bush were not to meet any Israelis," said an Israeli government official.

Olmert Urges Palestinians To Seek Peace (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, November 28, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert reached out to the Palestinians on Monday in one of his most conciliatory speeches yet, saying he was prepared to grant them a state, release desperately needed funds and free prisoners if they choose the path of peace.

Olmert's remarks sealed a dramatic policy shift and built on a day-old truce meant to end five months of violence in the Gaza Strip. But new rocket attacks by Palestinian militants threatened the latest rapprochement.

"I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," Olmert said.

"We cannot change the past and we will not be able to bring back the victims on both sides of the borders," he said. "All that we can do today is stop additional tragedies."

Olmert appealed to the Palestinians to form a new, moderate Cabinet committed to carrying out a U.S.-backed peace plan and securing the release of a captured Israeli soldier.

Once such a government was established, Olmert said, he would call for an immediate meeting with the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, "to have a real, open, honest, serious dialogue between us."

Palestinian legislator Saeb Erekat, a top Abbas aide, said the Palestinians were ready to negotiate a final peace deal.

"I believe Mr. Olmert knows he has a partner, and that is President Abbas. He knows that to achieve peace and security for all, we need to shoot for the end game," Erekat said.

But the Palestinian Cabinet, led by Hamas militants who reject Israel's right to exist, accused Olmert of posturing.

"This is a conspiracy. This is a new maneuver. Olmert is speaking about the Palestinian state without giving details about the borders," said Ghazi Hamad, a government spokesman.

Olmert's speech raised the diplomatic stakes ahead of President Bush's scheduled trip to neighboring Jordan this week for talks with Iraqi leaders.

Erekat said it was possible Abbas would meet with Bush there, but Israeli officials denied that Abbas and Olmert might meet on the sidelines of the Bush visit.

Olmert was elected in March promising to set Israel's final borders with the Palestinians by uprooting isolated communities dotted all over the West Bank while holding on to major settlement blocs. Israel, Olmert said, would act unilaterally without a Palestinian peace partner — something it appeared inclined to conclude because of Hamas' violently anti-Israel ideology.

But a summer war with Lebanese guerrillas, which many Israelis blamed on their unilateral pullout from southern Lebanon six years ago, left Israelis cool to ceding more territory, and Olmert shelved that plan.

His speech Monday signaled a final break with that program — and an attempt to entice the Palestinians back to the negotiating table by outlining likely Israeli concessions under a future peace deal.

"We, the state of Israel, will agree to the evacuation of many territories and the settlements that we built there. This is extremely difficult for us, like the splitting of the Red Sea. We will do it for real peace," he said.

Israel would pull out of West Bank land and uproot settlements under a peace deal, Olmert said.

In return for a serious Palestinian push for peace, he said, Israel would be prepared to reduce checkpoints that have severely restricted movement in the West Bank; release hundreds of millions of dollars in funds frozen after Hamas took power in March; and free some of the thousands of Palestinian prisoners Israel holds if Hamas-linked militants release — alive and healthy — an Israeli soldier they captured in June.

The freezing of funds has created great hardship in the Palestinian territories by rendering the Hamas government unable to pay full salaries to its civil servants, who provide for one-third of the Palestinian people.

A significant prisoner release would be a major confidence-building gesture because prisoners hold great weight in Palestinian society.

Israeli government officials said they had not ruled out releasing Palestinian uprising leader Marwan Barghouti, who is serving five life sentences for masterminding deadly attacks.

In exchange for Israeli concessions, Olmert said, Palestinians would have to renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to live in peace and security and give up their demands to allow refugees from the 1948 Mideast War to return to their homes in what is now Israel.

"The uncompromising extremism of your terror organizations ... hasn't brought you closer to achieving the goal that I'm convinced many of you share — to establish a Palestinian state," he said.

Hamad, the Palestinian government spokesman, said Palestinians would not abandon the fight for refugees.

"It is a main part of the Palestinian cause," he said.

Olmert's offer to revive stalled peace talks came a day after the two sides began observing a cease-fire in Gaza, raising hopes new peace efforts would follow.

Palestinian militants violated the cease-fire by launching two rockets at Israel on Monday. No one was injured, but Israel has threatened to strike back if rocket attacks increase.

The Army of Islam, a militant group linked to Hamas which claimed responsibility for seizing the Israeli soldier in June, has refused to abide by a cease-fire with Israel, according to an Internet statement posted on Monday.

Erekat said he was working with the Israelis to expand the cease-fire to the West Bank and hoped to have an agreement within days. Israeli officials said they would wait to see what happens in Gaza first.

"If the cease-fire in Gaza works, I hope it will be possible to transfer that more positive reality to the West Bank as well," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said.

Israeli Leader Olmert Makes Peace Overtures (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Seeking to build on a shaky cease-fire with the Palestinians, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert offered Monday to free prisoners, lift checkpoints and release funds withheld from the Palestinian Authority in return for decisive steps toward peace.

In one of his most conciliatory speeches, Olmert spelled out Israel's likely concessions under a final peace accord, including a withdrawal of its troops and many of its settlements from the West Bank, and the establishment of a Palestinian state.

"I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," he said during a ceremony at the tomb of David Ben-Gurion, Israel's founding father.

The offer was a switch for Olmert, who declared during his election campaign last spring that no Palestinian leader was capable of making a deal with Israel. Since his election, he has worked to isolate the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

Monday, he invited the Palestinians to help negotiate a lasting settlement, saying they stand at a "historic crossroads."

DOJ_NMG_0098915

Hours after the speech, two rockets fired from the Gaza Strip fell harmlessly in the Israeli border town of Sderot, violating a truce started two days ago and threatening to undercut U.S.-backed diplomatic steps toward a meeting between Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Palestinian leaders reacted to Olmert's initiative with caution and skepticism.

"We want serious negotiations," said Nabil Abu Rudaineh, a spokesman for Abbas, whose Fatah Party is more moderate than Hamas. The spokesman welcomed the prospect of a release of prisoners and funds but added: "We want to see acts, not just words."

Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas government spokesman, dismissed the Israeli leader's speech as "a new maneuver" but did not reject the idea of talks between the two sides.

"Olmert is speaking about the Palestinian state without giving details about the borders," the spokesman said.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Bush administration viewed Olmert's speech as "constructive" and was working with moderate Arab states to help Israel and the Palestinians overcome their differences. President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plan to visit Jordan on Wednesday, for talks about the conflicts here and in Iraq.

Olmert spelled out his conditions for a revival of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, which collapsed nearly six years ago at the start of a Palestinian uprising.

First, he said, the Palestinians must release Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit, whose capture in a cross-border raid by Hamas and other armed groups in June set off five months of fighting that the weekend cease-fire accord aimed to halt.

And, he said, the Palestinians must establish a new government committed to principles set by the United States and other Western governments but so far rejected by Hamas: recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous Israeli-Arab peace accords.

On those terms, Olmert said he would invite Abbas "to meet with me immediately in order to conduct a real, open, genuine and serious dialogue" aimed at the creation of "an independent and viable Palestinian state."

The captured soldier's safe return, Olmert added, would bring about the release of "numerous Palestinian prisoners, including ones who were sentenced to lengthy prison terms, in order to increase the trust between us."

Also, he said, the Palestinian government would get hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue that Israel collected but withheld after Hamas came to power in March. Checkpoints would be lifted, easing travel in the Israeli-occupied West Bank.

Both of Olmert's conditions seem attainable. Negotiations over an exchange of Palestinian prisoners for Shalit have made progress in recent days under Egyptian mediators, who reportedly have persuaded Hamas to reduce their prisoner list from 1,400 to a few hundred.

Disagreement remains, however, on whether the Israeli soldier should be freed first.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, tentatively has agreed to step down in favor of a unity government made up of Hamas and more moderate groups and led by a technocrat not affiliated with any party.

Talks on the makeup of such a government have dragged. But Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign-policy chief, who met recently with Abbas, said Monday that "something is moving" and a new government is "pretty near."

Palestinian leaders say a unity government would give Abbas exclusive authority to negotiate with Israel. Such a formula, they say, would make it unnecessary for Hamas to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

Olmert's critics in Israel worry that Hamas, flush from an arms buildup in Gaza, would pull the strings of any government that emerges and block any significant concessions to Israel. They say the cease-fire will damage Israel by allowing Hamas to stockpile weapons more freely.

But the Israeli leader's peace initiative has breathed a new sense of purpose into his coalition government, which has been increasingly unpopular since the country's inconclusive summer war in Lebanon.

In his speech, Olmert said leaving the West Bank would be "extremely difficult for us, akin to the parting of the Red Sea," but said he would agree to a pullout if the Palestinians "stop the terror..., recognize our right to live in peace" and stop demanding a return of all Palestinian refugees.

Olmert's initiative was already being threatened Monday by militant resistance. The armed wing of Fatah said it fired rockets from Gaza to protest Israel's ongoing operations against fighters in the West Bank, which is not covered by the truce.

The rocket attack followed an Israeli raid on the West Bank town of Qabatiya, where Israeli soldiers killed a 22-year-old male Palestinian fighter and a 57-year-old woman during an exchange of gunfire. The Israelis said the woman tried to pick up the dead man's gun; Palestinian witnesses said she was trying to help him get medical attention.

Get Real, Hamas (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

WHETHER THE impetus was a shaky cease-fire in the Gaza Strip or President Bush's visit to the Middle East, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday unexpectedly extended an olive branch to the Palestinians. If the Palestinian Authority — including the Islamic party Hamas — doesn't respond in kind, it will be yet another golden opportunity for Mideast peace squandered.

Speaking against the backdrop of a truce designed to end months of violence in Gaza, Olmert offered to engage Palestinians in new talks to create something even many liberal Israelis once considered unthinkable: an independent Palestinian state.

Declaring that "I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," Olmert offered to uproot Jewish settlements in the West Bank, reduce the number of checkpoints, unfreeze funds withheld from the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority and release "numerous Palestinian prisoners, including ones who are sentenced to lengthy prison terms."

In exchange, the nascent state of Palestine, and its Hamas-led Cabinet, would have to recognize Israel's right to exist, and Hamas would have to return Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June. The stage would then be set for negotiations toward the two-state solution envisioned in the "road map" for peace endorsed in 2002 by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union.

The timing of Olmert's initiative could cause him political problems at home. Given Israel's unsatisfying war against Hezbollah in Lebanon last summer, continued violence in the Gaza Strip and disarray in the Palestinian Authority, Olmert was expected to shy away not just from negotiations but from his own proposal for unilateral Israeli withdrawal from some occupied territories.

Especially delicate is Olmert's willingness to trade captured Palestinian prisoners for Shalit, considering that when Hezbollah guerrillas from Lebanon kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in July for the express purpose of forcing a prisoner swap, Israel responded with a retaliatory attack that eventually killed 1,200 Lebanese (most of them civilians) and 157 Israelis.

It would be a tragedy, most of all for the Palestinians, if Olmert's initiative were rebuffed. Hamas is not being asked to approve of the creation of Israel half a century ago, only to recognize that the modern Jewish state is a legal government endorsed by the United Nations and deserving of security. It's not enough for Hamas to enter into a hudna, or 10-year truce — a scenario floated by Ahmed Yousef, an advisor to Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniya. Hamas' recognition should be a nonnegotiable issue both for Israel and the United States.

The late Yasser Arafat dawdled and dissembled for years before finally accepting Israel's existence, a belated accommodation to reality that led to a White House invitation for the erstwhile terrorist and the creation of the Palestinian Authority. If Hamas is willing to recognize the same fact of life, the benefits for the Palestinians could be even more dramatic.

Rice May See Olmert, Abbas Separately (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 28, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice may confer separately with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas while she and President Bush are in the Mideast this week, but the U.S. is unlikely to broker a direct meeting between the Mideast leaders, a U.S. official said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0098917

Israeli officials also rejected the possibility of a summit between Abbas and Olmert on the sidelines of Bush's visit to neighboring Jordan later this week. Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin said the sides were discussing when the leaders would meet, but no date had been set.

A summit between Olmert and Abbas would represent a renewed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians, especially if the meeting carried the imprimatur of the United States. Moderate Arab states allied with the United States have been urging more forceful U.S. involvement, possibly including a three-way peacemaking summit in the mold of the groundbreaking Camp David accords.

Olmert, seeking to build on a shaky cease-fire with the Palestinians, offered Monday to reduce checkpoints, release frozen funds and free prisoners in exchange for a serious push for peace by the Palestinians.

Olmert said that if the Palestinians establish a new, moderate Cabinet committed to carrying out the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan and securing the release of a captured Israeli soldier, then he would call for an immediate meeting with Abbas "to have a real, open, honest, serious dialogue."

In what was billed as a major policy speech, Olmert said Israel would also pull out of the West Bank and uproot settlements under a final peace deal.

Rice may see Olmert in Jerusalem and Abbas at his nearby West Bank headquarters on Thursday, the U.S. official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice's schedule is not definite. The official suggested that despite encouraging signs that both sides seem interested in new peace efforts, the United States does not want to rush a two- or three-way meeting.

A lasting peace deal between Israel and its Palestinian neighbors is one of Bush's main foreign policy goals, but it has seemed remote for much of his presidency. Bush is pledged to seeking an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. Major obstacles include the fate of large Israeli settlements on land the Palestinians claim in the West Bank, and the future of Jerusalem.

Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan want the United States to resume its traditional role as shepherd or go-between for the two sides, arguing that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is key to defusing other Mideast problems. Rice may meet with those Arab allies as well as other friendly Persian Gulf nations on the sideline of a Mideast democracy and development session in Dead Sea, Jordan this week. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict would be high on that agenda.

Olmert's offer to restart long-stalled peace talks came a day after the two sides began observing a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip. The cease-fire is meant to end five months of widespread violence in the coastal area.

Relations between Israel and the Palestinians, rocky after more than five years of fighting, further plummeted in January when Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Israel cut off ties with the Hamas-led Cabinet and froze the transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to their government to try to pressure the Islamic group to recognize Israel and renounce violence.

Tensions exploded in June when Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid, sparking a wide-scale Israeli offensive in Gaza that killed more than 300 Palestinians, scores of them civilians. Five Israelis have also been killed in the violence.

N. Korea Nuke Envoy Arrives In Beijing (AP)

By Audra Ang

AP, November 28, 2006

North Korea's nuclear envoy flew into Beijing on Tuesday as his counterparts from the United States, China, South Korea and Japan gathered to hammer out plans to restart talks on dismantling the reclusive nation's nuclear weapons program.

The arrival of North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan has heightened expectations he may meet U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, although no plans have been announced.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a meeting between Hill and Kim is "certainly an open possibility."

"The issue for us is to make sure we are extremely well-planned and ready for the six-party talks, which we do anticipate will get going at some point very soon," Hill said when he arrived in the Chinese capital on Monday.

Officials have yet to determine an exact date for the six-nation disarmament negotiations, which also involve Russia.

Hill met with South Korea's nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, and China's negotiator, Wu Dawei, Tuesday morning, said Susan Stevenson, the spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. She did not have any details on the talks.

Japan's representative Kenichiro Sasae told Japanese reporters that he had held talks with Wu and Hill separately but denied that there were any plans for multilateral discussions between the negotiators.

In Tokyo, Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Sasae and Wu discussed plans for the nuclear talks and bilateral relations.

"We are naturally exchanging opinions on what kind of results the resumption of the six-party talks should produce," Shiozaki said.

An unannounced meeting between Hill and Kim last month in Beijing led to North Korea agreeing to return to the arms negotiations amid heightened tensions after its first nuclear test on Oct. 9.

The talks have been stalled for more than a year because of North Korean anger over financial sanctions imposed by the United States.

Chun has said getting preparations right for progress at the talks was more important than setting a date for restarting the negotiations.

"We will mainly focus on the procedure of the talks as it is essential to accomplish substantial progress rather than talking just for the sake of talking," he told reporters after arriving in Beijing on Monday.

The six-nation talks were last held in November 2005 when the envoys failed to make progress on implementing an earlier agreement, in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"The holding of the six-party talks is on the horizon, so I hope to discuss ways to make progress in the six-way talks, as well as ways for Japan and China to cooperate over the issue," Japan's Sasae said, according to Kyodo News.

Hill said he will stay in Beijing "a couple of days" and then go to Seoul and Tokyo.

US, Chinese Leaders Discuss North Korea, Darfur (AFP)

AFP, November 28, 2006

US President George W. Bush held talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao on North Korea's nuclear program and developments in Sudan's troubled Darfur region, a White House spokesman said.

Bush spoke with Hu during his flight to the Baltics, where the US president will visit Estonia and attend a NATO summit in neighbouring Latvia.

Bush asked for "continued Chinese leadership on various international issues such as the situation in North Korea and Darfur," said the spokesman, Gordon Johndroe, who had arrived in the Estonian capital Tallinn ahead of Bush.

"The two presidents reviewed their good meeting in Hanoi on the margins of the APEC summit and agreed that US-China cooperation is moving forward well, to the benefit of both the American and Chinese people," he said.

The leaders held talks on November 19 on the sidelines of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in Vietnam.

Washington and Beijing have been cooperating to try to relaunch talks aimed at getting North Korea to give up its nuclear activities.

The two countries -- veto-holding members of the UN Security Council -- have also been working to encourage Sudan to allow an international peacekeeping force into Darfur, amid a grave humanitarian crisis there.

Estonian Leader Voices Worry Over Russia (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia, Nov. 27 -- On the eve of the first visit to this tiny Baltic country by a sitting U.S. president, Estonia's new president voiced concern Monday over the poisoning death of a prominent Kremlin critic in London, portraying it as another worrisome signal about the political situation in Russia.

Toomas Hendrik Ilves, 52, grew up in New Jersey and spent 23 years in the United States before renouncing his U.S. citizenship. He said he would not speculate about who was behind the death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. But he said in an interview, "If you see a critic of the Kremlin die with a radioactive chemical polonium that is not one of your regularly available commercial chemicals but rather is one that falls under the purview of state regulation, then it's cause for concern."

He also pointed to the case of another Kremlin critic, journalist Anna Politkovskaya, whose recent killing Litvinenko was investigating. "Coming on the heels of the murder of Politkovskaya -- these are all things that should make all people in the democratic world feel a little edgy," he said.

His comments suggested that Bush will also be discussing growing concern in Europe and the United States over rising authoritarianism in Russia under President Vladimir Putin and his hostile relations with some of the new democracies on Russia's borders. Bush will participate in a round of meetings Tuesday morning with Ilves and other Estonian leaders before flying to Riga, Latvia, for the NATO summit.

Ilves said he would be discussing Russia's difficult relations with some of its neighbors, especially Georgia, which he visited last week for consultations.

The Estonian leader said Russia "seems to treat democracy on its borders, be it Estonian, Ukrainian, Georgian, as a security threat and sees despotism on its borders -- Turkmenistan, Belarus -- as being a good thing as it represents stability. . . . That kind of view is not one which is very conducive and helpful to the security situation on our continent."

Ilves is one of several Baltic leaders who spent large chunks of their lives in North America; Bush will also meet with Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who was a professor of psychology at the University of Montreal. Ilves was born in Sweden to Estonian exiles and moved to the town of Leonia, in northern New Jersey, at age 3.

Ilves said he does not make much of his past connection to the United States. "The parties against me made it a big issue, but obviously it wasn't important enough to be a defining issue," he said. "I have been serving the Estonian state almost from the time independence was reestablished. I renounced my U.S. citizenship. What else can you do?"

OECD Rebukes Kremlin Over Economy (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky In Moscow

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Monday slammed the Russian government for its expansion into key economic sectors and raised concern about the “seemingly insatiable appetite” of Gazprom, its state-run energy giant.

In a critical report on the Russian economy, the OECD also said that the Kremlin’s expansion into key economic areas was a “disturbing trend” that “bodes ill” for the country’s growth.

Instead of concentrating on market reforms, the government had been increasingly focused on tightening the state’s grip on what it deemed to be strategic sectors, which include aviation, media and finance, as well as energy.

“The expansion of state ownership in important sectors will probably contribute to more rent-seeking, less efficiency and slower growth,” the OECD said.

It was particularly concerned by Gazprom’s “seemingly insatiable appetite for asset acquisition, often at the expense of a focus on its core business”. The report follows a chorus of international and domestic criticism of Gazprom’s business strategy.

Instead of investing in gas production, Gazprom has been expanding its interests in recent years in other sectors such as oil, electricity, power generation machinery and media. Last week’s announcement of the purchase of Komsomolskaya Pravda – Russia’s largest circulation newspaper – is its latest foray into media. It also owns an airline, a bank, three television channels, several newspapers, radio stations, cinemas and hotels.

Gazprom’s investment in developing gas fields has been minimal over the past few years, leading to stagnating production. Yet its monopoly over transportation infrastructure has constrained the development of independent gas producers.

The OECD’s criticism comes at a time of growing concern about Russia’s ability to sustain and increase its gas production.

But the report says Gazprom's expansion is part of a wider trend of accumulating assets in state hands. According to one recent estimate, cited by the OECD, the state-owned share of Russia 's equity market capitalisation rose from 20 per cent in mid-2003 to 30 per cent early this year.

The change has been particularly visible in the oil sector where the state share of the total production increased from 16 per cent in 2000 to almost 40 per cent. Yet the growth of oil production has slowed down dramatically over this period.

The OECD traces the beginning of the trend to the expropriation of Yukos's assets in favour of Rosneft, the state-controlled oil company.

It argues that the Yukos affair exemplified the trend towards state ownership.

However, the Russian state has also been extending its reach to non-energy sectors of the economy, including aviation and automotive.

Russia: The Enemy

It's time we start thinking of Vladimir Putin's Russia as an enemy of the United States.

This isn't simply because a former KGB agent turned Putin critic died last week in London after ingesting a dose of polonium 210, an element that usually functions as a neutron trigger in atomic bombs. Nor is it that Alexander Litvinenko's death is the latest in a series of killings, attempted murders, imprisonments and forced exiles whose victims just happened to be prominent opponents of Mr. Putin. It is because the foreign policy of Russia has become openly, and often gratuitously, hostile to the U.S.

Some examples: Last summer, Russia signed a billion-dollar arms deal with Venezuela; Hugo Chávez wasted no time fantasizing aloud about using the weapons to sink an American aircraft carrier. Last week, Russia began deliveries to Iran of highly sophisticated SA-15 anti-aircraft missiles, at a value of $700 million. Russian Defense Minister Igor Ivanov claims the missiles will "have no influence on the balance of power in the region." But the purpose of the missiles is to defend Iran's nuclear sites, which do threaten the balance of power. Mr. Ivanov also says he is "absolutely sure" the billion-dollar Bushehr reactor that Russia is building for Iran could not be used to build nuclear weapons. This is false, and Mr. Ivanov must know it: The spent plutonium from the reactor can easily be diverted and reprocessed to produce as many as 60 bombs.

At the United Nations, Russia has consistently opposed U.S. efforts to sanction Iran and North Korea for their nuclear programs and diluted the effects of the resolutions that were passed. The Russians say they oppose the use of sanctions because they "don't work." It's an odd claim coming from a government that in October brusquely imposed trade, travel and postal sanctions on neighboring Georgia.

It is said often that Russia's motives are essentially mercenary and thus amoral. That's only partly true. Paul Volcker's investigation into the Oil for Food scandal revealed that Russian companies did $19.3 billion in oil deals with Saddam Hussein (by contrast, the French did a mere $4.4 billion) and that Russian individuals were the great beneficiaries of Saddam's illicit largesse -- one reason, perhaps, that Russia vigorously opposed the U.S. invasion. As recently as July Russia had plans to supply North Korea with advanced encryption and nuclear-storage systems. The total value of Russian arms sales to Tehran has risen nearly sixfold in recent years.

Yet Russia hardly depends on Iran as a weapons-export market, to say nothing of North Korea; most of its arms sales are to China and India. So why would Moscow, which has its own grave problems with Islamic radicals, abet the nuclear ambitions of a revolutionary Islamic regime that sponsors terrorism from Buenos Aires to Beirut?

Part of the answer, surely, has to do with the psychology of clientism and Russia's desire to assert and expand its sphere of influence. Part of the answer, too, is that a Russia that can obstruct American purposes -- whether in Latin America, Northeast Asia or the Persian Gulf -- must also be one that is relevant and powerful.

But there is also a fair bit of rank anti-Americanism at play. Take the September contretemps with Georgia, which involved Tbilisi's arrest of four Russian officers it had charged with espionage: Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned darkly at a press conference that "this latest escapade . . . happened straight after NATO's decision to grant Georgia an intensive cooperation plan and [Georgian President] Mikhail Saakashvili's visit to the United States." Was Mr. Lavrov playing to traditional Russian paranoia about the designs of outsiders on the motherland? Or did he really believe that Washington, Brussels and Tbilisi were conspiring trilaterally in this two-bit "plot"?

How does the Litvinenko murder fit into this? Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet dissident now at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, has often made the point that the best predictor of how nations behave toward their neighbors is how they treat their own people. "I think there's a very high probability [the Litvinenko killing] was done by the security services," he says in a telephone interview. The Kremlin's denials notwithstanding, the use of exotic poisons has been a KGB (now FSB) signature for decades, and killing Litvinenko in London would certainly be one way of letting the Kremlin's critics know that nobody is immune anywhere. As for negative public reaction, Mr. Sharansky observes that "experience shows them that it's short-lived."

That's certainly been Mr. Putin's experience with this White House. It was George W. Bush who first saw gold in Mr. Putin's soul, sometime after the Russian had decimated the city of Grozny. It was Condoleezza Rice who came up with the formulation after the Iraq war that the U.S. should "punish France, ignore Germany and forgive Russia." And it was this administration that agreed last week to Russian membership in the World Trade Organization, with Mr. Bush thanking Mr. Putin for "your time and friendship."

A case can be made for bringing Russia into the WTO, but caveat emptor: A government that trashes the rule of law domestically isn't likely to long sit still in any rules-based organization. There is no case for Russia's continued participation as the eighth member of the Group of Seven, once a club for mature democracies only. Putting Mr. Putin on notice that only gentlemen belong in gentlemen's clubs would be the right first step. Treating him for what he is -- "unworthy of the trust of civilized men and women," as Litvinenko wrote from his deathbed -- would be the next.

Orange Revolution's Foe Transformed In Ukraine (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Nov. 27 -- The Orange Revolution, strangely, has been kindest to the man who played the villain to the waves of protesters who rolled onto the streets of this capital two years ago. Viktor Yanukovych, once cast as the bluff hack who tried to steal Ukraine's presidential election, is back in power as prime minister thanks to free and fair parliamentary elections in March that were made possible only by the street protests of late 2004.

As he prepares for his first official trip to Washington, a four-day visit beginning Sunday, Yanukovych is suddenly projecting himself as the voice of democratic reform. He also appears eager to assure his White House hosts that his popular image as a pro-Russian straw man is a gross distortion.

Now, he suggests that he, too, was a catalyst in the transformation of this once stagnating country into the most politically competitive of all the post-Soviet states, a nation where debate is dynamic and where power, ultimately, resides with the people.

"There were many mistakes made by the previous authorities and many injustices," he said in an interview in his office here Monday. "The authorities lost trust. One should recognize that there is more democracy, that there is freedom of speech -- and that is an achievement of these historic events, although I don't call it a revolution."

Yanukovych bears little resemblance to the figure who provoked tens of thousands of Ukrainians to demonstrate against electoral fraud in 2004, eventually sweeping his opponent, Viktor Yushchenko, into the presidency. And some question the sincerity of what they see as his self-serving rhetoric.

"He talks like he was part of it," said David Zhvania, a member of parliament and financier of Yushchenko's campaign and the protests in Kiev's Independence Square. "It's a game. We showed Ukrainians why he was scary, but we also explained to Yanukovych why he was scary, and from his first day in power we saw that he was listening."

For others, however, the fundamental legacy of the Orange Revolution, named for the color adopted by those advocating democratic change, is that Yanukovych must now bow to the electorate and that Ukraine, a nation of 47 million, cannot return to autocratic rule.

"He is forced to play within the rules of a new political culture," said Vadim Karasev, director of the Institute for Global Strategies in Kiev. "He understands that a dictatorial style is no longer permissible in Ukraine. The Orange Revolution made him a politician."

The change in attitude is immediately apparent to visitors to his office. The first visible image is a portrait of Yushchenko, which was placed in a prominent position on Yanukovych's orders, according to his media aides. The prime minister also regularly speaks Ukrainian, not Russian, in public now; his vastly improved fluency clearly reflects an attempt to project himself as something more than the representative of pro-Russian business clans from eastern Ukraine.

The bulk of Yushchenko's support came from the Ukrainian-speaking west, while Yanukovych's base is in the Russian-speaking east.

"There is more and more desire among the people to unite under the state flag," Yanukovych said. "They want to build a strong unified state, a united Ukraine."

The coalition that had backed Yushchenko collapsed following bitter infighting, but Yanukovych strikes an accommodating tone in discussing the president's goals -- integration with the West, including membership in NATO and the European Union, while maintaining respectful but independent relations with Russia, Ukraine's giant neighbor.

"My goal, first, is to develop a strategic relationship between Ukraine and the United States that is predictable, effective and has a good perspective," he said of his Washington visit, during which he will meet with Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. His aides are still hoping for a meeting with President Bush, however brief. According to protocol, he should meet only with the vice president, since he is not the head of state, but a presidential handshake would imply some acceptance of Yanukovych's new incarnation.

On NATO membership, a prospect that a majority of Ukrainians oppose, according to opinion polls, Yanukovych said his compatriots first need to be educated about the goals of the alliance and its benefits for Ukraine.

"You cannot put a boat to sail without first building it," he said. "For Ukraine, and the Ukrainian people, the priority is first to improve the standard of living, build up the legal system and create a just state with democratic values and freedom, and only then a security system. The population will support integration with NATO when they see positive changes in the country itself."

Asked about his personal view of NATO membership, Yanukovych said, "I think we will do everything that serves the national interest." And that, he added, includes "a normal and stable working relationship with Russia which is of mutual benefit. It is extremely important for us. Russia is a very important strategic, trade and economic partner."

But he also said he wanted to pursue policies that reduce Ukraine's dependence on its neighbor, particularly its almost total reliance on Russia for energy. "We want to develop a diversification of energy supplies," he said. "And Russia is not obstructing us in this process."

Three Sent For Radiation Tests After Death Of Russian Ex-Spy (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

New York Times, November 28, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 27 — Three people complaining of symptoms consistent with the radiation poisoning that killed a former Russian spy last week have been sent to a special clinic here for further tests, the authorities said on Monday.

They would not elaborate on the symptoms and said it would take a week before they knew whether the three had been exposed to polonium 210, the radioactive isotope found in the urine of the former spy, Alexander Litvinenko. But they said the danger to the public was minimal.

In order to fall ill, "you would need to ingest or inhale some of his body fluids," Jill Meara, deputy director of the radiation protection division of the Health Protection Agency, which is responsible for assessing public health risks, said in an interview. People who had touched Mr. Litvinenko when he was sick, she said, would not be at risk, unless they failed to wash their hands and then put their fingers in their mouths, or if they somehow absorbed his body fluids — through swallowing, for instance, or through an open sore.

Of 450 people who had called a special government hot line over the weekend, worried that they had been in contact with Mr. Litvinenko, only 18 were referred for follow-up questioning. The three being sent for further tests are among that group.

Four days after Mr. Litvinenko died of polonium 210 poisoning, the police do not seem any closer to solving the mystery of how he was poisoned. They have not even said it was murder, despite Mr. Litvinenko's deathbed assertions that he had been poisoned by Russia's government. An inquest will begin Thursday.

"I would urge caution on everyone not to get ahead of ourselves or, in particular, the police investigation," the home secretary, John Reid, told the House of Commons on Monday. "The police have been very careful in the words they used. They said they are dealing with a suspicious death, and that is the basis for their investigations."

David Davis, the home affairs spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party, said, however, that it was "incredibly important to resolve the question of whether the Russian state was involved." If it was, he told the House of Commons, "given that a British citizen who had been given asylum may have been murdered on British soil, this has enormous implications to the relationship between the U.K. and Russia, and implications, too, for the other émigrés in the U.K. who are opponents of the Russian government."

Britain is in a delicate situation in relation to its Russian ally, as it is increasingly dependent on its oil and gas.

"Going by past patterns, it's obviously going to cause short-term deterioration in the tone of the relationship, but not in its substance," Alex Pravda, an expert in Russia's post-cold-war foreign policy at the foreign policy research organization Chatham House, said in an interview. "There's an interlocking set of vested interests in getting on with a stable relationship."

The police have closed two places — the Itsu sushi restaurant in Piccadilly, and the Pine Bar at the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair — where Mr. Litvinenko is known to have been on Nov. 1, when he became sick, and where low levels of radiation have been detected. Radiation has also been found in his home. The BBC reported that radiation had been detected in a West End office building and at a building in Mayfair. [Wire services and the Tuesday Guardian cited various sources as saying that one of the buildings included the office of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian tycoon, who had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko, and the Guardian said, citing anonymous sources, that traces had been found there.]

But the authorities do not seem to be particularly worried. Julian Metcalfe, the founder of Itsu, a chain of restaurants in London, said that 16,000 people had eaten in the Piccadilly location since Nov. 1, and none had fallen ill with radiation poisoning.

Radioactive Traces Found At More Sites In London (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

LONDON, Nov. 27 -- Traces of the radioactive substance responsible for the death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko have been found in two downtown London offices, and three people who are not feeling well have been referred for tests to determine if they might also have been exposed, officials said Monday.

Home Secretary John Reid, speaking in the House of Commons, called for calm during the investigation of the death of Litvinenko, 43, who died Thursday from exposure to radioactive polonium-210. "The nature of this radiation is such that it does not travel over long distances, a few centimeters at most, and therefore there is no need for public alarm," Reid told legislators.

Reid said that about 500 people have called government hotlines established following Litvinenko's death and that only "a small number" had been referred for testing as a "very precautionary measure."

A spokeswoman for the Health Protection Agency said Monday evening that three people had been referred for urine tests to screen for radiation. She said that all three had reported being in the same areas Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and that they also were suffering from potential poisoning symptoms, such as diarrhea and vomiting.

Reid cautioned against drawing premature judgments about what happened in this unprecedented case, noting that it was not even established that Litvinenko had been murdered; police are calling his case an "unexplained death."

Litvinenko was an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Following his death, a friend of Litvinenko's read a statement, which he said had been written by Litvinenko on his deathbed, alleging that Putin was behind his death. Kremlin officials have called those allegations "nonsense."

Reid told legislators that the Russian ambassador to Britain had been summoned to the Foreign Office and asked for Russian cooperation in the investigation.

Police said traces of polonium-210 had been discovered in offices at 7 Down St. and 25 Grosvenor Sq. in central London. They declined to provide further details, including why those addresses had come to the attention of investigators.

News media here reported that Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, another Putin critic who won asylum in Britain after fleeing Russia, maintains an office at the 7 Down St. building. Sky News reported that Litvinenko had visited a security company with offices at the Grosvenor Square building.

Litvinenko, a former colonel in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the domestic successor to the KGB, publicly accused FSB agents of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 that killed more than 300 people. He also accused his FSB superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky.

Berezovsky said in a telephone interview last week that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital during his illness and said Litvinenko told him he had "no doubt" that he had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin to kill him." Berezovsky said poisoning was "a classic way" that Russian agents work.

Traces of polonium-210 had already been found at two locations that Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1: the Itsu restaurant in Piccadilly, where he met an Italian contact, and the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, where he met several Russian men, including a former KGB agent. Traces had also been found in his home in Muswell Hill in north London.

The Case Of The Poisoned Spy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Conspiracy theories always turn out to be nothing more than paranoid fantasy. At their heart lies the notion that while the rest of us blithely go about doing whatever it is we think we're doing, occult and all-powerful forces are really running the world -- starting wars, engineering suspicious plane crashes, surveying the next grassy knoll. Take this stuff too seriously and you find yourself on the corner with the Lyndon LaRouche people, trying to convince passersby that the queen of England is actually a ruthless drug dealer in sensible pumps.

But every once in a while, an episode such as the death of Alexander Litvinenko comes along to boost the morale of conspiracy theorists -- and remind the rest of us that there does exist a secret world full of characters and plotlines so bizarre and implausible that the bard of betrayal, novelist John le Carre, would be embarrassed to write them.

These clandestine creatures don't actually run the world, of course. But they seem to think they do.

Litvinenko was the former KGB agent -- and bitter critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, also former KGB -- who died in a London hospital Thursday after a brief, devastating and mysterious illness. Doctors suspected poisoning, since that was the most likely reason a healthy 43-year-old's hair would fall out and his organs would fail. Finally they identified a most unlikely poison: polonium 210, a radioactive element discovered by Marie Curie in 1898 (for which she later won the Nobel Prize) and named after her native country, Poland. The substance is so deadly if ingested, even in microscopic amounts, that doctors still haven't done a proper autopsy on Litvinenko for fear of killing themselves in the process.

Polonium isn't the kind of thing you find at the local drug store. Only a sovereign government is likely to have any lying around, which narrows the field of suspects.

Before he died, Litvinenko blamed his impending demise on Putin, whose enemies tend to meet untimely deaths. Litvinenko was said to be on the verge of obtaining documents -- or maybe they were already in his possession; this part is unclear -- proving that Putin had staged attacks on Russian civilians and made it look as if Chechen separatists were responsible so that Putin would then be free to wage a brutal war of suppression against the Chechens. In the secret world, this sort of gambit is called a "false flag" operation.

But how had the poison been administered? Polonium isn't really harmful unless you get the victim to ingest it.

It turns out that on Nov. 1, the day he became ill, Litvinenko met a friend at a sushi bar near Piccadilly Circus. Predictably, this was no ordinary friend. It was an Italian "security consultant" named Mario Scaramella, who has described himself as an expert in nuclear materials -- according to reports in the British media, which have pursued this story with old-school Fleet Street gusto.

Pretty intriguing, this Scaramella guy, but there's no obvious reason he would have wanted to kill Litvinenko, who was apparently an ally. According to the Daily Mail, Scaramella might have used the sushi bar meeting to pass a document to Litvinenko -- there are lots of incriminating documents circulating in the secret world -- that contained a hit list of Putin's critics who have been targeted for death by a group of former Russian spies calling themselves "Dignity and Honor."

The Daily Mail started to lose me when it also reported that British authorities suspect Litvinenko's killer might be a "ruthless assassin" -- former KGB, of course -- named Igor, who is a judo master (like Putin), walks with a limp (unlike Putin) and is thought to have fled to Italy (watch your back, Scaramella).

The whole thing is so over the top that you almost expect Dr. Evil from the "Austin Powers" movies to make an appearance. It's easy to lose sight of the fact that all these cloak-and-dagger characters really exist (although I have my doubts about Igor) and that a man who spoke out against Vladimir Putin's ongoing consolidation of power really did succumb to a rare, exotic poison. I should point out that British authorities haven't entirely discarded the possibility that, for some reason, Litvinenko poisoned himself.

Spies, former spies, counterspies, a mysterious character named Scaramella. . . . The authorities need to find out quickly just what happened to Litvinenko and banish all this throwback, Cold War-style conspiracy and intrigue to its proper venue: the pages of a thrilling but unconvincing novel.

Awaiting Pope, Turkey Is Unsure About Ties To West (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 27 — A short 24 hours before a visit by Pope Benedict XVI to this Muslim country, its prime minister finally agreed to meet him publicly. The venue: the airport, on the Turkish leader's way out of town.

The elaborate, last-minute choreography pointed to the deep divide that has festered within Turkish society since the foundation of the modern state. Should Turkey face eastward, toward its Muslim neighbors, or westward, toward Europe?

In the past five years, Muslims here have repeatedly felt betrayed by the West. The United States began holding Muslims without charges at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. It invaded Iraq and abused prisoners at Abu Ghraib. The European Union has cooled to them. The pope made a speech citing criticism of Islam.

Now, Turkey — a Muslim country with a rigidly secular state — is at a pivot point. It is trying to navigate a treacherous path between the forces that want to pull it closer toward Islam and the institutions that safeguard its secularism. Turkey's government, which is pro-Islamic, is constrained by rules dictating secularism established by Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, Turkey's revered founder.

The extremes jostle on Istanbul's streets, where miniskirts mix with tightly tied headscarves and lingerie boutiques stand unapologetically next to mosques.

"There are two Turkeys within Turkey right now," said Binnaz Toprak, a professor of political science at Bosporus University.

The pope's visit, which begins Tuesday, falls squarely on that sensitive fault line and has brought into stark relief a slow but steady shift: Turkey is feeling its Muslim identity more and more. The trend worries secular Turkish politicians, who believe the state's central tenet is under threat. In late October, a senior officer of Turkey's army — which has ousted governments it has seen as overly Islamic — issued a rare warning to that effect.

Others say the threat is overstated, but acknowledge that Turks do feel pushed east by pressures on their country from America and Europe. A poll by the Pew Foundation in June found that 53 percent of Turks have positive views of Iran, while public opinion of Europe and the United States has slipped sharply.

"Many people in Turkey have lost hopes in joining Europe and they are looking for other horizons," said Onur Oymen, an opposition politician whose party is staunchly secular.

It has been more than 80 years since religion was ripped out of the heart of the new Turkish state, which was assembled from the remains of the Ottoman Empire, the political and economic heart of the Muslim world for centuries. But the portion of Turks who identify themselves by their religion, first and foremost as Muslims, has increased to 46 percent this year, from 36 percent seven years ago, according to a survey of 1,500 people in 23 cities conducted by the Turkish Economic and Social Studies Foundation, an independent research organization based in Istanbul. That is a trend that has emerged in countries throughout the Muslim world since Sept. 11, 2001.

"I'm here as a Muslim," said Fatma Eksioglu, who was sitting on the grass next to her sister in downtown Istanbul on Sunday at a demonstration of about 20,000 people opposing the pope's visit. She did not belong to the Islamic party that organized the gathering, she said, adding, "When it comes to Islam we are one."

But in a paradox that goes to the heart of the nuances of modern Turkey —— a stronger Muslim identity does not mean that, as in Iraq, fundamentalism is on the rise. or even that more Turks want more religion in their government. Indeed, the number of Turks in favor of imposing Sharia law declined to 9 percent from 21 percent, according to the survey, which was released last week.

Perhaps the most powerful factor pushing Turks toward the east has been a series of bitter setbacks in talks on admission to the European Union. To try to win membership, the Turkish government enacted a series of rigorous reforms to bring the country in line with European standards, including some unprecedented in the Muslim world, such as a law against marital rape.

But the admission talks have stalled. And while the official reason is a quibble involving the longstanding Greek-Turkish dispute over Cyprus, most Turks say they believe the real reason is a deep suspicion of their country's religion.

They see that in the opposition to Turkey's admission voiced by some European countries, including Germany, Austria and France. Indeed, in 2002, , former President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing of France said Turkey's admission to the European Union would mean "the end of Europe," and now the French presidential hopeful Nicholas Sarkozy has made his opposition a campaign issue. Even the pope, when he was still a cardinal in Germany, said publicly that he did not think Turkey fit into Europe because it was Muslim. That talk has begun to grate on Turks.

"It hurts me that the E.U. expects Turkey to be something it's not," said Nilgun Yun, a stylish 26-year-old chewing a chocolate muffin in a downtown Istanbul cafe on Sunday.

Her position, shared by many of her friends, was simple: "Accept me as I am. We are Muslim, and we will remain Muslim. That's not going to change."

Mr. Oyman, the Turkish opposition politician, said that talk about Turkey was tougher than ever. "You cannot believe how they accuse Turkey on Cyprus and other issues," he said in a telephone interview from Brussels, where he was attending a meeting of European parliamentarians. "Our European friends are playing a very shortsighted game."

The shift has begun affect trade. While Europe is still Turkey's largest trading partner, business with other neighbors, including Syria, Iraq and Iran, has picked up substantially in recent years, said Omer Bolat, the head of one of the country's largest business associations, whose members are mostly pro-Islamic. He put the growth at about 30 percent from just 3 percent in 2000.

"It is risky for a country with respect to foreign policy to have dependence on one partner and market," he said in English, sitting in a sleek conference room when overlooking a bustling trade fair showcasing Turkish goods. "Now Turkey is opening its muscles, its horizons."

The policies of the Bush administration have deeply worried Muslims, he said, before rushing off to speak to the Pakistani ambassador, who had arrived to the trade fair.

"The United States used to be paradigm of freedom and rights," he said. "But since the Republican period, the U.S. policies have been so detrimental in Muslim eyes."

Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, in just four years, has managed to get inflation down to historic lows and growth rates to all-time highs. The growing prosperity has eased integration of religious Turks into the country's self-consciously society, which is still suspicious of advocates of Islam, as well as of Mr. Erdogan and his pro-Islamic government.

"This group of people that was more religious has relaxed," Ms. Toprak said. "They are now visible. They go to restaurants they would never have gone; they go to posh shopping malls."

"It was a struggle to get a piece of the pie," she said. "Now they have one."

Even so, the increased religiosity, or at least identification with religion, could eventually present a serious problem for Turkey. There are already rumblings. A killing of a judge whose court had ruled on a headscarf case aroused suspicions among Turkey's securlarists. Gen. Yasar Buyukanit, head of the Turkish Army, has referred to a rising threat of fundamentalism on at least four occasions since he came to office in late August.

Mr. Erdogan's closely watched government has attempted to limit liquor consumption in public places, but later backed down. It also tried to make adultery a crime, but later relented.

Some Turkish officials play down the possibility of real damage to secularism, but say that European suspicion does Turkey no good.

The delay with Europe, for instance, "fans up the disappointment, the disillusionment," said Namik Tan, the spokesman for the Turkish Foreign Ministry. "People say, why are they doing this?"

That is why public officials, including Mr. Erdogan, have shrunk from the visit of the pope, who symbolizes, in the eyes of Turks, a disdain for Islam and the unfair exclusivity of the Western club. A cartoon in a Turkish newspaper last weekend showed two public officials belly-laughing at the bad luck of those Turkish officials obliged to meet him. (The senior official appointed to be his formal guide has the portfolio of youth and sport.) But the pope is coming, and the meetings are happening. Despite growing pains, a neglected Kurdish minority in the south, a thin skin for any reference to the Armenian genocide, and failure to scrap a law that makes insulting Turkishness a crime, Turkey stands out as lively democracy in a larger Middle East riddled with restrictions, and its acceptance by the West is a test case for everyone, officials said.

Muslim countries, Mr. Tan points out, are watching. "Turkey is a beacon for those countries," he said. "Don't forget, if we fail, then the whole dream will fail."

Turkey's EU Entry Bid Stalls On Cyprus Issue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

BRUSSELS -- A failure to get a deal on Cyprus will lead to at least a two- to three-year pause in Turkey's negotiations to enter the European Union, analysts, officials and business leaders say.

Few see a major short-term reaction in Turkish markets, saying investors already priced in the breakdown. If the rupture becomes final, many fear Turkey's long-term economic progress could be halted.

Negotiations in Helsinki over Cyprus between Turkey and the EU collapsed yesterday. The EU had demanded Turkey open its ports to trade with the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus. Turkey had demanded that the EU open its borders to trade with Turkish-speaking Northern Cyprus.

A Finnish compromise proved unacceptable to both sides. It called for granting the northern Cyprus seaport of Famagusta free trade with the EU in return for the Turkish side handing over control of nearby Varosha. After talks with Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul and Cypriot Foreign Minister George Lillikas, Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja was quoted as saying there was "no basis for a solution."

Turkish markets seem undisturbed. The Istanbul index rose 1.8%, with bargain hunters buying stocks that had fallen last week. Turkey's signing of a letter of intent with the International Monetary Fund to finalize a review of its three-year $10 billion loan deal helped encourage investors.

The West's Eastern Front (WSJ)

By Hugh Pope

DOJ_NMG_0098928

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

ISTANBUL -- The Istanbul professor who is a leading character in "Bliss," a lyrical novel by Zülfü Livaneli, imagines the Turkish intellectual as an acrobat swinging through the air. He lets go of his trapeze, sure in the belief that his European partner and inspiration waits on the other side, ready to catch him. Too late, he discovers his mistake.

If the much-bruised Turks agonize long and loud about when they'll ever be accepted as Europeans, the Europeans seem willfully blind to the Turks. Another crisis looms in the long-running negotiations over Turkey's possible membership of the European Union, this time over the conveniently distracting issue of access to Turkish ports for Cypriot ships. Meanwhile the reigning pope, who wants to reclaim Europe for Christianity to the exclusion of the Turks, today touches down in this Muslim land. So it's worth thinking again about who the Turks are, what they want, and how helpful to Europe their practice of Islam really is. * * *

No clear answer exists, of course, to the question of whether the Turks are Europeans. There are just too many subjective variables. There is plenty of official hypocrisy, too. Europe has never negotiated with Ankara in wholly good faith, and Turkey has never been wholly sincere in its stated goal of joining the EU as it is today. But before muskets and scimitars are brought down from the attics of history, one must note that the Turks are already much more European than most Europeans realize.

The land of modern Turkey has always been part in, part out of Europe. The Roman Empire included most of today's Turkey, which has also gone by other names like Anatolia or Asia Minor. The most easterly Roman forts are inside Georgia on the foothills of the Caucasus Mountains. To the southeast, the main Roman customs houses were along the Euphrates -- roughly where the Kurdish-majority areas of Turkey begin today.

The subsequent Turkish conquest of Anatolia, and two sieges of Vienna, has not always meant a historic exclusion from Europe. The Ottomans had strategic alliances with France and Britain, among others. They were briefly part of the "Concert of Europe" in the late 19th century, were thought of in decline as the "Sick Man of Europe" (not Asia) and were the allies of Germany and Austria in World War I. In the Cold War, Turkey joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and guarded a whole third of Europe's front line with the Warsaw Pact.

Institutionally and commercially, Turkey is already deep in modern Europe. Formal Turkish-EU ties have deepened through nearly half a century of intense negotiation, including a customs union since 1996. Turkey is a member of the Council of Europe; its well-trained soldiers are projecting European political resolve in Afghanistan, Kosovo, Lebanon and Congo; its sports teams play in European leagues; and it takes part in and once won the Eurovision song contest.

Arguments that Turks are somehow ethnically Asiatic and non-European also hold little water. Yes, the original Turkish tribes and dynasties like the Seljuks and Ottomans came from Central Asia. Turkey is the most powerful state in what can be seen as an emerging Turkic-speaking world, which counts 140 million people from Kashgar to Cologne. But the six main Turkic states do not form a political bloc and, although not EU applicants, most share Turkey's ambition to be seen as part of a European or Western culture.

Furthermore, the 70 million people in modern Turkey may be Turkic in name and language, but are not so genetically pure. The main influx of Central Asian Turks to Turkey ended in the 13th century. Overall it seems to have added only about 10% of the population to the existing muddle of ancient Anatolian populations. Western Turkey, at least, is not much different from other Eastern European members of the European Union, where Bulgars, Finns and Hungarians also have origins in the eastern steppe. Turkey's Kurds, meanwhile, speak an Indo-European language.

Nobody doubts, however, that Europe's cold shoulder to Turkey is mainly due to its Muslim identity. As a cardinal in 2004, Pope Benedict XVI put this argument in terms of Turkey as being "in permanent contrast to Europe." But Europe cannot just wish Islam away. Some 15 million to 20 million Muslims already make up nearly 5% of the EU's population; that number includes 3.5 million Turks. Europe is deluding itself if it thinks it can isolate itself from engagement with not just Turkey but its whole Islamic backyard around the Mediterranean Sea.

In contrast to the narrow defensiveness of some European opinion leaders who treat a "clash of civilizations" as inevitable, Turkey's current leaders have been reaching out to create an "alliance of civilizations." When Europe meets them half-way, as in the last phase of Euro-Turkish rapprochement, in 1999-2005, which culminated with the opening of talks on membership in the union, pro-Western Turks feel strengthened. When Europe turns its back, as this year, the local nationalist backlash forces them onto the defensive.

Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan was indeed once a hard-line Islamist. Yet, reflecting a broader change in the country, he had to split with the fundamentalists in order to win power in 2002 with a new, more center-right party that was acceptable to 35% of the Turkish population. He has presided over an economic and commercial convergence with Europe that has put more European names than ever on Turkish products and high street stores and banks.

Turkey started its acrobatic effort to assimilate European culture in the early, 19th-century Ottoman Empire. In the 1920s, the present Turkish Republic took Europe as its model for almost everything, since back then Europe equaled modern progress. The new state dumped almost all the hallowed pillars of Islamic culture: Islamic law, dervish lodges, even the Muslim caliphate.

Europe has long been slow to appreciate these changes. In 1949, the Times of London's opinion page thought Turkey had no place in Europe because it used the Arabic script: in fact, that, too, had been discarded two decades previously. More recently, one of Germany's ambassadors to Turkey surprised a visiting Bundestag politician by giving him the news that Turkey had repudiated Islamic punishments like cutting the hands off thieves nearly a century ago.

A recent socio-economic survey by TESEV, one of Turkey's new think tanks, shows piety on the rise in Turkey -- just as in Europe. It also found that, contrary to perceptions, the number of women covering their hair had decreased in the past seven years. Only 1% of women surveyed wear the full black face-and-body covering, and that 1% is almost entirely older, rural women. Support for the use of Islamic law has fallen to 9% from 21%, and 81% condemn suicide bombing as un-Islamic, whether in Palestine or Iraq. Opinion has been liberalized, the study found, by rising wealth, stability, education and urbanization -- the same factors that have slowly improved Turkey's human-rights and democratic records in recent years.

Until recently, the pollster's question "Do you want to join the European Union?" put to a Turk was enthusiastically approved as meaning "Do you want to be rich?" Support has however plummeted as Turks have learned of European hostility, often whipped on by European politicians trying to blame external causes for internal ailments. Yet polls don't show everything. Turkey still does a booming half of its trade with the EU and more than half of its 21 million tourists come from Europe. Similarly, the negative image of Turkey elicited in Europe by the question "Do you want Turkey in the EU?" is not the whole truth. Change the question to "What do you think of Istanbul?" and many Europeans describe the city as cool, or full of desirable commercial energy.

Rudyard Kipling's old saying that "East is East and West is West" -- or its modern incarnation, "the clash of civilizations" -- is not the right paradigm for Turkey, which feels increasingly confident as part of both. The West is now all over the East and the East is firmly camped in the West. Indeed, Turkey's republican founder Kemal Atatürk believed that the "East is East" idea was fostered by Western powers to justify clinging to power over their former colonial subjects. * * *

An impasse next month between Turkey and Europe, which threatens to freeze accession talks unless Ankara kowtows to its demands in the dispute over Cypriot ships, would be unfortunate and, on past diplomatic form, unlikely. Both sides would suffer too much commercial and political damage. The wider Islamic world, having reacted with delight to the EU's apparent decision to accept Turkey as an equal, would revert even more stubbornly to its default position that it is impossible to expect fair treatment from the West.

A pause for reflection seems in order for both sides. An acrimonious standoff with the EU in the late 1990s cleared the way for Turkey's great leap forward of 1999-2005. A Dutch ambassador at the core of those EU-Turkish negotiations once described the relationship as a wrestling match, with no time clock but no alternative. Neither Europe nor Turkey can "win." But neither side can afford to let go.

Lawyers Cite Obstruction In 2nd Trial For Chinese Rights Advocate (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 27 — A Chinese legal expert who exposed abuses in the country's population control policies began a rare second trial on Monday, but his lawyers accused local authorities of preventing them from mounting a vigorous defense.

The legal expert, Chen Guangcheng, was sentenced in August to four years and three months by a county court in Shandong Province for destroying property and organizing a mob to disrupt traffic.

A higher court later quashed the verdict and ordered a new trial, which some supporters of Mr. Chen cited as an important breakthrough for China's Communist Party-run judicial system.

But the first day of the new trial, held in the same county court, ended in acrimony. Several of Mr. Chen's most important witnesses were prevented from attending the hearing by thugs who had the backing of local officials, his lawyers said, and the judges in the case declined to grant a defense request to delay the trial.

The lawyers said the witnesses, residents of Mr. Chen's village, were prepared to testify that the police had tortured them to provide false evidence against Mr. Chen. But three witnesses were detained before the trial began and none of them could attend the hearing, the lawyers said.

Li Jinsong, a lawyer for Mr. Chen who is based in Beijing, argued in court that the trial should be postponed until the witnesses could appear. When the judges rejected his request, he stormed out of the courtroom in protest.

"Our witnesses were prepared to make clear that the evidence against Chen Guangcheng was based on forced confessions of several people who do not stand by their accusations against him," Mr. Li said. "Those witnesses were prevented from attending the trial, and I believe we are headed toward another wrongful conviction."

Mr. Chen, who has been blind since a childhood illness, taught himself the law and became a campaigner for peasant rights. For a time he was hailed in China and abroad as a barefoot lawyer who helped legal norms take root in China's countryside.

But in 2005 he sought to organize a class-action lawsuit on behalf of people forced to undergo late-term abortions or sterilization operations in a mass crackdown aimed at helping local officials meet their quota for limiting population growth. In so doing he ran afoul of powerful party officials in Shandong.

Local authorities retaliated against Mr. Chen, confining him to his home for many months and later charging him with destroying property and disrupting traffic. Mr. Chen's lawyers say that the charges were fabrications.

Though the Chinese news media have been barred from reporting on the matter, the case has attracted high-level attention in Beijing. Many legal experts in the capital believed that local authorities would come under pressure to grant Mr. Chen at least the semblance of an impartial hearing.

Mr. Chen's defense lawyers say that despite the detention and intimidation of potential witnesses, the second trial was in some respects an improvement over the first. In the first trial, Mr. Chen's defense attorneys were not allowed to represent him, and he was assigned new lawyers who did not contest the charges.

This time, Mr. Li, his lead lawyer, was permitted to defend Mr. Chen in court. But he said, "Under Chinese law this is still a wrongful case."

Rare Retrial Begins For Blind Chinese Legal Activist (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 27 -- The retrial of a blind legal activist kicked off in eastern Shandong province Monday, but not without some of the same courtroom tumult that characterized his first trial, which was widely denounced by human rights advocates, lawyers said.

Chen Guangcheng, who embarrassed officials last year by exposing forced abortions and sterilizations, was convicted in August of disrupting traffic and damaging property during a village protest. A Chinese court earlier this month granted a retrial, citing a lack of evidence from the prosecution.

Chen's case, however, suffered another setback Monday, according to his attorneys, one of whom stormed out of the courtroom in protest. Three defense witnesses disappeared before the trial, the attorneys said, marking the second time Chen's allies were unable to speak on his behalf. On the eve of his first trial, the defense team was detained by police and accused of petty theft.

Despite the setbacks, Chen's attorneys said, there were moments during the nearly 10-hour proceedings Monday that gave them small reason to hope. Spectators, even though they were government employees, sometimes hissed at the prosecutors. And the simple chance to appeal was seen as a positive sign. Chinese courts usually find all criminal defendants guilty; acquittals and retrials are rare.

Chen last year highlighted abuses in family planning programs around Linyi, a city of 10 million people about 400 miles southeast of Beijing. Officials, whose promotions depended on not exceeding birth quotas, had forced thousands of men and women to have abortions and sterilizations, often conducting midnight raids and beating or holding residents hostage until they complied.

Chen, blinded by a childhood illness, taught himself law and helped many of the victims prepare an unprecedented class-action lawsuit. Since then, his supporters have been harassed, beaten and placed under house arrest. Chen was sentenced to more than four years in prison. His attorneys say the charges were trumped up by local authorities as payback for embarrassing them.

One of Chen's attorneys, Li Fangping, said the mood of the court Monday was markedly different from the last trial.

"In the morning, the prosecutor interrupted us all the time, and the judge was always on the prosecutor's side. I was expelled from the court because the judge kept granting the prosecution's objections but I kept talking," Li said. But Li said he returned to the courtroom and continued to identify discrepancies between the written and oral testimony of prosecution witnesses. "In the afternoon, the prosecutors tried to interrupt us about 20 to 30 times, but this time, the judge mostly denied their objections."

Chen, who wore a long green army coat and a two-inch beard, defended himself in court enthusiastically, complaining loudly about being illegally detained and persecuted by local officials, Li said. "This is the first time he was willing to talk. Last time he refused to speak because the procedure was so unfair," Li said. "He was in high spirits."

But Li Jinsong, the chief defense counsel, walked out of the courtroom at midday in protest after a disagreement with the judge about the three missing defense witnesses.

"Three major witnesses, neighbors Chen Guanghe, Chen Guangdong and Chen Gengjiang, all confessed to us before this retrial that their testimony in the first trial was false because they were tortured by police," Li said. "They promised us they would come to court to tell the truth. But two of them were missing this morning and one was kidnapped last night by eight unidentified men in front of our hotel. Two other lawyers witnessed it."

When Li tried to raise that issue with the judge and ask for an adjournment, the judge ruled that it was irrelevant. "So I quit the court to protest. I wanted to tell them, 'Don't try to play tricks with me. I will not let you tread on the law,' " Li said.

The Linyi Municipal Public Security Bureau referred calls about the alleged abduction to police in the neighborhood where the man disappeared, the Associated Press reported. A police officer in the neighborhood said he was unaware of any such incident.

Chen Guangcheng's eldest brother, Chen Guangfu, said he seemed to be the only spectator at the trial who supported the defendant.

"All the people who sat beside me were employees from the local prosecutor's office, the local police or the courthouse. There were also four village party secretaries from neighboring villages. I didn't tell them who I was," Chen Guangfu said. "But during the lunch break, I overheard a spectator, who said, 'Whenever the defendant says something crucial, the prosecutor interrupts, saying it's irrelevant. But actually I think this is the most crucial part of the case.' I can feel the mood of the court change in the afternoon."

Chen said his brother grew angry when interrupted by prosecutors. "He told them, 'You're shameless!' Even though he was insulting the prosecutors, it was joyous to hear."

A verdict is expected within a week, attorney Li Fangping said.

Rebels Attack Oil Field In Darfur (AP-Y)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

DOJ_NMG_0098932

AP, November 28, 2006

Darfur rebels attacked an oil field in a rare extension of their campaign east toward the Sudanese capital and said Monday the military garrison guarding the field had surrendered. But the government said its forces repelled the assault and were in full control of the Abu Jabra oil field Monday.

The attack on the field on the edge of South Darfur appeared to be another sign that Darfur's violence was spreading across the region.

"The government garrison guarding the oil field was totally destroyed," the National Redemption Front rebel group said in a statement. "Numerous soldiers, including high-ranking officers and generals, have surrendered," the rebels said, claiming to have shot down an army helicopter and to have captured a "substantial amount" of weapons and military vehicles.

A Sudanese military spokesman denied the army had surrendered, saying its troops had "inflicted heavy causalities on the rebels, who withdrew from the area." He spoke on condition of anonymity in line with official policy.

A Sudanese official in the oil industry said Abu Jabra's capacity had been damaged in the attack, but insisted it would not affect overall production. The state-owned facility pumps up to 10,000 barrels per day — a relatively small output. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of the issue.

The rebel raid came amid heightened violence in Darfur, where pro-government janjaweed militia have been accused by the United Nations of forcing 60,000 people to flee their homes this month. Violence in Darfur over three years has killed 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million.

Observers fear Darfur's violence threatens to destabilize the entire region. Neighboring Chad accuses Sudan of backing a rebel raid that briefly took a large Chadian town and threatened the capital in recent days.

To the south of Darfur, the Central African Republic also alleges Sudan is backing a local rebellion. Khartoum denies both charges, but aid workers in the west Darfur town of El Geneina said they had seen Chadian rebel groups operating freely in the area. The aid workers spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Sudanese officials say the country produces about 500,000 barrels per day and that oil revenue should be at least $4 billion this year, more than half of the government's income.

Most of Sudan's oil reserves are in the south of the country, which is now semi autonomous under a separate peace agreement that southern rebels signed with the government in January 2005.

Violence Continues To Roil In Chad (AP)

By Michelle Faul

AP, November 27, 2006

With gunfire sounding in the distance, workers took stock Monday of looted U.N. warehouses and government offices in this town in eastern Chad, the latest victim of unrest that started in Sudan's Darfur region and has spread across a swath of Africa.

Chadian rebels who have bases in Darfur seized this hub for humanitarian workers Saturday, and government forces retook it Sunday. Amid the upheaval, looters pillaged some $1.5 million in U.N. aid and carted off goods from a courthouse, a national bank office, a cigarette factory and the state archives, said Ouaddai provincial Gov. Mahamat Nimir Hamata.

Both Hamata's office and his nearby official residence were stripped of doors, windows and plumbing.

"It's really sad," said Hamata, who seemed particularly troubled by the disappearance of state records. "I don't understand the state of mind of the people. How can you destroy our archives?"

Hamata declared a dusk-to-dawn curfew late Sunday and, in a radio address, pleaded with people to return stolen property.

It was not clear what prompted civilians to loot and target government buildings, but President Idriss Deby, who took power at the head of a rebel army in 1990, is considered unpopular here.

Chadian rebels have clashed sporadically with government forces since 2005 and launched a failed attack on the capital N'djamena in April. The competition for power has become more intense since Chad began exporting oil in 2004. The rebels have been able to exploit volatility in neighboring Sudan, establishing bases in Sudan's troubled Darfur region, which borders eastern Chad.

French troops, who have a base near Abeche some 550 miles east of the capital, deployed to protect Abeche's airport and some 150 foreigners seeking refugee in an aircraft hanger here.

"We are in a state of war," French officer Didier Lebailly told reporters and aid workers who arrived Monday on the first flight into Abeche since rebels briefly held the town.

He said Abeche still is under threat "from all sides." French troops in jeeps mounted with machine guns patrolled the perimeter of the airport.

Gunfire could be heard in the distance after nightfall, and residents said it was rebels fighting government troops north of town. No casualties were immediately reported.

In Paris, French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters Monday: "These new rebel attacks show again the gravity of the situation and the urgency for an international presence to be deployed along the border between Chad and Darfur," he said.

According to initial reports from staff, more than 500 tons of food worth $500,000 were taken from a World Food Program warehouse in Abeche. Also stolen was around $1 million worth of blankets, tents, stoves, medical, communications and water purification supplies and other equipment.

"Stealing food from people who have lost everything is the most shameful and inhumane act that anyone can possibly commit," WFP Executive Director James Morris said.

U.N. and other agencies based in Abeche deliver aid to 218,000 Darfur refugees and some 90,000 internally displaced Chadians.

In the capital, heavily armed Chadian soldiers reinforced their positions Monday. The government insisted its forces were pursuing the rebels in the east toward the Sudanese border.

Troops were positioned throughout the capital, cordoning off key government buildings and supported by at least a dozen tanks guarding the main entrances to the city. Schools have been closed and residents of N'djamena have been stocking up on food and water.

At dawn a French Mirage fighter jet conducted low-level reconnaissance flights over the capital and surrounding areas.

Both France and Britain have issued warnings of reports of rebel forces heading toward the capital, urging against all travel to Chad. The Chadian government has denied rebels were about 250 miles from the capital and said they were no longer advancing.

Besides the rebellion, Chad's government has in recent weeks reported violence pitting ethnic Arab Chadians against ethnic African Chadians, mirroring ethnic clashes in Darfur. Chad accused Sudan of instigating the clashes. Chad often accuses Sudan of supporting Chadian rebels; Sudan makes a similar accusation against Chad.

In Darfur, ethnic African tribes who accuse the central government of neglect launched a rebellion three years ago, following years of low-level tribal clashes over land and water. The government is accused of responding by unleashing ethnic Arab tribal militias who have been linked to atrocities. Strife believed related to Darfur has also been reported in the Central African Republic.

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been displaced since fighting began in Darfur in early 2003.

Chad, an impoverished country in central Africa, has suffered from years of political turmoil that have hampered economic development. The economy relies on livestock and a relatively new oil industry.

Correa Looks Toward Reforms In Ecuador (AP)

By Monte Hayes

AP, November 27, 2006

Rafael Correa, the leftist nationalist headed to victory in Ecuador's presidential race, is already planning radical reforms when he takes office in January.

That is putting him on a fast track to a dangerous confrontation with the country's opposition-controlled Congress — a body he has called a "sewer" but which he needs to carry out his reforms.

"We receive this triumph with deep serenity and humility," the 43-year-old Correa, who calls himself a "personal friend" of Venezuela's anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez, said at a news conference Sunday night.

With 58 percent of the ballots counted, Correa had a 65 percent to 35 percent lead over banana tycoon Alvaro Noboa, Ecuador's Supreme Electoral Tribunal said Monday.

While votes in Noboa's stronghold of Guayas, Ecuador's most populous province, were among the last to be tallied, even a strong advantage there would not be enough for Noboa to win.

Correa's followers took to the streets in caravans with musicians to celebrate a victory that few questioned except Noboa, who said he would await the end of the official count that might not come until Tuesday.

Correa said his victory "is a clear message to our traditional political class of the profound changes that our citizens want. This country doesn't need patching up. It needs a new constitution in tune with the times."

Correa, who has a doctorate in economics from the University of Illinois, surged in voter support as a fresh-faced outsider determined to reform Ecuador's political system.

His view that the Ecuadorean democratic system is designed to benefit parties rather than people is shared by many voters fed up with corruption, greed and incompetence in the political establishment.

During the campaign, Correa attacked Ecuador's Congress as a "sewer" of corruption and ran no candidates for the legislature. He now faces a Congress totally in the hands of his opponents — but says that's not important.

"Let's stop worrying so much about Congress. Let them scrutinize what they want. We're not afraid," he said. "What we won't tolerate is any attempt at instability or blackmail."

Correa says his first act after being sworn in as president on Jan. 15 will be to call for a national referendum on the need to elect a special assembly that could rewrite the constitution and even shut down Congress.

That puts him on a collision course with the legislature, which has dismissed Ecuador's last three elected presidents, violating impeachment proceedings in the process, after huge street protests demanding their ousters.

Jaime Duran, a public opinion analyst who served as chief of staff in a previous government, noted that the congressmen elected in October were just as legitimately elected as Correa.

"They have the same right to serve as Correa does," he said.

Correa's problem is that Congress would have to approve a constitutional reform to allow creation of a constituent assembly. And it has blocked attempts by the last two presidents to rewrite the constitution.

Correa has vowed to rally street protests if lawmakers don't agree to a new constitution that trims the power of the traditional parties.

Many of the reforms he proposes would make politicians more responsive to voters. For example, congressmen would represent districts instead of being elected with a national vote. He also supports allowing recall of all elected officials.

But he risks violating the constitution if he tries to organize an election for a constituent assembly without Congress' approval.

He argues "the voice of the people" as reflected in a national referendum takes precedence over Congress or the constitution — a position challenged by most legal experts.

Insistence on forcing electoral authorities to convene an election for the assembly could put him in risk of impeachment, say experts.

"That immediately creates a conflict with Congress," said Benjamin Ortiz, head of a think tank in Quito.

Since Correa has no congressmen to defend him, "for the first time there would be sufficient votes to impeach a president without resorting to the murky maneuvers of the past," Ortiz said.

Nicaragua's Total Ban On Abortion Spurs Critics (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Jazmina Bojorge arrived at Managua's Fernando VÃ©lez Paiz Hospital on a Tuesday evening, nearly five months pregnant and racked with fever and abdominal pain. By the following Thursday morning, both the pretty 18-year-old and the female fetus in her womb were dead.

The mystery of what happened during the intervening 36 hours might not ordinarily have catapulted Bojorge into the headlines of a nation with one of the highest maternal mortality rates in the Western Hemisphere.

But a week before her death on Nov. 2, Nicaragua's legislature had voted to ban all abortions, eliminating long-standing exceptions for rape, malformation of the fetus and risk to the life or health of the mother. Now, outraged opponents of the legislation have declared Bojorge its first victim.

"It's clear that fear of punishment kept the doctors from doing what they needed to do to save her -- which was to abort the pregnancy immediately," said Juanita JimÃ©nez of the Women's Autonomous Movement, an advocacy group that is leading the campaign to reverse the ban. "This is exactly what we warned would happen if this law was passed. We've been taken back to the Middle Ages."

Julio CÃ©sar Flores, director of the hospital, countered that the new legislation, which took effect Nov. 19, hadn't even been signed into law when Bojorge arrived for treatment. Her death, which remains under investigation by Nicaraguan medical authorities, "has nothing to do with the abortion law," he said. "These charges are being made by people who are taking advantage of what happened."

The controversy is the latest twist in a debate over the proper limits on abortion that is raging not just in Nicaragua but across Latin America.

With the exception of Cuba, every nation in this predominantly Catholic region either totally prohibits abortion or limits it to extreme circumstances. And while the global trend over the past decade has been to liberalize abortion laws, efforts to do so in Latin America have been met by an equally determined campaign to strengthen them further.

So far, the anti-abortion camp's greatest triumph has been in El Salvador, where in 1998, at the public urging of San Salvador's Archbishop Fernando Saenz Lacalle, lawmakers removed all exceptions to the nation's ban on abortion and increased penalties to up to 50 years' imprisonment.

Here in Nicaragua, the church has also long played an influential role in politics. Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, who is retired but remains a public figure, is still respected by many for standing up to both U.S.-backed dictator Anastasio Somoza during the 1970s and Daniel Ortega, the Marxist-leaning revolutionary who replaced him in the 1980s.

Soon after El Salvador passed its new law, Obando and his successor, Archbishop Leopoldo Brenes, turned their attention to pressing for a similar measure in Nicaragua.

Abortion had been illegal in Nicaragua for more than a century, punishable by prison terms of up to four years for women undergoing the procedure and 10 years for doctors who performed it.

However, the penal code made an exception for "therapeutic abortion" if three doctors determined it was needed. According to Health Ministry regulations, this covered abortions of pregnancies lasting 20 weeks or less that posed a threat to the life or health of the mother or in which the fetus was malformed. In practice, rape victims were also permitted legal abortions.

Advocates for greater access to abortion argued that even that law was too restrictive, prompting an estimated 32,500 women to get illegal and potentially unsafe abortions in Nicaragua every year and accounting for 16 percent of the more than 100 maternal deaths here annually, according to a 2002 ministry study. By contrast, the Health Ministry recorded only six legal abortions in Nicaragua last year.

But church leaders and other anti-abortion activists in Nicaragua contended that the number of legal abortions in Nicaragua was far higher, reaching about 1,000 a year.

"This idea of 'therapeutic abortion' was being abused," said Brenes, the archbishop. "People were easily getting doctors to say that the abortion was being done to save the mother's life, when in reality it was a person who just said, 'I don't want this child.' "

Nicaragua's tight presidential election this month offered Nicaragua's anti-abortion movement the opening it had been waiting for: With Ortega's conservative opposition evenly divided between two challengers, none of the top three candidates could afford to alienate the church.

On Oct. 6, Obando, Brenes and various evangelical pastors led tens of thousands of citizens in a march to the National Assembly to demand a repeal of the exception for therapeutic abortions. Legislators obliged, fast-tracking consideration of the ban under procedures normally reserved for national emergencies.

Every major medical society in Nicaragua opposed the proposed ban. Their concerns were echoed by Nicaragua's health minister and a long list of foreign embassies and international organizations such as the U.N. Development Program.

"But the legislators wouldn't even meet with us," said Carmen SolÃ³rzano, a leading member of Nicaragua's Society of Obstetrics and Gynecology. "I'm indignant that in a state that is supposedly secular, the church has so much influence while the government won't even listen to doctors."

The Rev. Rolando Ãlvarez, spokesman for the Managua archdiocese, said that although church leaders oppose abortions in the case of rape or a malformed fetus, they intend to urge lawmakers to clarify that the elimination of therapeutic abortion should not prevent doctors from saving a woman's life when her pregnancy puts her in mortal danger.

Women's rights groups and medical associations, meanwhile, are preparing to petition Nicaragua's highest court to declare the ban unconstitutional. That approach met with success last May in Colombia, which, like El Salvador, had a blanket prohibition on abortions.

Failing that, activists who oppose the ban say they will take their case to an international body such the U.N. Human Rights Committee or the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights -- with Bojorge's relatives the likely plaintiffs.

According to Flores, the hospital director, although Bojorge showed signs of vaginal bleeding and uterine contractions on her arrival at the hospital, doctors decided to give her medication to stave off the contractions because an ultrasound indicated that her fetus was alive. The next day, another test indicated that the fetus had died, and Bojorge was taken off the medication to allow her body to expel the dead fetus naturally. Instead, she went into shock, possibly because the placenta had detached, causing massive blood loss.

Flores contends that the doctors' decision to prevent Bojorge from delivering while the fetus was still alive was routine. JimÃ©nez, of the Women's Autonomous Movement, argues that it was an extremely risky undertaking for a hospital that lacked ready access to ultrasound equipment. (The hospital's equipment is broken, forcing doctors to transport patients to a separate facility for scans.)

"In this sort of situation, the safe thing to do is to just abort the fetus," JimÃ©nez said. "It's obvious that the doctors were paralyzed by the new law."

Bojorge's relatives, meanwhile, are not sure what to think. "No one at the hospital ever told us what was going on," her mother, Rosa Rodriguez, 44, said sadly during an interview in front of the tidy tin shack where Bojorge lived with her husband and 4-year-old son.

Rodriguez and Bojorge's husband, Marvin Savala, a 24-year-old construction worker, had not even heard of the charge that the new abortion legislation may have played a role in Bojorge's death.

But as he contemplated that possibility, Savala's eyes darkened.

"If that's the case, then the doctors were very wrong," he said. "They should have done whatever it took to save my wife. Now I've lost not just our baby, but my whole family."

Cuban Rock Climbers Inspired By Foreigners Irk Castro Regime Youths Are Asked For Permits And Visited By Officials; No Fraternizing Allowed (WSJ)

VIÑALES, Cuba -- Seventy feet up a sheer limestone cliff known as La Cuchillita, or Little Blade, 17-year-old Roylandi González held onto a ledge by his fingertips. Then he glanced down to check the harness around his waist, grabbed hold of the rope that was tethered above him and started shimmying downward.

Over the past several years, adventurous Cuban youths like Mr. González, schooled by an influx of foreign rock climbers, have turned this western town into an extreme-sport mecca. Climbers test their mettle on dramatic crags, barely touched by man, which soar above a green valley designated as a United Nations World Heritage Site.

But climbers who have conquered Viñales's jagged peaks and imposing walls are now bumping up against a more formidable obstacle: the Communist political system. As Mr. González touched earth and removed his hard hat, he cast a wary eye for park rangers and police. "They threaten us and chase us off the hills," he said. "There's something about rock climbing that really seems to worry our government."

As Cubans begin contemplating life after Fidel Castro, rock climbing has emerged as an improbable political battleground between the government and young Cubans eager to embrace the latest foreign fashions. In 2003, amid a broad crackdown on civil liberties and fraternizing between tourists and Cubans, the government announced that rock climbers henceforth would be required to obtain a special permit. But the government has never granted the required permit to the many climbers who have requested one. Many Cubans and foreigners have continued climbing.

Adrián Pérez Martínez, a 20-year-old art teacher with a joker tattooed on his shoulder, says that police showed up at his house recently to warn him against climbing, especially with foreigners. "Good Cubans don't do this," he says they told him. "Climbers use drugs. And you shouldn't take foreigners to militarily significant areas." Indeed, some caves in the climbing area are designated as civil-defense sites in the event of a U.S. invasion.

Some of the official anxiety over climbing seems to be based on Cuba's revolutionary history. The revolution that brought Mr. Castro to power in 1959 was launched from a clandestine encampment in the Sierra Maestra Mountains on the eastern end of the island. Mr. Castro became intimately familiar with Cuba's highest mountain, 6,500-foot Pico Turquino. "The Revolution was the work of climbers and cavers," Mr. Castro once said, according to a history by Antonio Nuñez Jimenéz, a prominent revolutionary leader and naturalist.

Now the Cuban government may be worried that history will repeat itself. "The system is paranoid about Cubans' private activities, but especially when those activities are occurring in hills away from sight and when foreigners are involved," says Vitalio Echazabal, one of the first Cubans to take up rock climbing in the 1990s. "The authorities would ask, 'Are they spies? What are they plotting up there?' " Mr. Echazabal got so fed up that he defected to Spain during a climbing expedition in 2001, one of three Cuban climbers who have escaped the island during international sporting events. About a half-dozen other Cuban climbers got off the island after marrying foreigners they met on the hills.

The exodus of climbers has only served to intensify official suspicion of the sport. "Climbers are very independent people, and the Cuban government has a real hard time with anything it cannot control -- even a form of recreation," says Armando Menocal, a 65-year-old Wyoming lawyer who is the leading international proponent of Cuban climbing. Mr. Menocal, who runs the Cubaclimbing.com1 Web site, has been caught in the climbing backlash himself.

Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Menocal, who has family ties to Cuba, started training Cuban climbers, mapping local routes and importing donated equipment. But after having made about 15 climbing trips to Cuba over the past eight years, Mr. Menocal has been turned back by immigration officers at the Havana airport the last two times he tried to get into the country, most recently earlier this month. The authorities, he says, offered no explanation.

The 100 or so climbers remaining in Cuba would certainly welcome his return. Without official funding, Cuban climbers rely on equipment sent by Mr. Menocal or donated by tourists. José Luis Fuentes, a 20-year-old climber, says his shoes were given to him by an Italian, his rope by a Canadian and his harness by an American. "You speak a common language with other climbers no matter where they come from," he says.

He isn't sure it's a language Cuba's leaders could understand. "Older people just think we're a bunch of crazy kids," says Mr. Fuentes.

Climbing has attracted a special breed of Cuban youth since Mr. Menocal and some American friends used a slide show to recruit a core group of about half a dozen Cuban climbers in 1999. One Cuban went AWOL from his military unit to go on an outing with Mr. Menocal, subsequently earning two weeks in the brig.

Official eyes were watching. "The Cubans were always being persecuted because it was not looked upon favorably to socialize with foreigners," says Craig Luebben, a rock-climbing guide and journalist from Colorado who has made several trips to Cuba. As the pressure increased, the Cubans and their American climbing partners would avoid appearing together publicly, arranging separate transportation to a rendezvous at the secluded climbing site, Mr. Luebben says.

Climbers say official government climbing policy has been inconsistent. A few years ago, Hollywood, a cigarette brand partly owned by the government, launched an ad campaign featuring a Cuban climber. Yet at around the same time, Mr. Menocal on trips to Cuba was called before two different government authorities and told climbing wasn't permitted.

The inconsistencies continue today. On a recent day at the park visitors center near the Viñales climbing site, there were large posters of climbers in action. Nevertheless, the park ranger on duty insisted that climbing without a permit wasn't allowed under the 2003 law. "It's not something one should even consider," he said, though he had no idea how one might go about getting a permit.

The climbers are regrouping under the leadership of Alexei Suárez, a medical worker who sometimes reaches his second-story Havana apartment by scaling the wall. He has been talking with government officials, trying to better climbing's image, and he says the Cuban sports ministry has been very supportive. "We are loyal Cubans who want to make Cuba famous for climbing champions," Mr. Suárez says.

U.S. Embassy Asks Bush Twins To Leave Country (ABC News)

By Joe Goldman And Rhonda Schwartz

ABC News, November 28, 2006

Joe Goldman and Rhonda Schwartz Report:

Amid a growing barrage of front-page headlines, U.S. embassy officials "strongly suggested" President Bush's twin daughters, Jenna and Barbara Bush, cut short their trip to Buenos Aires because of security issues, U.S. diplomatic and security sources tell ABC News.

But the girls have stayed on, celebrating their 25th birthday over the weekend and producing even more headlines about their activities.

Officials say the media coverage upstaged publicity plans for the new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne, who had only recently arrived in the country.

Neither the White House nor the U.S. embassy in Buenos Aires responded to requests for comment.

The Argentinean press blitz followed a report on "The Blotter" last week that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were stolen last weekend while dining at the popular San Telmo outdoor marketplace despite being guarded by the Secret Service.

Stories of the twins' visit took on wild proportions in the Argentinean press. One tabloid headline had the young women running nude in the hallway of their hotel, a report the hotel staff denied to ABC News.

According to sources, the U.S. embassy encouraged the two girls to cut their stay short because the added attention was making their security very difficult.

But to the dismay and anger of some U.S. embassy and security staff, the girls stayed on.

Thursday night, an ABC News producer was able to walk into their hotel unchecked and engage Barbara Bush in conversation while she checked her e-mail on a computer in the lobby. Jenna sat talking with friends on a sofa nearby. No Secret Service agents were anywhere to be seen in the lobby, according to ABC News' Joe Goldman.

And yesterday the Bush twins were spotted at the Sunday soccer matches, wearing team jerseys and sitting in the owner's box, watching Argentina's top team Boca Juniors compete. Several games have been canceled due to violence in the crowds this year. In fact, last weekend no spectators were allowed to attend the match other than season ticket holders.

Hot Topics but No Heated Discussions as Amy Holmes Sits In on 'The View'

In her usual TV talking-head gigs, Amy Holmes debates matters such as whether Alcee Hastings should head the House Intelligence Committee and the consequences of Don Rumsfel d's resignation. Yesterday's topics? Where she likes to Christmas-shop, her recent breakup with a boyfriend, and how hot that Daniel Craig is!

So it went as the former Bill Frist speechwriter sat in as guest co-host with the ladies of ABC's "The View." Producer Barbara Walters has said she's looking for a minority woman to replace Star Jones Reynolds-- does yesterday's show mean Holmes is a contender? "I just looked at it as a great opportunity," the D.C. resident told us.

Holmes, who has mostly been doing TV work since leaving Frist's office this summer, said she had some apprehension that her GOP ties would set her up for a battle with feisty liberal hosts Rosie O'Donnell and Joy Behar. "I was told before going on to think of it as a dinner party: You want to get your points in, but you don't want to be rude." But there were few cracks, even as Holmes showed photos of herself meeting Bush , Cheney and Clinton. (Was that our former colleague and her long-ago squeeze Lloyd Grove in the background?)

Elisabeth Hasselback asked if she had ever written a speech she didn't agree with. Holmes replied, "I worked with other people on the staff to develop [Frist's] policy positions. . . . It was a privilege."

O'Donnell gazed at Holmes with an I-hear-ya nod, then added : "You're very pretty."

"They were professionals about putting me and other guests on the show at ease," Holmes said later. "I didn't have the feeling I was dealing with divas. It can be more of a pit fight to be with Paul Begala on a cable show."It's Their Party and They'll Stay if They Want To

Those globe-trotting twins Barbara and Jenna Bush continued their Argentine birthday getaway Sunday with shopping and soccer.

The sisters, who turned 25 on Saturday, popped up Sunday morning in the Buenos Aires antiques market at Plaza Dorrego in trendy San Telmo (the same district where a thief nabbed Barbara's purse and cellphone while she dined last week). Casually dressed, with no security visible, the daughters went unrecognized by the local crowd, reports our colleague Libby Copeland. Later, they donned the blue and yellow jerseys of the Boca Juniors and sat in the owner's box for the team's match at La Bombonera stadium, where some games have been canceled because of violence.

After the purse-snatching, which sparked a media frenzy throughout South America, the Argentine interior minister told reporters, "From now on, we are participating actively" in protecting the twins. Late yesterday, the U.S. Embassy there issued a statement denying an ABC News report that embassy officials had "strongly suggested" the twins cut their trip short because of security issues. (ABC also reported that the twins got all the attention, not new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne.) Rather, embassy officials provided "close support and cooperation."

Â· Noah Wyle, engaging in the popular local sport of stoop-sitting yesterday while on a break from his Baltimore movie shoot. Our colleague Kathleen Cahill spotted the "ER" star -- in town filming the indie flick "Boy of Pigs"-- lounging in a Bolton Hill doorway unnoticed by passersby in his '60s-era costume (olive wool overcoat, shiny black dress shoes). Whatcha reading, Noah? Wyle smiled and showed Cahill his book -- Oscar-winner Walter Murch's meditation on film editing, "In the Blink of an Eye."

Â· Jerry Springer breakfasting at the Four Seasons with friends Saturday, dressed in black with a gray sweater. What was the talk show host and recent "Dancing With the Stars" contender doing in town? Thanksgiving at his sister's house here, which left him still hungry for a hearty meal: eggs, potatoes, bacon.LOVE, ETC.

Â· On second thought: Pamela Anderson has filed for divorce from Kid Rock, just four months after she wed the singer, her rep told People magazine. The once-engaged lovebirds had broken up, then reunited and married in three ceremonies (St. Tropez, Beverly Hills and Nashville) this past summer. You'd think one of them would have stuck. Says her rep: "It wasn't a happy Thanksgiving."

A High Point For Nepal (LAT)

THERE ARE A thousand ways for war to break out, it seems, but so few chances for peace to prevail. So let us take a moment to celebrate developments in Nepal, whose people danced in the streets last week after Maoist rebels signed a peace accord with the government to end a decade-long insurgency that has killed 13,000 people.

Nepal's political progress has been nothing short of remarkable. In less than seven months, its demonstrations of "people power" have forced a tyrannical king to surrender power and pushed the violent insurgents to the negotiating table. On Dec. 1, the insurgents will take their place in a temporary Cabinet; their army is to be confined in camps, and they will participate in elections next year. Meanwhile, the king has been stripped of immunity and virtually all his powers. It has not been easy or painless, but it has been accomplished without suicide bombings, without military action and, except for some skillful U.N. diplomatic help in the endgame, without foreign intervention.

There are, of course, many ways the peace deal could unravel in the South Asian nation of nearly 30 million people, home to eight of the world's 10 highest mountains. It is highly unlikely that the inept and reviled King Gyanendra could manage a comeback. He triggered the crisis by dismissing the elected parliament and prime minister. Still, his dynasty is 238 years old, and some Nepalis believe that he is the reincarnation of the Hindu god Vishnu. The new legislature, to be elected in June, is slated to take up the controversial issue of whether Nepal should be a kingdom or a republic.

Long before the elections, however, there is the possibility that the power-sharing arrangement in the interim government will break down. The U.N. can provide monitoring, but it cannot force the rebels or the royal army to stand down their troops or heavy weapons — and light arms simply can't be corralled.

One of the most tragic legacies of Nepal's lengthy violence is the thousands of people who have disappeared. Human rights activists are keen to see those responsible on both sides prosecuted. Perhaps the Nepalis, who've shown great wisdom and creativity in applying the lessons of democratic activism in other lands to their own democracy movement, will manage the trick of balancing the need to punish the guilty with the imperative of reconciling a dangerously and bitterly divided society.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Dept. To Examine Its Use Of NSA Wiretaps (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The Justice Department's inspector general yesterday announced an investigation into the department's connections to the government's controversial warrantless surveillance program, but officials said the probe will not examine whether the National Security Agency is violating the Constitution or federal statutes.

In a letter to House lawmakers, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said his office decided to open the probe after conducting "initial inquiries" into the program. Under the initiative, the NSA monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas without court oversight if one of the targets is suspected of ties to terrorism.

The "program review" will examine how the Justice Department has used information obtained from the NSA program, as well as whether Justice lawyers complied with the "legal requirements" that govern it, according to Fine's letter. Officials said the review will not examine whether the program itself is legal.

The announcement signals a new level of scrutiny for the NSA program, which was launched shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and revealed in news reports in December 2005. The program has been ruled unconstitutional by one federal judge, but Bush and other administration officials have strongly defended it as a legal and efficient way to protect the nation from terrorist attacks.

The probe comes amid a dramatically changed political environment. Democrats who have been sharply critical of the surveillance program will soon control the Judiciary and intelligence committees, which oversee Justice and the NSA. Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, called Fine's investigation "long overdue."

Several other House Democrats said the inquiry should be broadened to include the questions of whether the program violated federal laws and how it was approved. Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.) also said he is "skeptical about the timing" of the announcement.

"I wonder whether this reversal is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats in Congress who have been critical of the NSA program and will soon be in control and armed with subpoena power," Hinchey said in a news release.

Fine has previously declined requests from lawmakers to conduct a broader probe into the legality of the NSA program, arguing that such an inquiry is beyond his jurisdiction. Those requests were referred to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which was forced to abandon its effort after President Bush refused to grant security clearances to lawyers who needed them.

Fine wrote in his letter to lawmakers yesterday that the White House has promised the security clearances necessary to conduct the new investigation. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino declined to comment.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Fine's review "will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern operation of the program."

The probe comes as a newly active presidential civil liberties board received its first detailed briefing about the NSA program. The Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, which was established by Congress and whose five members were appointed by Bush, was provided details about the workings of the NSA program last week.

One member, Lanny J. Davis, a White House lawyer in the Clinton administration, said in an interview that he was "pleasantly surprised" by the privacy protections built into the program. He declined to discuss the program in detail because of secrecy restrictions.

"I was astonished at the extent to which they are all concerned about the legal and civil liberties and privacy implications of what they were doing," Davis said. "It was a constant theme of concern, awareness and training way beyond what I expected."

Davis said the briefings convinced him that the program had been carefully constructed from the start. "It was clear that as they thought about it, they put it together in a way that minimized problems to the best extent that they could," he said.

Justice Review Will Assess NSA Surveillance Conduct (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0098945

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General will review President Bush's domestic terrorist surveillance program to see whether federal prosecutors are following laws governing the handling of information gathered by the National Security Agency on suspected U.S.-based terrorists.

"After conducting initial inquiries into the program, we have decided to open a program review that will examine the department's controls and use of information related to the program," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said in a letter to the House Judiciary Committee leadership.

The Justice Department has described the surveillance program, initiated after the September 11 attacks, as "an essential tool for the intelligence community" in its war on terror, adding that it "ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack."

"In the ongoing conflict with al Qaeda and its allies, the president has the primary duty under the Constitution to protect the American people," the department said in a briefing paper. "The Constitution gives the president the full authority necessary to carry out that solemn duty, and we believe the program is lawful and protects civil liberties."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has called the program's scope "very narrow," saying it focused only on communications with al Qaeda. He said it had been "very effective" in protecting the United States and that reviews of it by lawyers at the Justice Department and the NSA found it to be legal.

The White House has agreed to give investigators from the inspector general's office special clearances to probe the program, Mr. Fine noted in his letter, which was sent to Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, and the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan.

Earlier this year, Mr. Fine said his office did not have jurisdiction to open an investigation into the program. An inquiry by the Justice Department Office of Professional Responsibility also was blocked this year by the administration when repeated requests for security clearance were denied.

Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate have questioned Mr. Bush's constitutional authority to conduct wiretapping, saying -- among other things -- that the program improperly bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court established by Congress to approve or reject secret surveillance or searches of those suspected of terrorism or espionage.

The inspector general's review was conducted in the wake of conflicting rulings by two federal judges.

In Washington, U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed with the People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group that unsuccessfully sought records from the NSA under the Freedom of Information Act to discover how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program.

Judge Huvelle said that even if the program ultimately was found to be illegal, the requested documents were classified and not covered by the act.

In Detroit, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor agreed with a challenge from the American Civil Liberties Union, which said the program was unconstitutional. The judge granted a permanent injunction halting the program but delayed implementing her order pending a Justice Department appeal.

Justice Department Eyes Spy Program (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

The Justice Department has begun an internal investigation into its handling of information gathered in the government's domestic spying program. However, Democrats criticized the review as too narrow to determine whether the program violated federal law.

The inquiry by Glenn A. Fine, the department's inspector general, will focus on the role of Justice prosecutors and agents in carrying out the warrantless surveillance program run by the National Security Agency.

Fine's investigation is not expected to address whether the controversial program is an unconstitutional expansion of presidential power, as its critics and a federal judge in Detroit have charged.

"After conducting initial inquiries into the program, we have decided to open a program review that will examine the department's controls and use of information related to the program," Fine wrote in a letter dated Monday to House Judiciary Committee leaders. The four-paragraph letter was obtained by The Associated Press.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the agency welcomes the review: "We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program."

In January, Fine's office rejected a request by more than three dozen Democrats to investigate the secret program, which monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and abroad when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Fine's letter outlining his review was welcomed by congressional Democrats. At the same time, they said it falls short of examining issues at the heart of the debate — how the spying program evolved, and whether its creation violated any laws.

"A full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the DOJ's involvement, will be necessary," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif.

The review could include whether the spying program complies with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires judicial authorization for electronic surveillance and physical searches of people suspected of espionage or international terrorism on behalf of a foreign power. The Justice Department requests surveillance approval from the FISA court.

Democrats also questioned the timing of the review. Fine's letter noted that his office asked the White House on Oct. 20 for additional security clearances that were approved just last week — following the Nov. 7 elections that gave Democrats control of Congress.

Noting Democrats' renewed power to subpoena Bush administration officials next year, Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., questioned that Fine's investigation "is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats" who have been critical of the NSA program.

The letter was sent to House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and the panel's top Democrat and incoming chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich. Sensenbrenner had no comment. Conyers called the review "a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program."

The Justice Department has called the program a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is pushing congressional Republicans to authorize it by law before they cede power at the year's end — a prospect with at best a slim shot of approval.

Former Reagan administration national security official Robert F. Turner, now associate director at the Center for National Security Law at the University of Virginia, said congressional demands for sensitive information about the program puts them at odds with long-standing presidential powers over the collection of foreign intelligence.

"It's good that the executive branch, on its own, is making sure that someone's not abusing this power," Turner said. "But when Congress usurps power vested in the president by the people through the Constitution, then it becomes the lawbreaker."

Countering, Caroline Fredrickson, the director of the ACLU's office in Washington, urged Fine "to seek the hidden truth about this program. ... No one, not even the president, is above the law."

Justice Department Begins Internal Review Of Spying Program (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Justice Department investigators have launched an inquiry to determine whether the Bush administration's use of the warrantless surveillance program has complied with government procedures.

Glenn Fine, the Justice Department's inspector general, said in a letter to congressional committee leaders Monday that his investigation would be limited to the department's use of information arising from the surveillance and "compliance with legal requirements."

The inquiry won't seek to address questions about the legality of the administration's decision to spy on U.S. residents without court approval.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said a broader investigation was needed because Congress had been kept largely in the dark about the workings of the program and couldn't determine whether the administration's use of the program was legal. In January, Fine declined a request from Lofgren and other Democrats for a more sweeping probe, saying his office lacked jurisdiction.

"Congress needs to craft legislation so that terrorists can be the subject of surveillance while the Constitution of the United States is honored," Lofgren said. "To do that, a full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the (Justice Department's) involvement, will be necessary."

After turning down the request, Fine had referred it to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which reviews allegations of wrongdoing by Justice Department employees. But the Office of Professional Responsibility was denied security clearances to conduct the investigation.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales later revealed that President Bush had personally refused to grant the security clearances.

In his letter Monday, Fine said he already had a security clearance. He said he asked Gonzales on Oct. 20 for additional clearances for the internal inquiry. Last week, Fine received word that the White House had granted his request.

DOJ_NMG_0098947

A spokeswoman for the Inspector General's office declined to comment on what had prompted the investigation.

Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said he was "skeptical about the timing."

"I wonder whether this reversal is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats in Congress," he said.

The Bush administration authorized the eavesdropping program to monitor telephone and Internet communications in and out of the United States when officials have "reasonable grounds to believe" that one party is a member of al-Qaida or an affiliated terrorist organization.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit found the program violated the U.S. Constitution's provisions that enumerated separation of powers and the right to free speech and privacy. The Bush administration is appealing the ruling.

Administration officials said the program is subject to extensive oversight and is reviewed every 45 days. The administration kept the program under wraps until the New York Times revealed its existence in late 2005.

Last week, Gonzales defended the program.

"Common myths about the Terrorist Surveillance Program are that it is an invasion of privacy and an unlawful eavesdropping tool," Gonzales said. "I want to be very clear about the facts here: The Terrorist Surveillance Program does not invade anyone's privacy, unless you are talking to the enemy in this time of war."

Meanwhile, the Associated Press reported Monday that a government board, which Congress created and whose members Bush appointed, has been given details about the program.

Board members said they were impressed by the government's oversight of the program.

"If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured," said Lanny Davis, a board member and a former special counsel to President Clinton.

Justice Official Opens Spying Inquiry (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — After months of pressure from Congressional Democrats, the Justice Department's inspector general said Monday that his office had opened a full review into the department's role in President Bush's domestic eavesdropping program and the legal requirements governing the program.

Democrats said they saw the investigation as a welcome step that could answer questions about the operations and legal underpinnings of the program, which allows the National Security Agency to monitor, without obtaining court warrants, the international communications of Americans and others inside this country with suspected terrorist ties.

"This is a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program," said Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who will take over as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Last December, more than three dozen Democrats called for the Justice Department inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, to open an investigation.

Mr. Fine declined at the time, saying a review of the program's legality fell outside his jurisdiction. He referred the matter to another arm of the Justice Department, the Office of Professional Responsibility. That office sought to examine ethical issues surrounding the roles played by Justice Department lawyers in the eavesdropping program. But its review was blocked this year when Mr. Bush personally refused security clearances for its investigators.

Democrats have since renewed their calls for a full Justice Department investigation, accusing the Bush administration of stonewalling. On Monday, Mr. Fine informed members of Congress in a letter that he was opening an investigation after the White House had agreed to approve the necessary security clearances for members of his staff.

The review will have a somewhat different scope than the investigation sought and rejected last year. The review, Mr. Fine said in his letter, will examine the controls in place at the Justice Department for the eavesdropping, the way information developed from it was used, and the department's "compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

Officials said the investigation could examine the legal authority given to the Justice Department under a secret executive order first signed by Mr. Bush in October 2001, as well as the laws and procedures governing intelligence wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was approved by Congress in 1978 after the Watergate scandal and required a special court warrant for wiretaps on Americans. The review could also look at how intelligence generated by the eavesdropping was used to seek traditional court warrants and to pursue criminal cases, the officials said.

An official with the inspector general's office, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the office's position had not changed since it declined to review the program in January. "It was beyond our jurisdiction, and it still is beyond our jurisdiction, to review the legality or the constitutionality of the program, and that's not what we're doing here," the official said.

Congressional Democrats said they were eager to see what areas the inspector general would decide to review. Mr. Fine has a reputation as a strong and independent watchdog within the Justice Department, and he has issued a number of highly critical reports about the department's policies and practices since the terrorism attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Still, several Democrats suggested that the timing of his review might be tied to their takeover of Congress in this month's midterm elections as a way to pre-empt expected Democratic investigations of the N.S.A. program.

"It's hard to ignore the fact that there is a correlation in the timing," said Representative Zoe Lofgren, a California Democrat who helped lead the push for a Justice Department investigation.

"I don't know why the White House would stonewall for a year, then within a month of the election, agree to these security clearances" for the inspector general's staff, Ms. Lofgren said in an interview. "We don't know what it means, but we'll find out."

Mr. Fine said in his letter to members of Congress that he decided to open his investigation after "conducting initial inquiries" into the eavesdropping operation. That initial inquiry was limited to Mr. Fine and two other supervisors in his office who had security clearance to review the program, but it will now be widened to include investigators and staff members, officials said.

The Justice Department said it welcomed the inspector general's investigation. "We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program," said Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman.

The administration has strongly defended the legality of the eavesdropping program, but a federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program was illegal and unconstitutional. The Bush administration is now appealing that decision.

Domestic Spying Program To Get Internal Review (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27, 2006 — The Justice Department's inspector general has informed the Judiciary and Intelligence committees of both the House and Senate that he will begin a review of the controversial NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program.

In a letter to the committees, Inspector General Glenn Fine wrote that the review would be to examine the Justice Department's "controls and use of information related to the program and the department's compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

The inspector general's office had previously deferred a congressional request to review the NSA program and the attorney general's authorization of the program to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, an internal DOJ watchdog that monitors the activities of DOJ lawyers.

In March, Fine noted in a report to Congress on the USA PATRIOT Act, "Under the department's interpretation of the jurisdictional authority of the OIG and OPR, allegations regarding the attorney general's legal authorization of NSA surveillance fell within DOJ OPR's jurisdiction, not the OIG's."

After an initial review by OPR earlier this year, the congressional oversight committees were informed by the chief OPR attorney, Marshall Jarrett, that his attorneys had repeatedly been denied proper security clearances by the White House.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee in July 2006 that the decision not to grant the clearances was ultimately made by President Bush.

"As with all decisions that are non-operation in terms of who has access to the program, the president of the United States makes the decision," Gonzales said.

Members of Congress have been asking for the internal Justice Department review since the program was first disclosed by the New York Times last year.

"After trying for nearly a year to get DOJ to conduct an investigation of the NSA's warrantless spy program, I am very pleased to learn that the agency's inspector general is finally opening an investigation," Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said in response to Fine's letter.

Oversight Board Briefed On NSA Program (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP, November 28, 2006

After a delay of more than a year, a government board appointed to guard Americans' privacy and civil liberties during the war on terror has been told the inner workings of the government's electronic eavesdropping program.

Members say they were impressed by the protections.

DOJ_NMG_0098949

The briefing for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board had been delayed because President Bush was concerned — after several press leaks — about widening the circle of people who knew the exact details of the secret eavesdropping program.

The board, created by Congress but appointed by Bush, focused on other classified work since it was named in spring 2005 but it continued to press for a formal briefing by the National Security Agency.

A breakthrough was reached in recent days and the five members were briefed by senior officials during Thanksgiving week.

Board members told The Associated Press they were impressed by the safeguards the government has built into the NSA's monitoring of phone calls and computer transmissions and wished the administration could tell the public more about them to ease distrust.

"If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured," said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer who is the board's lone liberal Democrat.

Davis said he believes the administration could tell the public more about the program's protections without compromising national security.

Alan Raul, a former Reagan White House lawyer and the board's vice chairman, said he too was impressed.

"We found there was a great appreciation inside government, both at the political and career levels, for protections on privacy and civil liberties," said Raul, author of a book of privacy and civil liberties. "In fact, I think the public may have an underappreciation for the degree of seriousness the government is giving these protections."

The board members are prohibited from discussing any specific protections or tactics because the NSA program remains classified.

While board members were impressed, the top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee urged colleagues on Monday not to approve legislation formally legalizing the NSA program until Congress gets more answers.

"The fact is, despite repeated assurances from the administration, members of Congress remain in the dark and cannot answer fundamental questions about the program's scope, effectiveness or legal justification," said Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va. "As one of the few members who have received the most detailed information to date, I can say that the administration has not been able to document convincingly the benefits of the program."

The board was created as a compromise between Congress and the White House amid growing public and congressional concerns about the government's tactics in the war on terror and their impact on civil rights.

Those concerns were fueled in part by news leaks that divulged the existence of the NSA's eavesdropping program, a similar terrorist finance tracking system and secret CIA prisons where high value targets have been interrogated.

Democrats, who are about to take over Congress in January, have been concerned the board doesn't have enough independence because the political compromise struck in late 2004 left the board under the authority of the president.

Some have discussed elevating the board to an independent body like the Sept. 11 review commission. Board members were meeting Monday at the White House with two dozen congressional staffers to discuss those concerns and options.

After meeting in private 16 times over the last year to discuss classified matters and to be briefed by every major U.S. intelligence agency, the board has scheduled its first public hearing Dec. 5 to solicit testimony from nongovernment privacy experts.

The forum, to be held at Georgetown University, will hear from some of the administration's privacy critics, including the American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center, as well as conservative and academic voices.

Court Clears Way For Prosecutor To Review Records In Times Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

The United States Supreme Court refused yesterday to stop a federal prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two reporters for The New York Times. The records, the newspaper said, include information about many of the reporters' confidential sources.

In a one-sentence order offering no reasoning and noting no dissenting votes, the Supreme Court rejected a request from The Times to stay a lower court's decision while the paper tried to persuade the justices to review the case.

Yesterday's order effectively allows the United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, to begin reviewing the records, which he has already obtained from the reporters' phone companies, as early as this week.

The Justice Department told the Supreme Court on Friday that Mr. Fitzgerald was under enormous time pressure. “The statute of limitations,” the government said, “will imminently expire on Dec. 3 and 13, 2006, on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating.”

The grand jury, in Chicago, is looking into who told the reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in December 2001 against two Islamic charities in Illinois and Texas. The disclosures to the reporters, the government lawyers wrote on Friday, may have amounted to obstruction of justice.

In August, a three-judge panel of the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled, 2 to 1, in favor of Mr. Fitzgerald, saying that the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources in the unusual circumstances of the case. The government contended that the reporters had tipped off the charities to the impending actions against them. The Times said the reporters had engaged only in routine newsgathering.

The appeals court also rejected The Times’s argument that the grand jury subpoenas, issued directly to the phone companies, were too broad. The subpoenas, the government said, covered 11 days in September and December 2001. Lawyers for The Times said the requested records could expose scores of confidential sources, most of them unrelated to the two charities.

The appeals court responded by sending the case back to the trial judge to allow The Times an opportunity to black out information concerning those other sources. But because that exercise would, in effect, identify the sources of interest to Mr. Fitzgerald, lawyers for the paper have indicated that they will not cooperate.

In a letter to the Supreme Court on Friday, government lawyers said they hoped to obtain authorization from the trial judge, Robert W. Sweet of Federal District Court in Manhattan, to begin their review as soon as tomorrow.

Ms. Miller, who retired from The Times last year after serving 85 days in jail in connection with an unrelated leak investigation also supervised by Mr. Fitzgerald, said the phone records by themselves might not satisfy the government.

“It doesn’t end there,” Ms. Miller said. “Then there will be subpoenas for, ‘What did you say to that person?’ ”

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald, declined to comment.

Yesterday’s decision is the latest in a series of setbacks for the press in the federal courts. “It’s more bad news for the First Amendment,” Ms. Miller said, “and therefore it’s more bad news for the public’s right to know.”

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for The Times, said the decision was a battle lost in a larger war.

“This case is the latest of a number of skirmishes in an ongoing and far from concluded conflict about the public’s right to information” Mr. Abrams said. “We remain hopeful that in the end, whether in the courts or in Congress, that right will be vindicated.”

Court Rejects N.Y. Times On Leak Probe (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court ruled against The New York Times on Monday, refusing to block the government from reviewing telephone records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation concerning a terrorism-funding probe.

The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves stories written in 2001 by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The stories revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to track down the reporters' confidential sources for the stories. Fitzgerald's spokesman, Randall Samborn, declined to comment on the Supreme Court's order.

The case marks the second refusal by the court in as many years to sort out a clash between the federal government and the Times over press freedom.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up the Times' request to hear an appeal in the CIA leak investigation involving the outing of Valerie Plame. In that case, Miller, who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury. Fitzgerald, in a role as a special counsel, conducted that leak investigation as well.

Monday's rejection "is just further indication that we're getting absolutely nowhere with the court when it comes to protecting confidential sources," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

The case points out a growing problem of reporters trying to protect their sources in the information age, press advocates say. Rather than threatening reporters with jail if they don't testify, the government can go through the back door to hunt down confidential sources by amassing phone records and credit card receipts.

"It's impossible to operate on cash only and face-to-face and do your job as journalists," said University of Minnesota media ethics and law professor Jane E. Kirtley.

Dalglish said that protection of phone record confidentiality is among the issues that should be addressed in federal shield law legislation she and other press advocates are urging Congress to consider.

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for the Times, said the current case is part of a larger dispute over the public's right to information.

"We remain hopeful that in the end, whether in the courts or in Congress, that right will be vindicated," Abrams said.

The current dispute stems from Shenon and Miller calling the two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources.

The Justice Department says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities of upcoming government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the Times' favor said there is no evidence in the case even suggesting that the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew the government would raid either charity.

In August, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 that federal prosecutors could see the two reporters' phone records.

The government says the fact that the reporters relayed disclosures from a government source to "targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of phone records the government plans to review from 2001 - for the dates Sept. 27-30, Dec. 1-3 and Dec. 10-13. In a declaration this month, Fitzgerald said the statute of limitations "on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating" will expire on Dec. 3 and Dec. 13 of this year.

The current leak probe is in Fitzgerald's capacity as U.S. attorney in Chicago. The Libby prosecution is in Fitzgerald's role as a special counsel who was selected by a Justice Department superior to conduct that investigation.

New York Times Loses Bid To Protect Phone Records (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court ruled against the New York Times, refusing to block the government from reviewing the phone records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe.

The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves articles written in 2001 by New York Times Co. reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The articles revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

The dispute stems from Mr. Shenon and Ms. Miller calling two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources.

The Justice Department says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities to coming government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the newspaper's favor said there is no evidence in the case to suggest that the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew the government would raid either charity.

In August, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 that federal prosecutors could see the two reporters' phone records.

The government says the fact that the reporters relayed disclosures from a government source to "targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of New York Times phone records from 2001. The government is seeking the court's permission to review the records, which the government already has in its possession. The next step is likely to be a hearing this week to determine how much leeway the Times can have to delete phone numbers of sources in the records that have nothing to do with the case in question, said Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for the Times: "The question here is are there any limits the court may place on the government's review?"

Mr. Abrams said yesterday the decision highlighted legal uncertainty about journalists' protection under the First Amendment. "This area of law remains confused and inconsistent and often incoherent," he said. "Sooner rather than later the Supreme Court is likely to review the issue."

Like the CIA leak investigation into who in the Bush administration revealed the identity of Valerie Plame, the current Justice Department probe is being conducted by Patrick Fitzgerald, who is prosecuting Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff in the Plame case.

Court Won't Hear Case On Reporters' Phone Records (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday refused a request from the New York Times to stop federal prosecutors from examining the telephone records of two of its reporters, part of a grand jury probe of an alleged leak in a terrorism-funding investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0098952

The court's decision not to get involved opens the way for U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald in Chicago to review the telephone records of Times reporter Philip Shenon and former reporter Judith Miller. He has said the statute of limitations will expire on Dec. 3 on certain offenses a grand jury is investigating, and on Dec. 13 on others.

The Times had asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to stay an appeals court ruling in the government's favor. She referred the matter to the full court, and it declined yesterday in a one-sentence order that did not state its reasoning.

It was the second time in as many years the court has refused to get involved in a case pitting the government against the Times, and it lets stand a ruling that is the latest in a string of court decisions to go against media organizations that resist revealing confidential sources.

The current case arises from Fitzgerald's post-Sept. 11, 2001, investigation of possible links between al-Qaeda and two U.S.-based Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

In December 2001, the Times reporters learned of plans to freeze the groups' assets, and called for comment shortly before FBI agents raided the offices. Fitzgerald is trying to find out if any government officials illegally leaked information to the reporters, and said disclosure of the government's plans tipped off the charities, endangering law enforcement officials. The Times disputes this.

Two years after the stories, and after the Times had declined to reveal its confidential sources, Fitzgerald said he planned to subpoena approximately three weeks' worth of the reporters' telephone records. The Times contends that could reveal the identities of sources who have no relationship to the investigation.

"The issue in this case is whether reporters have any protection at all against compelled disclosure of their sources and whether the government may overcome such protections that do exist based only on a conclusory affidavit of counsel lacking anything that resembles clear and specific evidence," the newspaper's motion said.

A district judge in New York in 2005 agreed with the Times that it had a right to protect confidential sources. But a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit disagreed, ruling 2 to 1 that the Times had no First Amendment or other legal right to block the government from reviewing the records.

The Justice Department told the court that the case did not rise to the level that would compel the court's interest.

"In light of that potential bar to the grand jury's completion of its work, delay holds a serious potential to thwart the full scope of a criminal investigation," its motion argued.

"In contrast, the harm to applicant is not nearly so great as it suggests. The court's narrow holding in this unusual case does not create a far-reaching precedent allowing disclosure into the confidentiality of a reporter's sources."

The Supreme Court's action continues a losing streak for media organizations that are being challenged to reveal their sources and is the second involving Fitzgerald and Miller.

Acting as a Justice Department special counsel, Fitzgerald sought testimony from Miller and other reporters in his investigation into whether Bush administration officials revealed the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame. Miller spent 85 days in jail before testifying to a grand jury, which indicted Vice President Cheney's then-chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The Supreme Court in June 2005 declined to get involved in that case.

Both nuclear scientist Wen Ho Lee and former Army scientist Steven J. Hatfill, in civil suits, have convinced courts that journalists must answer questions about confidential sources who they say have damaged their reputation.

Lawyer Floyd Abrams, who represents the Times, said there is no doubt that "a number of recent decisions have gone against the press, particularly in areas where the government is using grand juries and had a national security claim of one sort or another."

But he contends there is a "significant split" among lower courts and an "enormous amount of confusion in the law" about whether journalists have a First Amendment privilege, which will have to be addressed by the high court or Congress.

Gingrich Raises Alarm At Event Honoring Those Who Stand Up For Freedom Of Speech (UL)

By Riley Yates

Union Leader.com, November 28, 2006

MANCHESTER – Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich yesterday said the country will be forced to reexamine freedom of speech to meet the threat of terrorism.

GINGRICH

Gingrich, speaking at a Manchester awards banquet, said a "different set of rules" may be needed to reduce terrorists' ability to use the Internet and free speech to recruit and get out their message.

"We need to get ahead of the curve before we actually lose a city, which I think could happen in the next decade," said Gingrich, a Republican who helped engineer the GOP's takeover of Congress in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0098953

Gingrich spoke to about 400 state and local power brokers last night at the annual Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment award dinner, which fetes people and organizations that stand up for freedom of speech.

Gingrich sharply criticized campaign finance laws he charged were reducing free speech and doing little to fight attack advertising. He also said court rulings over separation of church and state have hurt citizens' ability to express themselves and their faith.

Last night's event, held at the Radisson Hotel-Center of New Hampshire, honored a Lakes Region newspaper and a former speaker of the House for work in favor of free expression.

The Citizen of Laconia was given the Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment Award, which is named after the longtime President and Publisher of the Union Leader Corporation, owner of New Hampshire's statewide newspaper.

The Citizen scrutinized the Newfound Area School Board beginning last year over a series of e-mail discussions held before public meetings. It also used the right-to-know law to uncover costly decisions by the town of Tilton this year.

Executive Editor John Howe said the decision to pursue the stories led to at least one advertiser canceling its business with the paper.

"We try to practice what we preach, even if it costs us business," Howe said. "And it has and it will in the future.

Also honored was Marshall Cobleigh, former House speaker and a longtime aide to former Gov. Meldrim Thomson.

Cobleigh introduced an amendment to the state Constitution defending free speech. He also helped shepherd the state's 1967 right-to-know law through the Legislature.

Gingrich's speech focused on the First Amendment, but in an interview beforehand, he also hit upon wide-ranging topics.

Gingrich said America has "failed" in Iraq over the past three years and urged a new approach to winning the conflict. The U.S. needs to engage Syria and Iran and increase investment to train the Iraqi army and a national police force, he said. "How does a defeat for America make us safer?" Gingrich said. "I would look at an entirely new strategy." He added: "We have clearly failed in the last three years to achieve the kind of outcome we want."

Political parties in Presidential primary states should host events that invite candidates from both parties to discuss issues, said Gingrich, who criticized the sharpness of today's politics.

Gingrich said voters unhappy with the war, the response to Hurricane Katrina and pork barrel spending were the main drive behind the GOP's rejection at the polls. But he argued Republicans would have retained the Senate and just narrowly lost the House if President Bush had announced the departure of embattled Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld before, instead of after, the election.

Gingrich said he will not decide whether he is running for President until September 2007.

The event last night was sponsored by the Nackey S. Loeb School of Communications. The school was founded in 1999 to promote journalism and other forms of communication.

PATRIOT ACT:

Raided Muslim Charity Sues Bank Over Plan To Close Accounts, Says Patriot Act Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-A Muslim charity raided by federal agents in September has sued a bank, saying it violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts.

The charity, Life for Relief and Development, based in Southfield, Michigan, also seeks an injunction to stop Comerica Bank from giving other banks any information it might have about the organization. The charity is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act, which allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity.

The Patriot Act, approved by Congress shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, was designed to give law enforcement agencies more tools to combat terrorism, but some provisions were challenged on constitutional grounds for restricting civil liberties.

Comerica had told the charity that it planned to terminate the accounts Nov. 15, but granted an extension, according to the lawsuit.

Comerica Vice President Kathy Pitton declined to comment on the lawsuit, filed Wednesday in federal court.

FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force searched Life's offices Sept. 18, seizing computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members.

DOJ_NMG_0098954

The FBI would not say what agents were looking for, but charity officials have said it might be related to relief work the group did in Iraq. The international humanitarian organization also is active in Afghanistan.

No charges have been filed. The charity has sought to reassure the Detroit area's Muslim community that it is legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants.

Muslim Charity Sues Comerica Over Accounts (FREEP)

By Niraj Warikoo, Free Press Staff Writer
Detroit Free Press, November 28, 2006

A Muslim charity based in Southfield has filed suit against Comerica, saying the bank violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts.

Life for Relief and Development also is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act that allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity with each other and with the federal government.

The suit asks the court for an injunction that would prevent Comerica from giving other banks any information it might have about Life.

Federal agents raided the Islamic charity's office two months ago, but no charges were filed and no allegations have been made.

The lawsuit was filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

The filing occurred days after a senior vice president with Comerica, James Garavaglia, met with Arab-American leaders to explain how the Patriot Act requires banks to work with the government.

Charity officials worry that Life's reputation would be harmed if Comerica officials spread allegations about the group to other banks.

"A charity, especially a Muslim charity, has to live by its reputation," said Shereef Akeel, attorney for Life.

Comerica had planned to terminate the charity's checking accounts on Nov. 15, but after protests, the bank granted an extension.

On Friday, Comerica Vice President Kathy Pitton would not comment on the lawsuit. "It is our policy to not discuss customer relationships," she said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

At National Airport, Prayers Against Profiling (WP/AP)

By Leslie Miller
The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Imams, ministers and a rabbi staged a pray-in yesterday at Reagan National Airport and demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslim clerics from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight last week.

The religious leaders called for an end to racial profiling, saying it was unacceptable in the United States.

"These things are troubling to us," said Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation.

Imam Omar Shahin, one of the six imams detained last Monday at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, said they had not done anything suspicious.

The imams, who were returning from a religious conference, had prayed on their prayer rugs in the airport before the flight. After they boarded the flight, a passenger, who was alarmed by their activity, passed a note to a flight attendant. The men were taken off the airplane, handcuffed and questioned.

"It was the worst moment in my life," Shahin said.

DOJ_NMG_0098955

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said prayer was never the issue.

"Apparently, as they were boarding, one passenger overheard them saying what they thought were anti-U.S. statements," Rader said.

She also said the men got up and moved around the airplane, so the flight crew consulted with the airline about whether they might pose a security risk. Local law enforcement and the FBI thought they did, she said.

"We're sorry the imams had a difficult time, but we do think the crews have to make these calls, and we think they made the right one," she said. US Airways plans to meet with the imams this week, Rader said.

Yesterday, Shahin and a handful of other Muslims bowed down on rugs and prayed in National's Terminal A, near the US Airways ticket counter. Jewish and Christian clergy also said prayers.

After the prayer session, Shahin and other religious leaders boarded a US Airways flight to demonstrate their determination to continue praying and flying.

Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP national office, called on Congress to pass legislation to bar racial profiling. The bill is necessary because airlines are unclear how to deal with racial and ethnic profiling, he said.

In the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, four airlines accused of breaking federal anti-discrimination laws settled with the government. Transportation Department investigations found that the airlines had unlawfully removed passengers because of their perceived ethnic or religious backgrounds.

Though the air carriers -- American Airlines, United Airlines, Delta Air Lines and Continental Airlines -- admitted no wrongdoing, they agreed to carry out civil rights training for their employees.

The Transportation Department hasn't received any complaints about the latest incident, said spokesman Brian Turmail.

"Should someone file a complaint, then we would investigate," Turmail said.

The Homeland Security Department's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said last week that it was investigating the US Airways incident.

Clerics Protest With Prayer At Reagan National (USAT)

USA Today, November 28, 2006

A small group of Muslim imams, Christian ministers and a Jewish rabbi staged a “pray-in” demonstration Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. They demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslims from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight. The clerics also called for an end to racial profiling.

Imam Omar Shahin, one of the six imams detained Nov. 20 at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, said they hadn't done anything suspicious. The imams had prayed in the airport before the flight. After boarding, a passenger passed a note to a flight attendant, and the men were taken off the plane, handcuffed and questioned.

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said prayer was never the issue. “Apparently … one passenger overheard them saying what they thought were anti-U.S. statements,” Rader said.

Court turns down ‘Times,' won't hear vouchers appeal

The Supreme Court ruled against The New York Times, refusing to block the government from reviewing the phone records of two reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe.

The order came in a First Amendment battle that involves stories written in 2001 by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The stories revealed government plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

The court also declined to hear a challenge to a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools. School districts in 145 small towns in Maine that have no high schools currently offer tuition for 17,000 students to attend high schools of their choice, public or private, except for religious schools.

Inspector general to probe terrorism wiretap program

The inspector general's office at the Department of Justice has opened an investigation into the agency's use of information gathered in the government's warrantless surveillance program. In a letter to House Judiciary Committee leaders obtained by the Associated Press, Inspector General Glenn Fine said the probe would focus on the department's role in carrying out the spying program run by the National Security Agency. The review comes a week after a federal judge ruled that the NSA is not required to release details on its wiretapping program, which targets communications between people in this country and people overseas when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Meanwhile, members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board told the Associated Press they were impressed by safeguards the government has built into the NSA's eavesdropping program. The board was briefed on the inner workings of the program during Thanksgiving week. “If the American public … could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy … we'd be more reassured,” said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer.

How The Imams Terrorized An Airliner (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Muslim religious leaders removed from a Minneapolis flight last week exhibited behavior associated with a security probe by terrorists and were not merely engaged in prayers, according to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials.

Witnesses said three of the imams were praying loudly in the concourse and repeatedly shouted "Allah" when passengers were called for boarding US Airways Flight 300 to Phoenix.

"I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud," the gate agent told the Minneapolis Police Department.

Passengers and flight attendants told law-enforcement officials the imams switched from their assigned seats to a pattern associated with the September 11 terrorist attacks and also found in probes of U.S. security since the attacks -- two in the front row first-class, two in the middle of the plane on the exit aisle and two in the rear of the cabin.

"That would alarm me," said a federal air marshal who asked to remain anonymous. "They now control all of the entry and exit routes to the plane."

A pilot from another airline said: "That behavior has been identified as a terrorist probe in the airline industry."

But the imams who were escorted off the flight in handcuffs say they were merely praying before the 6:30 p.m. flight on Nov. 20, and yesterday led a protest by prayer with other religious leaders at the airline's ticket counter at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport.

Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation, called removing the imams an act of Islamophobia and compared it to racism against blacks.

"It's a shame that as an African-American and a Muslim I have the double whammy of having to worry about driving while black and flying while Muslim," Mr. Bray said.

The protesters also called on Congress to pass legislation to outlaw passenger profiling.

Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, said the September 11 terrorist attacks "cannot be permitted to be used to justify racial profiling, harassment and discrimination of Muslim and Arab Americans."

"Understandably, the imams felt profiled, humiliated, and discriminated against by their treatment," she said.

According to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials, the imams displayed other suspicious behavior.

Three of the men asked for seat-belt extenders, although two flight attendants told police the men were not oversized. One flight attendant told police she "found this unsettling, as crew knew about the six [passengers] on board and where they were sitting." Rather than attach the extensions, the men placed the straps and buckles on the cabin floor, the flight attendant said.

The imams said they were not discussing politics and only spoke in English, but witnesses told law enforcement that the men spoke in Arabic and English, criticizing the war in Iraq and President Bush, and talking about al Qaeda and Osama bin Laden.

The imams who claimed two first-class seats said their tickets were upgraded. The gate agent told police that when the imams asked to be upgraded, they were told no such seats were available. Nevertheless, the two men were seated in first class when removed.

A flight attendant said one of the men made two trips to the rear of the plane to talk to the imam during boarding, and again when the flight was delayed because of their behavior. Aviation officials, including air marshals and pilots, said these actions alone would not warrant a second look, but the combination is suspicious.

"That's like shouting 'fire' in a crowded theater. You just can't do that anymore," said Robert MacLean, a former air marshal.

"They should have been denied boarding and been investigated," Mr. MacLean said. "It looks like they are trying to create public sympathy or maybe setting someone up for a lawsuit."

The pilot with another airline who talked to The Washington Times on condition of anonymity, said he would have made the same call as the US Airways pilot.

"If any group of passengers is commingling in the terminal and didn't sit in their assigned seats or with each other, I would stop everything and investigate until they could provide me with a reason they did not sit in their assigned seats."

One of the passengers, Omar Shahin, told Newsweek the group did everything it could to avoid suspicion by wearing Western clothes, speaking English and booking seats so they were not together. He said they conducted prayers quietly and separately to avoid attention.

The imams had attended a conference sponsored by the North American Imam Federation in Minneapolis and were returning to Phoenix. Mr. Shahin, who is president of the federation, said on his Web site that none of the passengers made pro-Saddam or anti-American statements.

The pilot said the airlines are not "secretly prejudiced against any nationality, religion or culture," and that the only target of profiling is passenger behavior.

"There are certain behaviors that raise the bar, and not sitting in your assigned seat raises the bar substantially," the pilot said. "Especially since we know that this behavior has been evident in suspicious probes in the past."

"Someone at US Airways made a notably good decision," said a second pilot, who also does not work for US Airways.

A spokeswoman for US Airways declined to discuss the incident. Aviation security officials said thousands of Muslims fly every day and conduct prayers in airports in a quiet and private manner without creating incidents.

Bottle And Threatening Note Found (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Authorities closed the Lincoln Memorial for more than two hours yesterday after receiving reports of a suspicious liquid and a threatening note on the grounds, officials said. Tests showed no evidence of a harmful substance.

D.C. firefighters received a call at 12:40 p.m. reporting that a bottle believed to contain a liquid was found in the women's restroom in the base of the memorial, fire and federal homeland security officials said.

While a hazardous materials unit was en route, U.S. Park Police became concerned about a letter discovered on the statue of Lincoln in the main chamber of the memorial. According to officials, the letter asked, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?" In addition, a thermos that police found on the memorial steps was initially considered suspicious, officials said.

Officials closed the memorial, and the objects were tested by police explosives experts and the fire department's hazardous materials team, according to Wayne Benson, battalion fire chief in the Special Operations Division. They were deemed harmless and turned over to police and the FBI for a criminal investigation, officials said.

The Gatorade bottle found in the restroom was empty, said Alan Etter, a fire department spokesman. Etter said police were given the threatening letter by someone who found it on the statue of Lincoln.

The monument reopened about 3 p.m.

Park Police put out an alert to look for a man seen leaving the site about 12:30 p.m. He was described as white, about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds, with blond hair and wearing a green knit hat and green shirt. He appeared to be 30 to 35, according to the bulletin.

Lincoln Memorial Closed Briefly (AP-Y)

By Lubna Takruri

AP, November 28, 2006

Authorities briefly closed the Lincoln Memorial on Monday after finding suspicious containers and a note reading, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?"

The scare began about noon when a visitor to the memorial discovered the note in a plastic document holder near the steps of the memorial.

After evacuating the area, U.S. Park Police found a travelers' coffee mug near the note on the steps and a Gatorade bottle in a women's restroom, said Wayne Benson, a battalion chief with the District of Columbia fire department.

None of the objects was found to be a threat, Benson said.

The memorial was reopened less than three hours later. No injuries were reported.

Benson would not confirm the contents of the note. An official from the Department of Homeland Security, who asked to not be identified because his agency was not in charge of the incident, quoted the questions about anthrax and bombs.

During the closure, hazardous materials crews in protective suits were seen working at the site, and the public was kept about 50 yards from the base of the memorial. Explosives experts and K-9 units were also called to the scene, Benson said.

Park Police Lt. Donald Robinson said his agency and the FBI continued to investigate.

Union Looks To Democrats On TSA Screener Rights (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Baggage and passenger screeners at the Transportation Security Administration are not allowed to bargain over the terms and conditions of their employment, but the largest federal union hopes to get the Democratic majority in the next Congress to take another look at whether that ban is justified.

DOJ_NMG_0098958

The American Federation of Government Employees, headed by John Gage, won a favorable opinion from a Geneva-based, U.N. agency, the International Labor Organization, on the issue of screener rights.

The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association, in an opinion this month, said that it was concerned that the TSA's decision in 2003 to invoke national security considerations to block union representation "may impede unduly upon the rights of these federal employees."

Screeners, the committee said, are not engaged in "making national policy that may affect security" and are not engaged "in the administration of the state." Under those criteria, the committee said, TSA's 45,000 screeners should have collective bargaining rights.

The United States is a member of the ILO, which seeks to set worldwide labor standards. But ILO committee opinions are not binding, and the TSA said that the opinion will not change the agency's stance toward union representation.

In a statement, the TSA said Congress left it to the agency to decide whether to grant bargaining rights. The leeway to ban unions is contained in the 2001 Aviation Transportation Security Act, which created the agency after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"Given the critical national security mission of our security officers, collective bargaining is not appropriate, and would reduce TSA's ability to make changes rapidly in response to threats," the TSA statement said.

Proposals to allow TSA screeners to unionize have not gained traction in Congress, but AFGE officials hope that will change when Democrats take control of the House and Senate next year. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), who lost a vote on an amendment that would have let screeners engage in bargaining, plans to push the issue, her spokeswoman said.

Efforts by the AFGE to overturn the TSA ban through litigation also have been rebuffed by the government and in U.S. courts.

A key ruling came in 2003, when a regional director for the Federal Labor Relations Authority, which hears labor-management disputes inside the government, found that screeners were not entitled to a vote on union representation and that "Congress intended to treat security screeners differently than other employees of the agency."

Since Congress created the TSA, the agency has been folded into the Department of Homeland Security, where thousands of Border Patrol agents, Customs and Border Protection officers and others are represented by unions. The White House and Congress proposed curbing union rights at Homeland Security, but U.S. courts blocked the effort. The issue of how to deal with unions is back before the department.

Mark Roth, general counsel at the AFGE, said some members of Congress might have looked at collective bargaining as an impediment to a speedy launch of the agency, but he noted that four years have passed and that the TSA suffers from high turnover in the screener workforce.

"The agency has been stood up and is part of DHS. To keep its employees as separate and with less rights than other DHS employees, I think we can make the case that is no longer rational," he said.Retirement

Eileen Hayes Hurley, a leading intelligence research specialist in federal law enforcement, will retire Thursday after more than 40 years of federal service. Her career has included work on terrorism, organized crime and drug trafficking at the Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Customs Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Naval Criminal Investigative Service and, currently, at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, where she is a branch chief.

Intelligence Agencies Invest In College Education (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 28, 2006

Community seeks skilled recruits on campuses. Some uncomfortable with financial link to academia.

The U.S. intelligence community pours millions into higher education, paying for hundreds of scholarships, intelligence-related courses and fellowships at nearly a dozen universities, public documents and interviews with officials show.

Last month, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) more than doubled the number of schools in its program. The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is also developing a program for nuclear scientists.

The sponsoring agencies, including the CIA, say the programs help ensure they get enough recruits skilled to wage the war on terrorism. The programs began in 2004.

Agencies also pay for internships and summer “spy camps” aimed at attracting high school students to study intelligence.

Since 2004, more than $16 million has been appropriated for courses and overseas fellowships in Middle Eastern and South Asian language studies, engineering, computer science, analytical thinking, Islamic studies and other specialties.

The new programs differ from earlier government assistance plans such as the Title VI fellowships and the National Security Education Program. Those programs sponsor language study for students interested in careers in foreign affairs but are not tied to intelligence agencies.

The programs recognize that 21st-century intelligence officers need skills that can "translate to a variety of areas," says Lenora Peters Gant, who runs the ODNI's university outreach program. "We want to hire an engineer that understands world cultures and religions and speaks Urdu and Farsi or maybe Korean. That's where (intelligence) is going."

The programs also target more women and minorities, Gant says. Three of the 10 schools backed by the agency are historically black colleges. More than 90% of students at a fourth college are women.

"We need really good, young officers off of U.S. college and university campuses," says Charles Allen, a 47-year CIA veteran who is chief intelligence officer for the DHS. "We need young, bright aggressive Americans who really want to serve their country."

The programs have revived a decades-old debate about the proper relationship between intelligence agencies and academia. They have also invited comparisons to the 1950s, when the FBI sometimes encouraged students to report on professors' political leanings, and the 1960s, when the CIA paid for the National Student Association and tapped its members for intelligence work.

One program, the Pat Roberts Intelligence Scholars, keeps the identities of its participants secret.

"Secrecy, in particular, is a problem," says David Price, anthropology professor at St. Martin's University in Spokane, Wash., and author of a book on FBI surveillance of academics in the 1950s.

"I've looked at far too many old FBI documents to ever be comfortable with the idea" of such agencies funding students, Price says.

Academic and intelligence communities share a complicated history. During World War II, the Office of Strategic Services, the CIA's predecessor, recruited historians, anthropologists and other specialists, according to historian Robin Winks' book Cloak & Gown. In the 1950s and '60s, faculty members at Yale, Harvard, MIT and other elite universities served as talent spotters, steering promising students into intelligence careers.

Intelligence recruiters also liked small Catholic schools such as Trinity University in Washington, D.C., says Robert Maguire, an international relations professor who coordinates Trinity's intelligence studies program.

These days, demographics make Trinity a target for intelligence agency recruiters. More than 90% of Trinity's approximately 1,000 undergraduates are women. About 70% are minorities.

"The intelligence community of the 21st century has to look and think a lot more like the world around it," says T.J. Waters, a former CIA officer who teaches in the Eckerd College intelligence program in St. Petersburg, Fla. "These (programs) are a recognition of that."

The intelligence community's sometimes dark reputation made an undergraduate intelligence program a hard sell for faculty members, Maguire says. "The usual reaction to the word 'intelligence' was images of the CIA and nuns being murdered in Guatemala."

What sold the program at Trinity was its popularity with students, says Leah Martin, 21, student body president and intelligence student.

Trinity professors received stipends to revise courses and design new ones when ODNI started its first Center of Academic Excellence there in 2004. Intelligence students study creative problem solving, contemporary diplomatic history and social science research methods. The dozen or so who pursue an "intelligence certificate," essentially a minor in intelligence studies, are required to serve as summer "spy camp" counselors, chaperoning high school students who visit the CIA and attend lectures by intelligence professionals.

Janie Pacheco, 21, an economics major who is pursuing an intelligence studies certificate, took "Written and Oral Briefings for Professionals" to improve her writing skills. The course assigned a standard 20-page paper — hers was on the economic impact of Hurricane Katrina — but added this twist: Students had to boil their research down into a single paragraph that could be used in an oral briefing to policymakers.

"It was really about designing information, depending on how it's ultimately going to be used," says Pacheco of Mount Rainier, Md. "You can see the worth of this (to) intelligence, but really, this is a skill that transfers to almost any job."

Intelligence work, Martin says, appears to combine travel, excitement and, in the post- 9/11 environment, something approaching job security. "You get to travel, to do something different every day, you're challenged in your work and you get to serve your country," says Martin, 21. "How cool is that?"

Inside The CIA (WT)

By Gary Anderson

DOJ_NMG_0098960

Among the agencies of the federal government, three are legendary: the Marine Corps, the FBI and the CIA. One of the things that put them into that category is the unique culture of each. If they have anything in common it is that their field officers all go through a similar basic training and education course.

Each course has its own unique objectives and methods, but all three have a rite of passage as well as the training they accomplish. The FBI Academy and the Marine Corps Basic School are both located just a few miles apart on the Quantico Marine Corps base.

As a former officer of Marines, I am fairly familiar with both schools and the cultures that they produce. However, until reading "Class 11," I was not aware of how closely the basic schooling of CIA officers is to that of the Marines and the FBI.

Class 11 was the first post-September 11 class at the CIA. Consequently, it was larger and much more diverse than its predecessors, reflecting an agency policy decision that it had to recruit from a broader base of skill sets to adjust to the post-September 11 era. T.J Waters is a graduate of that class and obtained CIA permission to tell the unclassified portions of his story. The result is an education regarding a little-known, but much imagined, world.

Mr. Waters' classmates were a truly diverse lot. They included stockbrokers, successful businessmen, lawyers and even a former pro football player; all were drawn by the opportunity to avenge the attacks on September 11, and perhaps more important, to help prevent a future tragic event.

In many ways, the CIA curriculum is very similar to that of the Marine Corps and FBI. All three teach different skills, but they all create a socialization process that absorbs the students into the organization's culture, ethos and heritage. All three combine lecture followed by practical application; they all stress physical fitness and they bond students together into a lifetime fraternity.

The difference is that a person can usually spot a Marine officer or FBI agent in a crowd, even in civilian clothes. The CIA trains its students to be studiously inconspicuous. Students are encouraged and forced to bond. Those who survive the agency's screening process and get into the program, but prove to be incompatible with the organization, are quietly weeded out. This is rare because CIA screening is rigorous, but it sometimes happens.

The agents do learn how to use disguises and gadgets, developed by the storied CIA "toy factory," but they also learn the mundane tasks of surveillance avoidance, recruiting foreign agents and how to write coherent and useful reports. Most of the CIA's training takes place in diverse locations, but the real crucible is at the legendary "Farm" in central Virginia for the final leg of the course.

The book also relates some of the humorous incidents in training, such as one where CIA and Defense Department intelligence agents get cross-wired when two covert training exercises, not coordinated between the two agencies, collide in Alexandria, Va. Washington-area readers will appreciate the fact that most of the book takes place in familiar surroundings. Local police also occasionally spot students acting suspiciously and detain them, which results in some amusing asides.

However, a grim note ensues when the 2002 Washington sniper crisis brings a forbidding note of realism into training. Harmless field exercises suddenly become dangerous and the students, and faculty have to grapple with the question of what they would do if they stumble upon the real sniper. Do they blow their agency cover or intercede? In this reviewer's opinion, they come up with the right answer.

This is Mr. Waters' first book. He has done a credible job. He still maintains a contractual relationship with the agency and also consults with the Defense Department. At times, we learn a little more about his personal life than we want to, but the purpose is to show the kind of sacrifice that CIA officers and their families have to make.

The author obviously loves and admires the organization. He gives it credit for trying to keep up with the times, but he is honest enough to question whether or not it is changing fast enough to keep up with our adaptive non-state opponents. This is a question pertinent to the entire federal government. Nonetheless, the reader comes away with a deeper understanding of one of our most misunderstood organizations.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Broadens Diplomatic Efforts On Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 28, 2006

President Bush intensified diplomatic efforts on Monday to quell rising violence in Iraq and Afghanistan, turning to allies as his national security adviser said the conflict in Iraq had entered "a new phase" requiring changes.

"Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One as Bush flew eastward.

DOJ_NMG_0098961

The president was spending Monday night in this tiny Baltic nation ahead of a two-day NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, expected to deal with deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan, where NATO has 32,000 troops.

Both Estonia and Latvia are former Soviet republics that are strong allies in the war on terror.

Bush will head to Amman, Jordan, for talks Wednesday and Thursday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and King Abdullah of Jordan.

From Air Force One, the president spoke to the leaders of France and Egypt.

Addressing the upcoming meetings with al-Maliki, Hadley said, "We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase."

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said.

The adviser rejected suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war and said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley said.

Hadley also said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

The New York Times on Monday quoted a senior U.S. intelligence official who said the Iranian-backed Hezbollah had been providing training for the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The anonymous official told the Times that 1,000 to 2,000 Shiite fighters had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon.

U.S. officials have previously accused Iran of military interference in Iraq. Earlier this month, CIA Director Michael Hayden told a congressional panel, "The Iranian hand is stoking violence and supporting even competing Shiite factions" in Iraq. In March, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld accused Tehran of sending elements of its Revolutionary Guard to stir trouble inside Iraq.

Bush received a briefing Sunday night at the White House from Vice President Dick Cheney, who had gone to Saudi Arabia over the weekend as part of the administration's expanded efforts to draw Iraq's neighbors into the search for a solution.

In further signs of a worsening situation, a mortar attack ignited a huge fire Monday night at an oil facility in northern Iraq, shutting the flow of crude oil to a major refinery. And a U.S. Air Force jet crashed in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-Arab insurgency, officials said. Al-Jazeera reported that the pilot was killed.

Meanwhile, Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops as well.

In the U.S., the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was working on a set of strategies for Iraq.

The bipartisan group, which will also meet Tuesday, appeared ready to endorse drawing Iran and Syria into the effort to end violence in Iraq and resuming Middle East peace talks, said a former U.S. official knowledgeable about some of the commission's recent deliberations.

The commission seemed unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy surrounding the commission's work. But some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal, an idea that has been pushed by many congressional Democrats.

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan discussed the situation in Iraq Monday afternoon in a teleconference with members of the group, which was meeting in Washington.

The president is expected to urge NATO members to increase military spending at the summit in Riga. Violence has increased markedly in recent days, particularly in the southern part of Afghanistan, where the Taliban are resurgent.

Bush is trying to persuade many European allies to contribute more for the Afghanistan effort. He'll also promote his plan to invite several major non-NATO countries, including Japan, Australia and South Korea, into some joint missions with NATO.

Bush is the first sitting U.S. president to visit Estonia.

His brief stopover in this medieval capital was seen as a token of American gratitude for the Baltic ally's strong support in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Unlike in most of Europe, there is hardly any public criticism here of Bush's administration or the Iraq war. A small protest by anarchists was planned in Tallinn on Tuesday but was not expected to cause any major disruption.

Bush will meet with Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip and U.S.-educated President Toomas Hendrik Ilves. Bush and Ilves planned a joint news conference.

The U.S. president also was expected to meet democracy activists and Estonian soldiers who have served on foreign missions.

DOJ_NMG_0098962

Aides said Bush also spoke by phone from Air Force One to Chinese President Hu Jintao on relations between the two countries and their recent meeting on the sidelines of a summit in Vietnam of Asian-Pacific nations. Bush also phoned former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who was hospitalized for tests after he fainted during a rally.

White House Says Iraq In 'New Phase' (AP-Y)

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said.

The adviser rejected suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war and said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley said.

Hadley also said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

Bush received a briefing Sunday night at the White House from Vice President Dick Cheney, who had gone to Saudi Arabia over the weekend as part of the administration's expanded efforts to draw Iraq's neighbors into the search for a solution.

In further signs of a worsening situation, a mortar attack ignited a huge fire Monday night at an oil facility in northern Iraq, shutting the flow of crude oil to a major refinery. And a U.S. Air Force jet crashed in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-Arab insurgency, officials said. Al-Jazeera reported that the pilot was killed.

Meanwhile, Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops as well.

In the U.S., the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was working on a set of strategies for Iraq.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan discussed the situation in Iraq Monday afternoon in a teleconference with members of the group, which was meeting in Washington.

The president is expected to urge NATO members to increase military spending at the summit in Riga. Violence has increased markedly in recent days, particularly in the southern part of Afghanistan, where the Taliban are resurgent.

Bush is trying to persuade many European allies to contribute more for the Afghanistan effort. He'll also promote his plan to invite several major non-NATO countries, including Japan, Australia and South Korea, into some joint missions with NATO.

Bush is the first sitting U.S. president to visit Estonia.

His brief stopover in this medieval capital was seen as a token of American gratitude for the Baltic ally's strong support in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Unlike in most of Europe, there is hardly any public criticism here of Bush's administration or the Iraq war. A small protest by anarchists was planned in Tallinn on Tuesday but was not expected to cause any major disruption.

Bush will meet with Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip and U.S.-educated President Toomas Hendrik Ilves. Bush and Ilves planned a joint news conference.

The U.S. president also was expected to meet democracy activists and Estonian soldiers who have served on foreign missions.

Aides said Bush also spoke by phone from Air Force One to Chinese President Hu Jintao on relations between the two countries and their recent meeting on the sidelines of a summit in Vietnam of Asian-Pacific nations. Bush also phoned former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who was hospitalized for tests after he fainted during a rally.

Civil War In Iraq Near, Annan Says (WP)

By Robin Wright And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The Iraq Study Group began two days of intensive behind-closed-doors deliberations yesterday as the White House conceded that Iraq has moved into a dangerous new phase of warfare requiring changes in strategy. In a sign of the growing global concern about Iraq's fate, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan appealed for immediate steps to prevent the country from crumbling into all-out civil war.

"Given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact, we are almost there," Annan said when a reporter asked about the prospects of civil war in Iraq.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters traveling to Estonia with President Bush: "Obviously, everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough." Washington must find ways to "adapt," he added.

Events over the past week, including the deadliest attacks since the war began in March 2003, have created a new sense of diplomatic urgency about finding a viable strategy to contain Iraq's violence and limit spillover damage across the region. The White House again resisted assertions that Iraq is now in a civil war, but that stance is increasingly hard to defend, according to analysts, diplomats and even some U.S. officials in private.

"While the situation on the ground is very serious, neither Prime Minister [Nouri al-] Maliki nor we believe that Iraq is in a civil war. The Iraqi government is making slow but sure progress on important issues that will help stop the violence and bring the country together," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said yesterday.

At least one Iraqi leader says otherwise. "It's worse than a civil war. In a civil war, you at least know which factions are fighting each other," lamented a senior member of Iraq's government in an interview a few hours after Johndroe's comments. "We don't even know that anymore. It's so bloody confused."

Saudi Arabia is so concerned about the damage that the conflict in Iraq is doing across the region that it basically summoned Vice President Cheney for talks over the weekend, according to U.S. officials and foreign diplomats. The visit was originally portrayed as U.S. outreach to its oil-rich Arab ally.

In a reflection of the growing new dimension of civil strife, a senior U.S. intelligence official said yesterday that the militia of radical Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr has grown eightfold over the past year and now fields 40,000 to 60,000 men. That makes it more effective than the Iraqi government's army, the official indicated.

The Iraqi army has about 134,000 men, but about half are doing only stationary guard duty, the official said. Of the half that conduct operations, only about 10 battalions are effective -- well under 10,000 men.

Sadr is so powerful that if provincial elections were held now, he would sweep most of the south and also take Baghdad, said the intelligence officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position.

Iraq's prime minister "doesn't have any coercive powers of his own," he said, calling Maliki "beholden to Sadr." Maliki won the prime minister's job with backing from Sadr, whose political bloc holds 30 seats in parliament.

Addressing the sectarian problem by engaging Iraq's neighbors, notably Iran and Syria, is an idea gaining favor within the 10-member, bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is in the final phase of its eight-month search for a new policy. But the panel was still deeply divided over recommendations going into its meeting yesterday.

The group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), hopes to issue its recommendations before Congress adjourns next month. Although deliberations are secret, the five Republicans and five Democrats are exploring ideas that include a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Some Democrats on the panel favor a plan by congressional Democrats to name a date to begin withdrawal, as a way to pressure Iraqis to show more leadership. Members of the board were divided, however, over how many troops and how fast to withdraw, sources close to the group said.

President Bush is due to meet with Maliki on Thursday in Jordan to review the situation. "We're clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence that requires us obviously to adapt to that new phase, and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that," Hadley told reporters.

He said he expects the two leaders to discuss whether Washington should talk to Iran and Syria, although he thinks Maliki, not Bush, will raise the issue. Maliki has "strong views," he added, that any conversation with Syria and Iran "ought to be a conversation by Iraqis."

In a subtle nod to the Iraq Study Group, Hadley said that the president plans to listen to the range of voices for ideas but that Bush will reassure Maliki the president "will be crafting the way forward on Iraq" primarily in collaboration with Baghdad.

But in a sign of the discord in Washington, the senior U.S. intelligence official said the situation requires that the administration abandon its long-held goal of national reconciliation and instead "pick a winner" in Iraq. He said he understands that means the Sunnis are likely to bolt from the fragile government. "That's the price you're going to have to pay," he said.

The United States also needs to reexamine other basic assumptions, he said. To be effective, for example, the Iraqi security forces -- including army and police -- should be roughly doubled from the current goal of 325,000 to about 650,000, which would require about three years of recruiting and training, he said. The expanded military, he added, would probably become overwhelmingly Shiite and Kurdish -- an outcome that many Sunnis fear.

The United States also needs to deal quickly with a serious problem of overcrowded prisons that has led the government to free about 2,000 fighters each month to make room for new prisoners, he said. Those released are not scofflaws, he said: "These are the hard-core guys."

The intelligence official said that he "never saw any evidence" that Sadr's organization sent personnel to Lebanon this summer to fight against Israel, but said he had heard talk that some were sent there to be trained by Lebanese members of Hezbollah, an organization funded by Iran's Shiite government.

He said there was evidence that the Iranian government this year had escalated its efforts inside Iraq.

"The whole year, yes, it has stepped up," he said. "More training in and out of Iraq. More coordination with Hezbollah. More advisers."

A War Of Words Over Iraq (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With sectarian violence raging in Iraq and President Bush grasping for options, the question of whether Iraqis are locked in a civil war has taken on new urgency.

The term is fraught with emotional overtones and policy implications, which is why it sparks lively arguments and strong pushback from the White House. Bush vehemently rejects the idea that Iraq is engaged in a civil war, while a growing chorus of scholars and strategists says that is exactly what the staggering civilian death toll and factional strife amount to.

The national news media are grappling with the issue as well, as evidenced by Monday's announcement from NBC News that, after much consideration, it had decided to use the phrase.

In a nod to how sensitive the topic has become, the network's Matt Lauer noted, "We didn't just wake up on a Monday morning and say, 'Let's call this a civil war.' This took careful deliberation."

Bush has said he would not allow U.S. troops to be caught "in the crossfire between rival factions." Conceding that a civil war has broken out in Iraq could undermine that promise and increase pressure for a quick withdrawal of American forces.

At the same time, labeling the conflict as a civil war could deepen public distaste for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq, replacing Bush's stated goals -- annihilating terrorism and planting the seeds of Middle Eastern democracy -- with a referee's role that would be harder to justify, analysts said.

The White House continued to resist the notion that Iraq had descended into civil war. Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, sidestepped a question on whether the label applies, saying that Iraqis do not believe there is a civil war.

"It is what it is. There is a high level of sectarian violence. It is a challenge for the Iraqis. It's a challenge for us," Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One en route with the president to a NATO conference in Europe.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, who also talked with reporters aboard Bush's plane, said what's happening in Iraq does not fit the definition of a civil war.

"What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences and also trying to destabilize a democracy, which is different than a civil war, where two sides are clashing for territory and supremacy," Snow said.

Still, most scholars agree that civil war is defined as a situation in which clearly defined groups from the same country battle each other for political influence. The conflict must claim significant casualties, many say at least 1,000 lives. Sunni and Shiite violence, including brutal revenge killings, has escalated steadily in Iraq this year, and Iraq's health minister estimated this month that up to 150,000 civilians had been killed in the war.

Some of the Bush administration's strongest allies now openly use the term civil war to describe what is going on in Iraq.

Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister of Iraq, said last spring that with 50 to 60 Iraqis dying each day, "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is." Nouri al-Maliki, the current prime minister, has said there will "never be a civil war in Iraq."

Top administration and military officials, including Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, have said that Iraq could be on the brink of civil war, though Bush has never accepted that characterization. Instead, the president says it is up to U.S. forces to prevent Iraq from devolving into such a conflict.

King Abdullah II of Jordan, who is to meet with Bush Wednesday in Amman to discuss the war, warned over the weekend that given the conflict in Iraq, tensions in Lebanon and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, "We're juggling with the strong potential of three civil wars in the region." He told ABC that strong steps had to be taken to avert a "tremendous crisis."

Anthony Cordesman, a national security analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said there is no question that the situation on the ground in Iraq constitutes civil war. Arguing over whether that's true is "a remarkably silly semantic debate" that yields no solutions for the steadily increasing violence, he added.

"If you accept civil war, it is seen as marking yet another step toward what is perceived as defeat politically," Cordesman said of the Bush administration. "You have people using the term because they're dramatizing the problems, and you have the White House making the argument because it wants to stay the course."

Bush's pledge not to get U.S. troops caught in a crossfire is moot, Cordesman said. "They are already in Baghdad, trying to separate ethnic factions that are shooting at them," he said.

Bush is going to "convoluted lengths" to avoid the term civil war because he wants to avoid appearing to take sides in a raging internal battle, Peter W. Galbraith wrote in the most recent edition of New Republic magazine.

"But saying it isn't civil war doesn't make it so," said Galbraith, a former U.S. diplomat and Bush critic who has proposed partitioning Iraq. "Training and equipping Iraq's security forces as the United States is doing only produces more lethal combatants in the country's internecine conflict."

The potency of the term civil war comes from the fact that "it's not what we signed up for," said David Rothkopf of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "We went in there to replace a despotic government with a democratic government. We said we were there to get rid of terrorists. Well, which side are the terrorists?

"Now we find ourselves being a referee in a civil war. Neither side is us. It means that the premise for our national involvement and policies has been challenged and compromised," Rothkopf said.

Describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war would further reduce support for the war among the American people, who, research shows, will not tolerate U.S. casualties from intervention in that kind of conflict, analysts said.

"As bad as public support for the war is, it's likely to get worse if they see this as a civil war. It's a battle that the administration has largely lost already," said Christopher F. Gelpi, a Duke University researcher on war and public opinion. "It will raise the question in their minds, 'Well then, if this is a civil war, should we withdraw?'"

The term civil war is often used by critics of U.S. involvement to stoke public opposition, Gelpi added.

The Democratic Party pounced on NBC's announcement, accusing Bush of trying to "spin" the Iraq war by "splitting hairs."

"If you're lying dead on the street in Baghdad, I don't imagine it makes much difference" what the conflict is called, Rothkopf said, adding that the debate is "taking us away from" looking at the key moral and strategic questions about how the United States should handle it.

NBC To Use 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

NEW YORK — NBC News said Monday that its reporters and anchors would begin referring to the ongoing sectarian strife in Iraq as a "civil war," a move that reflects the news media's use of increasingly stark language to characterize the escalating violence gripping the country.

NBC's decision, which came after a particularly deadly series of retaliatory attacks in Baghdad, makes it the first television network to officially adopt the term "civil war," a description the Bush administration has resisted.

The Times was the first major news organization to formally adopt the description when it began to refer to the hostilities as a civil war in October, without public fanfare. No other major media outlet has made the phrase a matter of policy, although it has cropped up in various news reports.

The White House has exerted pressure on the media not to use the term, journalists said, which led to newsroom caution over the issue. NBC's announcement spotlights a shift in semantics that has quietly taken place on the airwaves and in newsprint as the violence has worsened along with the public's view of the situation in Iraq.

"Today" co-anchor Matt Lauer explained NBC's position at the beginning of the morning show, saying news executives had concluded that the current fighting met the definition of a civil war.

"For months now the White House has rejected claims that the situation in Iraq has deteriorated into civil war, and for the most part, news organizations like NBC have hesitated to characterize it as such," Lauer said. "But after careful consideration, NBC News has decided a change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized as civil war."

The White House continued to object to the description.

"What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences, and also trying to destabilize a democracy — which is different than a civil war, where two sides are clashing for territory and supremacy," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told reporters on Air Force One on Monday as President Bush flew to Tallinn, Estonia.

The Times began referring to the violence as a "civil war" in an Oct. 7 article after several months of internal discussions.

"For some time now we believe it has been a fairly simple call: Inside one country you have different armed groups fighting with each other," said Marjorie Miller, the newspaper's foreign editor. "That is the definition of a civil war."

The newspaper uses the term to characterize the violence in the center of Iraq and Baghdad, but editors noted that the fighting in other areas, such as the western province of Al Anbar, where Marines engage in regular combat with insurgents, was sometimes described differently. The newspaper has used "civil war" dozens of times, although Miller said it had not appeared as consistently as she would have liked.

"I had to keep up the conversation to make sure we called it what it is, a civil war," she said.

The New York Times has decided to let correspondents describe the conflict as a civil war when they and their editors believe it is appropriate, Executive Editor Bill Keller said.

"It's hard to argue that this war does not fit the generally accepted definition of civil war," Keller said in a statement, but he added that the term does not capture the complexity of the violence.

"We expect to use the phrase sparingly and carefully, not to the exclusion of other formulations, not for dramatic effect," he said.

CNN, which does not have an official policy regarding the term, has left the description of the violence in Iraq up to its correspondents, many of whom have used "civil war" in the last several months.

"Anyone who still remains in doubt about whether this is civil war or not is suffering from the luxury of distance," CNN reporter Michael Ware said on the air Monday as he reported from Baghdad.

John Daniszewski, international editor at the Associated Press, said editors there had not decided whether to adopt the term.

"From a dictionary and academic point of view, many experts already consider Iraq to be immersed in a civil war," he said in a statement. "However, there is a contrary school of thought that a civil war should be more narrowly defined as one cohesive force opposing another inside a country — whereas in Iraq the fighting and violence often seem multifaceted, chaotic and anarchic."

Political analysts said NBC's public embrace of the term further complicated the administration's efforts to maintain that the violence had not spun out of control.

"Words have power, and naming it a civil war does begin to shape people's perception of what's happening there," said Thomas Hollihan, a professor at USC's Annenberg School for Communication who studies political rhetoric.

The midterm election results, widely seen as a repudiation of the administration and its policy in Iraq, may have emboldened news organizations to adopt a characterization the White House has rejected, he added.

"The media has, by and large, been very fearful of being perceived of being liberally biased," Hollihan said. "Now that the election has occurred, there may be more license on the part of the media to say what the public has been feeling."

NBC's decision applies to newscasts, including the network's flagship evening program, anchored by Brian Williams, as well as those on cable channel MSNBC. Spokeswoman Allison Gollust said executives decided to adopt the term after extensive conversations with military experts, historians and correspondents in Iraq.

"There was unanimous agreement that this was not an inappropriate label," she said.

Retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, one of those consulted in NBC's discussions, told Lauer on Monday that he had considered the situation in Iraq a "low-grade conflict" civil war for the last 18 months.

"Now it's on the verge of spinning out of control," said McCaffrey, an NBC News analyst.

On Thursday, at least 215 people were killed by multiple bombings in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, triggering a series of deadly retaliatory attacks throughout the weekend. In a rare public comment about the fighting, United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Monday that he believed Iraq was on the brink of civil war.

Although there is not a universally accepted definition of the term, many experts agree that such a war consists of fighting between organized groups pursuing a political agenda within the recognized borders of one country.

Administration officials have maintained that the current situation in Iraq does not meet that standard, contending that the fighting has been largely centered on Baghdad and that the various insurgent forces are not unified.

A Fox News spokeswoman said the cable network had no plans to change its terminology, while CBS News said its correspondents and producers chose how to describe the fighting in their reports.

Last week, ABC anchor Charles Gibson raised the issue on the air during a conversation with senior national security correspondent Jonathan Karl.

"Military officials say it could escalate into a full-scale civil war, but with 3,700 people dying in a month and 100,000 people leaving the country and the kind of sectarian violence we're seeing, aren't we in a full-scale civil war already?" Gibson asked during the Nov. 22 afternoon webcast of "World News."

"That is certainly a debate that you can hear in the halls here at the Pentagon," Karl said. "It's a question of definitions."

NBC: Iraq In 'civil War' (USAT)

USA Today, November 28, 2006

The politically charged use of the term "civil war" to describe the violence in Iraq came to a head Monday when NBC News said that the conflict fit its description of a civil war and that NBC would call it that.

The announcement by Today's Matt Lauer put the network at odds with the White House — which said Monday that although the conflict in Iraq is serious, it is not a civil war — and prompted renewed discussion among news outlets.

CBS, ABC, CNN and Fox News said that as sectarian violence has risen, their reporters have called the conflict a civil war, and will continue, though they plan no formal change in policy.

On CNN Monday, correspondent Michael Ware said, "If this isn't a civil war, I don't know what is."

Recent dispatches in outlets such as the Los Angeles Times and New York Times also have referred to a civil war. USA TODAY calls the conflict "the war in Iraq" and refers to "sectarian violence or "religious fighting."

Tom McPhail, a journalism professor at the University of Missouri/St. Louis, says NBC's move is "a defining and negative moment" in the war in Iraq, "like when Walter Cronkite said on air that the Vietnam War was lost."

Kofi Annan Says Iraq Close To Civil War (AP-Y)

By Ben Feller

AP, November 28, 2006

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said Monday that Iraq is close to civil war, as the Bush administration stepped up diplomatic efforts to stabilize the wartorn country.

Annan talked to reporters in New York as members of the Iraq Study Group were to discuss recommendations for changes in U.S. war strategy. President Bush left for a NATO summit in Europe, but much attention was directed toward a meeting he'll have later in the week with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan.

Asked by reporters at the U.N. if Iraq is in a civil war now, Annan replied, "I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact we are almost there."

Sectarian violence in Iraq is at its worst level in the roughly 3 1/2 years since a U.S.-led coalition invaded the country and toppled Saddam Hussein. Bush's summit this week comes in the wake of talks that Vice President Dick Cheney held over the weekend in the region and as members of the special study commission mull recommendations.

The New York Times reported in Monday's editions that a draft report by the study panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III recommends aggressive regional diplomacy, including talks with Iran and Syria.

Anonymous officials who had seen the draft report told the Times it does not specify any timetables for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, although the commissioners are expected to debate the feasibility of such timetables.

The panel is expected to release its findings and recommendations in December.

Appearing Monday on ABC's "Good Morning America," former President Jimmy Carter said that "at this point everybody is waiting" for the report. "My guess is that President Bush will take their advice as much as he possibly can," he added.

Carter said he would agree with any call for direct U.S. talks with Iran and Syria over Iraq, adding: "This is one of the most counterproductive policies that I've ever known, ... not to talk to the people who disagree with you unless they agree in advance to everything you demand."

Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a potential presidential contender in 2008, said "it's not too late for the United States to extricate itself honorably from an impending disaster in Iraq."

"If the president fails to build a bipartisan foundation for an exit strategy, America will pay a high price for this blunder — one that we will have difficulty recovering from in the years ahead," Hagel wrote in Sunday's Washington Post.

As the U.S. involvement in Iraq surpassed the length of America's participation in World War II, lawmakers have dwindling confidence in the U.S.-supported Iraqi government.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a spokesman for coalition forces in Iraq, declined Monday to say whether Iraq had plunged into civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0098968

"No. What we have right now... What I would tell you is, ... we have violence that are at unacceptable levels at the moment," he said in an interview from Baghdad with Associated Press Radio. "It had been on a downward trend for about four solid weeks."

"The vast majority of the citizens here want to live in a peaceful secure city. That's what their desire is," Caldwell said.

The Bush-Maliki summit on Wednesday and Thursday, coupled with Cheney's trip to Saudi Arabia on Saturday, is evidence of the administration's stepped-up effort to bring stability to the region.

The host of the meeting, Jordan's King Abdullah, said Sunday the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq. He said much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

The king said he was hopeful the leaders will find a way to reduce the level of violence. "We hope there will be something dramatic. The challenges, obviously, in front of both of them are immense," he said.

Iraq's leaders promised Sunday to track down those responsible for the recent attacks, and al-Maliki urged his national unity government of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to curb the violence by stopping their public disputes.

The Iraqi prime minister is under pressure from Shiite politicians loyal to the radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr who have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki meets with Bush.

"This is all political posturing. It's all red herring. It's an anti-threat. This is a very stable government," responded Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie. He said he had no doubt the prime minister would meet with Bush in Jordan.

Bush Asking Arab Friends For Iraq Help (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — As President Bush and his top diplomats try to halt the downward spiral in Iraq and Lebanon, they seem intent on their strategy of talking only to Arab friends, despite increasing calls inside and outside the administration for them to reach out to Iran and Syria as well.

Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are traveling to Jordan this week for talks that are to include Iraq's prime minister and a number of Sunni Arab leaders but exclude the Iranians and Syrians, despite the influence they wield in Iraq and Lebanon.

Meanwhile, one of Ms. Rice's most trusted aides, Philip D. Zelikow, announced Monday that he was resigning his post as State Department counselor. Mr. Zelikow, widely viewed as a voice of candor in the administration on the Iraq crisis, said in his resignation letter that he would return to teaching at the University of Virginia. He cited a "truly riveting obligation to college bursars" for his children's tuition.

An administration official said Mr. Zelikow had been frustrated with administration policy on the Middle East, including Iraq, and North Korea.

There have been signs of strain within the administration, particularly at the State Department, where career Foreign Service officials have argued for increased dialogue with Iran and Syria to try to stem the violence in Iraq and Lebanon. "We've got a mess on our hands," said a senior State Department official, who, like others discussing the subject, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the subject publicly.

When Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice arrive in Amman on Wednesday, they will try to enlist help from Sunni Arab leaders to try to rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents. That was part of Vice President Dick Cheney's message to King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia during a brief visit on Saturday, administration officials said, and Mr. Bush will repeat that entreaty with King Abdullah II of Jordan, as will Ms. Rice when she meets for talks with Persian Gulf foreign ministers at the Dead Sea on Thursday and Friday.

Specifically, the United States wants Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt to work to drive a wedge between the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and the anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army has been behind many of the Shiite reprisal attacks in Iraq, a senior administration official said. That would require getting the predominantly Sunni Arab nations to work to get moderate Sunni Iraqis to support Mr. Maliki, a Shiite. That would theoretically give Mr. Maliki the political strength necessary to take on Mr. Sadr's Shiite militias.

"There's been some discussion about whether you just try to deal first with the Sunni insurgency, but that would mean being seen to be taking just one side of the fight, which would not be acceptable," the administration official said, speaking on condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic practice.

But getting Sunni Arab nations to urge Iraqi Sunnis to back Mr. Maliki in the hopes of peeling him away from Mr. Sadr is a tall order under any circumstances, and it was made even taller last week after the killing of more than 200 people by bombings in a Shiite district of Baghdad, the deadliest single attack since the American invasion. The attacks led to violent reprisals; vengeful Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baquba.

"We're clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence," Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, told reporters aboard Air Force One on the way to Estonia for a NATO summit meeting before Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Maliki. "That requires us, obviously, to adapt to that new phase, and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support them."

In return for helping on Iraq, the Sunni Arab countries have asked the Bush administration for a new push toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord. Mr. Bush has largely shied away from that longstanding demand, but things may be changing.

Ms. Rice may add two stops — Ramallah, in the West Bank, and Jerusalem — to her itinerary this week, administration officials said. While her schedule has not been made final, Ms. Rice is considering meeting with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president.

Ms. Rice has argued in favor of stepping up work on the Israeli-Palestinian front, and several times this fall she has seemed to be on the verge of a major peace initiative, only to be overtaken by other crises.

A new cease-fire began Monday after Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed to end five months of fighting in Gaza. The truce got off to a shaky start when Palestinian militants associated with Hamas and Islamic Jihad fired nine rockets into southern Israel, but American, Arab and European diplomats said this may be the most important chance in some time to end the fighting.

Mr. Olmert, in a speech on Monday, even suggested that the cease-fire could revive peace efforts. A visit by Ms. Rice to the region could further prod those efforts, American officials said.

"We have seldom seen the U.S. administration so focused on all of the constituent parts of putting the Middle East together as they are at this point," a European diplomat said. "They seem to suddenly have got that this isn't just about Iraq. It's about a number of parts of the Rubik's Cube that they have to put together again."

Beyond Israel, another part of the puzzle is whether America will directly engage Iran and Syria, something the administration remains loath to do, despite indications that a bipartisan study group will recommend a regional diplomatic initiative to include both countries. The pressure to begin talks is rising, with former administration officials joining the call.

"The Syrians are saying, 'We can negatively affect the situation in Lebanon and hurt your friends, we can negatively affect Iraq, but that's all right, don't talk to us,' " said Theodore H. Kattouf, President Bush's former ambassador to Syria. "With diplomacy generally, if you're not prepared to achieve your aims through warfare, then you have to engage in some horse-trading. Unfortunately, there isn't much give-and-take between the U.S. and Syria right now."

Bush And Maliki Make Last-ditch Effort To Keep Control Of Iraq In Amman Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington And Roula Khalaf In London

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

When US President George W. Bush and the Iraqi prime minister last met in the White House in late July, Mr Bush praised the courage of Nouri al-Maliki. The US president promised more troops to reinforce Baghdad and a continued US commitment to the Iraqi people who were demonstrating their attachment to democracy.

Since then, according to the United Nations, Iraqis are being killed at a rate of 100 a day, with 3,700 deaths in October alone. During this period, 400,000 Iraqis have fled the country, and 300 US troops have died.

Officials close to Moqtada al-Sadr are reported to have said the radical Shia cleric is threatening to pull out of the national unity government if Mr Maliki does not put a stop to attacks on the Shia. They have also warned him against meeting Mr Bush in Amman, Jordan, tomorrow and Thursday.

US politicians have repeatedly called for pressure on Mr Maliki to rein in Mr Sadr, whose militia, the Mahdi army, is believed to be involved in sectarian killings.

With his own party increasingly split over his Iraq policy following their rout by the Democrats in the mid-term elections for Congress, Mr Bush is also under extreme political pressure to start bringing troops home.

Senator Trent Lott, the incoming number two in the Republican Senate leadership, said at the weekend that Mr Bush had to be "very aggressive and specific" with Mr Maliki, suggesting that the prime minister was becoming "part of the problem".

Reflecting the views of many Americans who express exasperation with how Iraq has responded to "liberation", the senator said that if Iraqis did not respond to US help in training and reconstruction and setting guideposts for the future, "then we're going to be done with it".

The Amman summit is widely seen in Washington as a last-ditch effort by Mr Bush to demonstrate to his fragmented party and a sceptical US public that he has a grip on the situation. If not, the president will find himself with little room for manoeuvre before the new Congress convenes in early January and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and former Democrat congressman Lee Hamilton, put forward their policy recommendations, possibly in mid-December.

Meanwhile, the US military is not ruling out sending more soldiers into Baghdad to join the 7,000 reinforcements that were not able to secure and hold the city in August.

An Iraqi government spokesman said the Amman summit would chart a "map" for future relations between the US and Iraq, particularly on the security front.

Ali al-Dabbagh told the FT that Mr Maliki wanted an accelerated programme for the training of Iraqi security forces. The Iraqi government, he said, was also looking for a separate agreement with the US to "organise" and "regulate" the coalition presence - but only after the extension of its UN mandate, which comes up for renewal next month.

*Jalal Talabani, Iraq's president, said yesterday security was "the most important issue" in negotiations with Iran as he began a state visit, Gareth Smyth reports from Tehran.

Mr Talabani's trip comes amid speculation in the US over opening dialogue with Iran and Syria on Iraq's future.

Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad promised Tehran would do "whatever we can to help establish security" in Iraq and that "a secure, developed and powerful Iraq benefits the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region".

But Iranian officials suggested Tehran was in no mood to offer comfort to Washington.

Iraq Diplomacy Heats Up With Meetings (AP)

Iraq's president turned to Iran on Monday for help to stem the bloodshed, and Iraqi officials said talks this week between President Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will focus on giving Iraqis more control so U.S. forces can withdraw.

"We are in dire need of Iran's help in establishing security and stability in Iraq," Iran's state-run television quoted Iraqi President Jalal Talabani as saying after he met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran.

The increased pace of diplomacy comes as a bipartisan U.S. panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton is expected to put forth recommendations soon to the White House on alterations to Iraq policy. Seeking help from Iran and Syria was believed to be among the Iraq Study Group's proposal following American elections and calls for a speedy U.S. withdrawal.

Looking ahead to the Bush-Maliki summit in Amman, Jordan, the Iraqi side viewed the talks as the most important between leaders of the two countries since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, according to the two top officials with intimate knowledge of planning for the Wednesday-Thursday meeting.

Iraqi officials believe the summit will deal with giving Iraqi forces more control over security. The Iraqis expect President Bush to agree to such an arrangement, and they say al-Maliki will then ask for the Americans to start discussing a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, according to one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

But Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One.

The second Iraqi official, who spoke anonymously for the same reason, said American officials had indicated in preparatory talks in Baghdad that Bush was open to increasing the pace of the security hand-over.

"The responsibilities of U.S. troops will decrease when security is transferred to Iraqis, and that will mean the Americans have more soldiers here than they need," the second official said.

Also on the Iraqi agenda, the officials said, would be al-Maliki's insistence that the United States pressure its Sunni Arab allies in the region to stop what Baghdad claims is support for the Iraqi insurgency.

Lastly, al-Maliki wants to get an outline of the U.S. view of the strategic relationship that would exist as the Americans draw down their presence in the country, the Iraqi officials said.

Hadley said the conflict in Iraq had entered "a new phase" requiring changes.

"Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough," he said. "We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase."

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said, rejecting suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war.

As the summit approached, Britain said on Monday it expected to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending pullout of their remaining troops.

The Iraqi officials said they expected al-Maliki would brief Bush on the outcome of Talabani's meetings with Ahmadinejad.

Al-Maliki also was expected to explain his thoughts on how Syria, Iraq's western neighbor, could play a role in calming violence. Al-Maliki lived in exile in Syria during Saddam's rule.

Hadley said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0098971

As Iraqi officials reached out to both Iran and the U.S., speculation rose that Mideast peace might also be on Bush's agenda. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday delivered one of his most conciliatory speeches yet, and Palestinian legislator Saeb Erekat said it was possible that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas would meet with Bush in Jordan, whose king faces new vulnerability because of violence in Gaza and floods of Iraqi refugees.

Jordan's King Abdullah said Sunday the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq and that much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," he said, citing conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the decades-long strife between the Palestinians and Israelis.

Key players in those conflicts are Syria and Iran, which has a major influence over fellow Shiites in Iraq, including the Shiite-led government.

The meeting between Talabani and Ahmadinejad, which was delayed for two days because of a security clampdown in Iraq, provided Tehran an opportunity to try to assert its role as the top regional power broker to counter Washington's influence on Baghdad.

During their talks, Ahmadinejad pledged Tehran's support in helping to improve security in Iraq.

"Definitely, the Iranian government and nation will stand next to its brother Iraq and will do every help it can to strengthen security in Iraq," state-television quoted him as saying.

"We believe a stable, developed and powerful Iraq is in the interest of the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region," Ahmadinejad said, according to the television report.

Iran had been trying to organize a summit joining Ahmadinejad, Talabani and Syrian President Bashar Assad, but Damascus decided against attending.

Talabani flew to Tehran on Monday after the government ended a three-day curfew on vehicle traffic and reopened the international airport. The curfew and closure were imposed after bombings Thursday killed 215 people in Sadr City, Baghdad's main Shiite Muslim enclave.

Iran's potential for heavy influence in Iraq is particularly troubling to the Bush administration. Many in Iraq's new Shiite-dominated power structure have deep ties to Iran, and many of the key players spent considerable time in exile in Iran during Saddam's rule. The two main Shiite militias in Iraq are believed to rely heavily on Iran for training, funding and weapons.

The United States has been estranged from the Shiite theocracy that has run Iran since the pro-U.S. shah was toppled nearly three decades ago, and the difficult relationship has only worsened as Washington accuses Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons in disregard of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Thus, inviting Iran to become a formal player in an attempt to quell violence in Iraq would be an extraordinarily delicate diplomatic maneuver for the White House.

It faces the same problem with Syria, which the United States has basically shunned in recent years, especially since the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Syrian agents have been implicated in that crime and the U.S. has pointed to Damascus in the killing last week of another anti-Syrian Lebanese leader, Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel.

In Diplomatic Turn, Iraqi Reaches Out To Iran (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 27 -- In the latest sign of a budding diplomatic relationship, Iraq's President Jalal Talabani arrived in Iran on Monday to seek his neighbor's help in ending his country's sectarian conflict, as Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of troops by the end of next year.

The diplomatic maneuvering came on a day when a U.S. Air Force fighter jet with one pilot aboard crashed north of Baghdad, officials announced. The U.S. military provided no details on how the plane crashed or what happened to its pilot.

Talabani's visit to Tehran was delayed by a three-day curfew imposed after a series of car bombs exploded in the Shiite Muslim stronghold of Sadr City on Thursday, setting off a wave of reprisal killings. There were reports of sporadic violence Monday as the curfew was lifted.

"We are in dire need of Iran's help in establishing security and stability in Iraq," state-run television quoted Talabani as saying after he met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran.

Ahmadinejad pledged his support in helping Iraq stop the escalating violence. "Definitely, the Iranian government and nation will stand next to its brother Iraq," he said on state-run television. "We believe a stable, developed and powerful Iraq is in the interest of the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region."

The United States has been leery of Iran's effort to position itself as a regional power broker. Relations between Iran and the United States deteriorated this year, as a defiant Ahmadinejad refused demands that he suspend his country's uranium enrichment program. The Bush administration has also accused Iran of fomenting the violence in Iraq by assisting Shiite militias, an allegation that officials in Tehran have denied.

In Washington, the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, is seriously considering recommending next month that President Bush begin discussions with Iran and Syria, another adversary in the Middle East, on how to stabilize the region.

Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Wednesday and Thursday.

In London, British Defense Secretary Des Browne said that many British soldiers will leave Iraq over the next year, as control of two southern provinces is transferred to Iraqi forces. Britain, the United States' main coalition partner, has 7,000 troops in the country.

"Even when all the provinces are handed over, we will still be providing a force to mentor and back up the Iraqi army and police and to protect coalition supply routes," Browne said in a speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs. "But I can tell you that by the end of next year, I expect numbers of British forces in Iraq to be significantly lower -- by a matter of thousands."

Also Monday, Polish President Lech Kaczynski said his country would pull out its remaining 900 soldiers by the end of 2007. And Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said the last of Italy's 60 or 70 soldiers will leave this week.

Bush is under intense pressure to withdraw U.S. troops after a 3 1/2 -year presence but has said he cannot do so until Iraqi forces are ready to secure their own country.

The violence that engulfed Iraq after last week's bombings illustrated how far the Iraqi government is from that goal. Security forces are widely seen as ineffective at best and in collusion with militias and death squads at worst.

Among Monday's discoveries were 39 bodies in Baghdad, apparently victims of death squads, the Associated Press reported.

The U.S. military announced that three soldiers were killed and two wounded in fighting in Baghdad on Sunday.

A U.S. Air Force F-16 fighter jet crashed about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad about 1:35 p.m. local time while it was engaged in combat operations, the Air Force reported.

The al-Jazeera satellite television network showed footage that it said depicted the wreckage and said it had video of a dead pilot.

East of Fallujah, Lt. Col. Ayman Falah, the deputy chief of police in the town of Haswa, said he had requested the help of U.S. forces to confront a group of terrorists. He said that the jet arrived, flying at a low altitude, and that the terrorists brought it down with missiles. Afterward, American forces sealed off the area and imposed a curfew, he said.

U.S. military officials would not comment on Falah's account.

In Canberra, a special inquiry cleared Australia's government on Monday of wrongdoing in an Iraqi oil-for-food scandal, but recommended that top officials of the monopoly wheat exporter face charges for paying more than $200 million to Saddam Hussein's government, the Associated Press reported.

Iran Promises To Help Iraq In Ending Violence There (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

TEHRAN, Nov. 27 — Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, pledged Monday in a meeting with the Iraqi president that Iran would do all it could to stop the growing violence in Iraq.

"The Iranian government and people will stand by their brothers in Iraq and will do anything to help bring peace into Iraq," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a news conference with the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani, state-run television reported. "A safe, developed and strong Iraq is better for Iran and also for the region," he said.

In an effort to increase its role as an influential power in the region, Iran also invited the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, to join the talks. But Mr. Assad did not respond to the invitation, according to an official at Mr. Ahmadinejad's office who requested anonymity.

Analysts believe that Mr. Talabani is here to urge Iranian officials to hold direct talks with the United States to help stop the bloodshed in Iraq. Iran has close ties with Shiite leaders in Iraq, and it might be able to call on them to exert restraint. Many of them lived in Iran in exile when Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq.

A draft report by an American bipartisan commission studying new strategies for Iraq urges that the United States conduct direct talks with Iran and Syria, according to American officials who have seen all or part of the document.

In the press conference, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd who had close ties to Iran, said Iraq needed Iran's help to bring peace.

"We seriously need Iran's help to restore stability and security," he was quoted as saying.

Iran and Iraq fought a bloody war from 1980 to 1988. Mr. Talabani was Iraq's first president to travel to Iran when he came a year ago, and Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, visited Iran in September.

In Iraq on Monday, an American fighter jet crashed in Anbar Province about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad, the American military command reported. The Air Force F-16, which had one pilot on board, was supporting combat troops when it went down, the military said, offering no further details.

Mohammed al-Obeidi, a resident in the nearby town of Karma who witnessed the crash, told The Associated Press that the jet had been flying erratically before it plunged into a field and exploded. Al Jazeera television reported that two Iraqi militant groups, Mujahedeen Army and the Mujahedeen Shura Council, claimed that they had brought down the plane, according to [a news service].

Three American soldiers were killed in the capital and two were wounded during combat operations on Sunday, according to a military press statement.

American forces opened fire on civilians in the Husseiniya neighborhood in northeast Baghdad late Monday night, killing five and wounding eight, an Interior Ministry official said. An American military spokeswoman in Baghdad said she had no information on the shooting.

On Monday, the government lifted a curfew it had imposed on Baghdad after a series of car bombs on Thursday killed more than 200 people in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City.

The curfew gave way to scattered violence on Monday. According to the Interior Ministry official, three guards were kidnapped from the Municipal Building, the latest in a series of brazen daylight attacks against government buildings.

At least six people were killed and 20 wounded in attacks in the capital, including a mortar bombardment, two clashes between gunmen and Iraqi security forces, and another kidnapping, the official said.

The Iraqi police found at least 39 bodies scattered around Baghdad and another five dumped just east of the city, according to the official.

In Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, gunmen killed a store owner in the town of Muqdadiya, then hid a bomb in the store and detonated it when a group of civilians arrived to retrieve the owner's body, the ministry official said. Four of them were killed and 25 were wounded, according to the official. Twelve more people were killed in other incidents around Baquba, the provincial capital, the official said.

Hezbollah Said To Help Shiite Army In Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — A senior American intelligence official said Monday that the Iranian-backed group Hezbollah had been training members of the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by Moktada al-Sadr.

The official said that 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. A small number of Hezbollah operatives have also visited Iraq to help with training, the official said.

Iran has facilitated the link between Hezbollah and the Shiite militias in Iraq, the official said. Syrian officials have also cooperated, though there is debate about whether it has the blessing of the senior leaders in Syria.

The intelligence official spoke on condition of anonymity under rules set by his agency, and discussed Iran's role in response to questions from a reporter.

The interview occurred at a time of intense debate over whether the United States should enlist Iran's help in stabilizing Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, directed by James A. Baker III, a former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker, is expected to call for direct talks with Tehran.

The claim about Hezbollah's role in training Shiite militias could strengthen the hand of those in the Bush administration who oppose a major new diplomatic involvement with Iran.

The new American account is consistent with a claim made in Iraq this summer by a mid-level Mahdi commander, who said his militia had sent 300 fighters to Lebanon, ostensibly to fight alongside Hezbollah. "They are the best-trained fighters in the Mahdi Army," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The specific assertions about Iran's role went beyond those made publicly by senior American officials, though Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, did tell Congress this month that "the Iranian hand is stoking violence" in Iraq.

The American intelligence on Hezbollah was based on human sources, electronic means and interviews with detainees captured in Iraq.

American officials say the Iranians have also provided direct support to Shiite militias in Iraq, including explosives and trigger devices for roadside bombs, and training for several thousand fighters, mostly in Iran. The training is carried out by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards and the Ministry of Intelligence and Security, they say.

In Congressional testimony this month, General Hayden said he was initially skeptical of reports of Iran's role but changed his mind after reviewing intelligence reports.

"I'll admit personally," he said at one point in the hearing, "that I have come late to this conclusion, but I have all the zeal of a convert as to the ill effect that the Iranians are having on the situation in Iraq."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, offered a similar assessment in his testimony.

Neither General Hayden nor General Maples described Hezbollah's role during the hearing.

In the interview on Monday, the senior intelligence official was asked for further details about the purported Iranian role.

"They have been a link to Lebanese Hezbollah and have helped facilitate Hezbollah training inside of Iraq, but more importantly Jaish al-Mahdi members going to Lebanon," the official said, describing Iran's role and using the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army.

The official said the Hezbollah training had been conducted with the knowledge of Mr. Sadr, the most influential Shiite cleric.

While Iran wants a stable Iraq, the official said, it sees an advantage in "managed instability in the near term" to bog down the American military and defeat the Bush administration's objectives in the region.

"There seems to have been a strategic decision taken sometime over late winter or early spring by Damascus, Tehran, along with their partners in Lebanese Hezbollah, to provide more support to Sadr to increase pressure on the U.S.," the American intelligence official said.

Some Middle East experts were skeptical about the assessment of Hezbollah's training role.

"That sound to me a little bit strained," said Flynt Leverett, a senior fellow at the New America Foundation and a Middle East expert formerly on the National Security Council staff. "I have a hard time thinking it is a really significant piece of what we are seeing play out on the ground with the various Shiite militia forces."

But other specialists found the assessment plausible. "I think it is plausible because Hezbollah is the best in the business, and it enhances their position with Iran, Syria and Iraq," said Judith Kipper, of the Council on Foreign Relations.

The Mahdi Army and other militia fighters traveled to Lebanon in groups of 15 and 20 and some were present during the fighting between Hezbollah and Israel this summer, though there was no indication they had taken part in the fighting, the American intelligence official said.

Asked what the militia members had learned, the official replied, "Weapons, bomb-making, intelligence, assassinations, the gambit of skill sets."

There is intelligence that indicates that Iran shipped machine tools to Lebanon that could be used to make "shaped charges," sophisticated explosive devices designed to penetrate armor, American officials have said. But it is not known how the equipment was in fact used.

The officials said that because the Iraqi militia members went through Syrian territory, at least some Syrian officials were complicit. There are also reports of meetings between Imad Mugniyah, a senior Hezbollah member; Ghassem Soleimani of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards; and Syrian representatives to discuss ways of stepping up the pressure on the United States in Iraq.

The mid-level Mahdi commander interviewed this summer said the group sent to Lebanon was called the Ali al-Hadi Brigade, named for one of two imams buried at the Askariya Mosque in Samarra. The bombing of that shrine in February unleashed the fury of Shiite militias and accelerated sectarian violence.

According to the Mahdi commander, the brigade was organized and dispatched by a senior Mahdi officer known as Abu Mujtaba. It went by bus to Syria in July, and was then led across the border into Lebanon, he said. He said the fighters were from Diwaniya and Basra, as well as from the Shiite neighborhoods of Shoala and Sadr City in Baghdad.

"They travel as normal people from Iraq to Syria," one of the militiamen said. "Once they get to Syria, fighters in Syria take them in."

Among American officials, concern over the purported Iranian, Syrian or Hezbollah role grew recently when an advanced antitank weapon, an RPG-29, was used against an American M-1 tank in Iraq.

"The first time we saw it was not in Iraq," Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, told reporters in September. "We saw it in Lebanon. So to me, No. 1, it indicates an Iranian connection."

American intelligence officials said the source of the weapon was still unclear.

General Abizaid also said it was hard to pin down some details of relationships between armed factions in the Middle East, adding: "There are clearly links between Hezbollah training people in Iran to operate in Lebanon and also training people in Iran that are Shia splinter groups that could operate against us in Iraq These linkages exist, but it is very, very hard to pin down with precision."

Rising Violence Swells Ranks Of Iraq's Militias (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Retaliatory attacks sparked by last week's massive bomb assault on a Shiite neighborhood here are driving more Iraqis into the ranks of sectarian militias amid rising distrust of government security forces, newly recruited gunmen and residents said Monday.

Besieged Iraqis, many with no previous affiliation with established militias, are taking up arms, barricading their communities and joining new Shiite Muslim militia cells or increasingly militant Sunni Arab neighborhood-watch groups.

"We have zero trust in the Iraqi army and minus-zero trust in the police," said Ahmed Suheil Juburi, 33, a Sunni Arab who has thrown in his lot with a group of former military officers in Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime patrolling the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora.

Thousands of unsanctioned fighters have been on high alert since the car bombings Thursday in Sadr City, a poor Baghdad neighborhood that is home to the Al Mahdi militia, a Shiite force loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Since the attack, which killed at least 215 people, Sadr's fighters have struck back at Sunni neighborhoods with mortar shells, rockets and machine-gun raids from fast-moving SUVs. Sunni Arab fighters have retaliated in kind.

The bombings and subsequent attacks have killed 524 people, including 181 whose bodies were left in Baghdad's streets, and injured 653 since Thursday, according to government tallies obtained by The Times.

The mounting carnage is another sign that Iraq's civil war is gaining momentum faster than either the U.S. or Iraqi governments can respond.

In Baghdad, mortar shells have continued to pummel neighborhoods, and bands of men drive people out of their homes at gunpoint. Authorities find corpses in trash heaps and side streets on a daily basis; at least 44 were found Monday.

Residents are blocking roads with blasted cars and tree trunks. Guns and ammunition are being passed out in mosques and homes. Throughout Baghdad, men end their workdays by taking up positions on rooftops and minarets.

Fighters on both sides of Iraq's sectarian conflict say that the recent growth of militias stems from deep distrust of the intent and capability of the nation's security forces, whose reputation has been crippled by corruption and sectarian infiltration.

Sunnis have long complained that Shiite militias dominate the police force, and that members have committed thousands of death-squad slayings. Shiites say that the Iraqi army, with its many Sunni Arabs, has failed to guard their communities from attacks such as the series of car bombs Thursday.

Salam Saedi, 29, a cleaner at a downtown Baghdad hotel, said he signed up with Sadr's militia the day after the Sadr City bombings.

"I was not a part of the public committees or the Mahdi army, but after the attacks I saw the people who were killed and my feelings changed," Saedi said. "So I contacted some friends and I went and I signed up with the Mahdi army. They gave me an AK-47."

In the wake of the Sadr City bombings, members say, the Al Mahdi army has boosted the ranks of its "popular committees," a recently formed armed wing.

Each block of 1,500 homes in the neighborhood is guarded by 50 to 100 men, members said.

Across town in Dora, a mostly Sunni area, Juburi said he kept "several AK-47s, a BKC [high-caliber machine gun] and even a grenade launcher in my orchard."

He said his neighbors reactivated a group of retired Baathist officers that formed in February during similar sectarian reprisals that followed the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. The bombing and its bloody aftermath are widely viewed as the turning point that pushed Iraq into civil war.

"Right now, there are anywhere between 400 and 500 organized fighters in my area doing patrols and setting up checkpoints for defensive measures in the event that we are attacked by militias," he said.

Juburi said the total force in Dora comprised 2,000 to 2,500 men organized in companies of 50 fighters each.

The continued growth and proliferation of paramilitary forces in Iraq threatens to hamper U.S. plans for withdrawal.

Complicating any solution are the ties between many of Iraq's paramilitary forces and leading political parties.

The Sadr movement, for example, has 30 seats in government — possibly enough to topple Prime Minister Nouri Maliki should they withdraw in protest.

Adnan Dulaimi, a prominent Sunni Arab legislator, also has a paramilitary squad deployed throughout west Baghdad, where members clashed with Shiites over the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0098976

This month, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told a U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee that his field agents believed Iraq's sectarian forces were "descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues and over smaller and smaller pieces of territory."

Firas Kabi, 27, whose wholesale goods shop stands near Sadr City, thought of himself as a lone wolf until Thursday's attack. Now he mans an Al Mahdi army checkpoint.

"My feelings have changed. Before I was living my life and I didn't care to be part of any group," he said. "But now I feel I am part of this community that was being attacked and oppressed. I wanted to be a martyr with the people who lost their lives and went to heaven."

Although many fighters interviewed Monday emphasized the defensive purposes of paramilitary groups, some acknowledged taking part in retaliatory attacks against other sects. Some Sunni groups suggested that they were in contact with more militant organizations — a worrisome development for the U.S. military, which faces a stubborn insurgency.

Juburi, the Sunni fighter, said that since the Sadr City attack a band of Al Mahdi army fighters had kicked several Sunni Arabs out of their homes. The refugees sought help from Juburi's community security force, which kicked Shiites out and gave the refugees their homes, he said.

Omar Mohammed Hussein Dulaimi, 29, said that his Sunni Arab district in west Baghdad formed a neighborhood watch three months ago and fought with Al Mahdi militiamen Friday.

"We close the roads with tree trunks and stay on our roofs with guns," Dulaimi said. "We contact each other with cellphones to check the situation."

Dulaimi said that the security force in his 100-man cell, including former Baathist military and intelligence officials, guarded 500 homes.

"The mujahedin are helping us," Dulaimi said, referring to Sunni Arab insurgents. "Today two cars with gunmen came from Abu Ghraib to help us defend our mosques and our area from militia attacks. They even brought white sheets to cover their bodies in case they are martyred. They also brought heavy machine guns."

Another member of the Sunni force, Ziad Raad Ani, 32, described how Shiite gunmen and police attempted to attack their neighborhood Friday.

"They came in government-issued SUVs and pickup trucks and starting shooting with all kinds of weapons," Ani said.

Ani said the two sides fought for two hours that day. Witnesses said Iraqi soldiers and policemen watched but did not interfere.

Anbar Picture Grows Clearer, And Bleaker (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter al-Qaeda's rising popularity there, according to newly disclosed details from a classified Marine Corps intelligence report that set off debate in recent months about the military's mission in Anbar province.

The Marines recently filed an updated version of that assessment that stood by its conclusions and stated that, as of mid-November, the problems in troubled Anbar province have not improved, a senior U.S. intelligence official said yesterday. "The fundamental questions of lack of control, growth of the insurgency and criminality" remain the same, the official said.

The Marines' August memo, a copy of which was shared with The Washington Post, is far bleaker than some officials suggested when they described it in late summer. The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as "embroiled in a daily fight for survival," fearful of "pogroms" by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on al-Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital.

True or not, the memo says, "from the Sunni perspective, their greatest fears have been realized: Iran controls Baghdad and Anbaris have been marginalized." Moreover, most Sunnis now believe it would be unwise to count on or help U.S. forces because they are seen as likely to leave the country before imposing stability.

Between al-Qaeda's violence, Iran's influence and an expected U.S. drawdown, "the social and political situation has deteriorated to a point" that U.S. and Iraqi troops "are no longer capable of militarily defeating the insurgency in al-Anbar," the assessment found. In Anbar province alone, at least 90 U.S. troops have died since Sept. 1.

The Post first reported on the memo's existence in September, as it was being circulated among military and national security officials. Several officials who read the report described its conclusions as grim.

But the contents have not previously been made public. Read as a complete assessment, it paints a stark portrait of a failed province and of the country's Sunnis -- once dominant under Saddam Hussein -- now desperate, fearful and impoverished. They have been increasingly abandoned by religious and political leaders who have fled to neighboring countries, and other leaders have been assassinated. And unlike Iraq's Shiite majority, or Kurdish groups in the north, the Sunnis are without oil and other natural resources. The report notes that illicit oil trading is providing millions of dollars to al-Qaeda while "official profits appear to feed Shiite cronyism in Baghdad."

As a result, "the potential for economic revival appears to be nonexistent" in Anbar, the report says. The Iraqi government, dominated by Iranian-backed Shiites, has not paid salaries for Anbar officials and Iraqi forces stationed there. Anbar's resources and its ability to impose order are depicted as limited at best.

"Despite the success of the December elections, nearly all government institutions from the village to provincial levels have disintegrated or have been thoroughly corrupted and infiltrated by Al Qaeda in Iraq," or a smattering of other insurgent groups, the report says.

The five-page report -- written by Col. Peter Devlin, a senior and seasoned military intelligence officer with the Marine Expeditionary Force -- is marked secret, for dissemination to U.S. and allied troops in Iraq only. It does not appear to have been made available to Iraqi national forces fighting alongside Americans.

The report, "State of the Insurgency in Al-Anbar," focuses on conditions in the province that is home to 1.25 million Iraqis, most of whom live in violence-ridden towns such as Fallujah, Haditha, Hit, Qaim and Ramadi.

Devlin wrote that attacks on civilians rose 57 percent between February and August of this year. "Although it is likely that attack levels have peaked, the steady rise in attacks from mid-2003 to 2006 indicates a clear failure to defeat the insurgency in al-Anbar."

Devlin suggested that without the deployment of an additional U.S. military division -- 15,000 to 20,000 troops -- plus billions of dollars in aid to the province, "there is nothing" U.S. troops "can do to influence" the insurgency.

He described al-Qaeda in Iraq as the "dominate organization of influence in al-Anbar," surpassing all other groups, the Iraqi government and U.S. troops "in its ability to control the day-to-day life of the average Sunni."

Al-Qaeda itself, now an "integral part of the social fabric of western Iraq," has become so entrenched, autonomous and financially independent that U.S. forces no longer have the option "for a decapitating strike that would cripple the organization," the report says. That is why, it says, the death of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June "had so little impact on the structure and capabilities of al-Qaeda," especially in Anbar province.

The senior intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his work, said yesterday that he largely agrees with Devlin's assessment, except that he thinks it overstates the role of al-Qaeda in the province. "We argue that it is a major element in Anbar, but it is not the largest or most dominant group," he said.

In a final section of the report, titled "Way Ahead," Devlin outlined several possibilities for bringing stability to the area, including establishing a Sunni state in Anbar, creating a local paramilitary force to protect Sunnis and to offset Iranian influence, shifting local budget controls, and strengthening a committed Iraqi police force that has "proven remarkably resilient in most areas."

Devlin ended the assessment by saying that while violence has surged, the presence of U.S. troops in Anbar has had "a real suppressive effect on the insurgency." He said the suffering of "Anbar's citizens undoubtedly would be far worse now if it was not for the very effective efforts" of U.S. forces.

The Marine Corps headquarters had no comment on the August report or the updated assessment, Lt. Col. Scott J. Fazekas, a spokesman, said yesterday.

Iraq Panel Inks Draft Report (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

The Iraq Study Group met yesterday at an undisclosed location to discuss its first draft report that calls for increased diplomatic engagement in the region and new military moves to rescue Iraq from a descent into civil war.

The panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat, finished work on the draft during the weekend. It contains an assessment of where violence-racked Iraq stands more than three years after the U.S. ousted Saddam Hussein.

It also includes a list of recommendations on diplomatic and military fronts. A final report to President Bush is expected next month.

Mr. Baker is said to be pushing a recommendation for the Bush administration to engage in direct talks with Syria and Iran, two U.S.-designated state sponsors of terrorism who are supporting various insurgencies and terrorist attacks in Iraq.

David Satterfield, the State Department's top adviser on Iraq, told Congress earlier this month that the administration is willing to talk with Tehran but not Damascus. Mr. Satterfield listed several of Syria's pro-terrorism policies, such as backing Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Mr. Hamilton told The Washington Times last week that the first draft is a working document that can be changed by the 10-member panel created by Congress.

Defense sources said it will be difficult for the group of five Democrats and five Republicans, all former officeholders, to reach a unanimous report if it recommends a significant shift away from Mr. Bush's policy of no specific timetable for removing U.S. troops, which now number close to 150,000.

The Pentagon is conducting its own extensive review, from which Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, will make recommendations to the president. Pentagon officials say they want Mr. Bush to have options that include input from generals.

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, has told Congress that he does not want a troop increase or a withdrawal timetable. He said a troop increase would send the wrong signal that the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) have more time to prepare to take over counterinsurgency missions.

Pentagon officials say it is doubtful Gen. Pace would overrule Gen. Abizaid.

U.S. soldiers in Iraq are caught between killing sprees of Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims, especially in greater Baghdad, where ramped-up security operations during the past two months did not meet their objectives, the command acknowledged.

Anthony Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, issued a paper yesterday on Sunni extremists' desire for a civil war and for a much larger religious struggle in the region.

"The attackers have several advantages," Mr. Cordesman said. "They are hitting at very soft civilian targets; they only need very limited numbers of attackers and can use car bombs or suicide bombs that are very hard to detect and defend against."

He warned against talk of a quick U.S. pullout.

"It is also clear that threatening to leave is not going to help," he said. "Iraqis need to see positive measures towards security, conciliation and economic aid."

How Iraq Panel Went From Obscure To High Profile (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

Rep. Frank Wolf (R) of Virginia has traveled to the most difficult war and civil war zones on the planet - from Chechnya and Bosnia to Sudan and Algeria. He had visited Iraq twice before, both times without a military escort. On his third visit, in September 2005, he had an epiphany.

He was about to tour a maternity ward in Tikrit when armed security guards were called in. Noting the mothers' and nurses' reaction, he recalls, "I said: 'We've got to get out of here. We can't walk through a maternity ward with guns like this scaring people." He concluded then that the US needed "fresh eyes" on its Iraq involvement.

From that small beginning has sprung one of the most-anticipated blue-ribbon commissions in recent years - the Iraq Study Group, which began deliberating over final conclusions this week.

How an obscure panel became a policy touchstone for Republicans and Democrats is a story in itself. More important, it illustrates those rare moments when a crisis reaches such a point that official Washington temporarily loosens hold of the reins. It's in those moments that experienced outside voices - think the 9/11 and Warren commissions - can make themselves heard. The Iraq panel, in particular, may prove particularly influential because of the escalating chaos in Iraq.

"We're losing," says Michael O'Hanlon, a policy analyst at the Brookings Institution. "One of the few hopes we have left is someone who is close enough to [President] Bush that he will be listened to by Bush - and smart enough and independent enough to see this in a different way."

Unlike the 9/11 commission, the Iraq Study Group has conducted its review of US engagement in Iraq in strict secrecy. Panelists were not publicly vetted. There were no open hearings or regular updates on whether the administration was being cooperative in releasing needed documents.

"If they had held open hearings or gone on television talk shows, like the 9/11 commission, they would have been forced into positions by the very nature of the questions that they would have lost their independence," says Congressman Wolf, who is the co-chairman of the human rights caucus in Congress.

While he would have liked to see Congress take up the serious work of oversight and recalibrating strategy on the Iraq war, he opted instead for a panel of "wise persons," because the Congress was too divided along partisan lines to play that role effectively. Like the 9/11 commission, the panel is to report to the American people, not just to the president or the Congress, he says. "This will be the defining issue of our time: How do we deal with the issue of terrorism? - and it has to be done in a bipartisan way," he says.

The Iraq Study Group is the flip side of the usual blue-ribbon panel, whose launch is often its high point. It began modestly as a one-line earmark in last spring's emergency defense spending bill - "$1 million ... for activities relating to Iraq."

It was born from the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad in 2005, which Wolf says was a sharp contrast to his second visit in 2003, with Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut. While even then they traveled anonymously in old, beat-up vehicles for security reasons, they could visit villages, homes, hospitals, and schools relatively freely. In Al Kut, they were welcomed to join a wedding celebration and told how people loved America.

After his 2005 trip, Wolf urged Mr. Bush to select a group of "capable and distinguished individuals" to go to the region to "comprehensively review our efforts" in Iraq. He also began rounds of quiet consultations on the idea from Congress to the State Department, the Pentagon, and private think tanks.

"Frank Wolf is a very creative member of Congress," says David Abshire, a longtime diplomat who is advising the Iraq Study Group.

The reason the group caught on so quickly in official Washington is because, "they're all groping," says Mr. Abshire. "Ultimately, they all recognize the seriousness of the situation and want to do the right thing for the country."

Cochaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton, the 10-member group includes retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, former Attorney General Edwin Meese, former Clinton aide Leon Panetta, lobbyist Vernon Jordan, former Defense Secretary William Perry and former Sens. Charles Robb and Alan Simpson. Former CIA Director Robert Gates left the group after Bush nominated him to be secretary of Defense.

Launched last spring, the ISG took on a much higher profile this fall, as elections neared and the situation on the ground got worse in Iraq.

"No one paid attention to this until the fall when it became clear that the Republican majority was going to fall and Iraq was the issue over which Republicans would lose," says Ivo Daalder, a senior fellow at Brookings in Washington, D.C.

Wolf says he welcomes the high profile his simple idea has assumed. "I get amused when I think how we struggled to get it done, and now even Senator Kerry is supporting it," he says. "I think the attention will make the report even better."

Iraq Panel's Real Agenda: Damage Control (CSM)

By Andrew J. Bacevich

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

BOSTON

Even as Washington waits with bated breath for the Iraq Study Group (ISG) to release its findings, the rest of us should see this gambit for what it is: an attempt to deflect attention from the larger questions raised by America's failure in Iraq and to shore up the authority of the foreign policy establishment that steered the United States into this quagmire. This ostentatiously bipartisan panel of Wise Men (and one woman) can't really be searching for truth. It is engaged in damage control.

Their purpose is twofold: first, to minimize Iraq's impact on the prevailing foreign policy consensus with its vast ambitions and penchant for armed intervention abroad; and second, to quell any inclination of ordinary citizens to intrude into matters from which they have long been excluded. The ISG is antidemocratic. Its implicit message to Americans is this: We'll handle things - now go back to holiday shopping.

The group's composition gives the game away. Chaired by James Baker, the famed political operative and former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former congressman and fixture on various blue-ribbon commissions, it contains no one who could be even remotely described as entertaining unorthodox opinions or maverick tendencies.

Instead, it consists of Beltway luminaries such as retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and lobbyist Vernon Jordan. No member is now an elected official. Neither do its ranks include any Iraq war veterans, family members of soldiers killed in Iraq, or anyone identified with the antiwar movement. None possesses specialized knowledge of Islam or the Middle East.

Charging this crowd with assessing the Iraq war is like convening a committee of Roman Catholic bishops to investigate the church's clergy sex-abuse scandal. Even without explicit instructions, the group's members know which questions not to ask and which remedies not to advance. Sadly, the average Catholic's traditional deference to the church hierarchy finds its counterpart in the average American's deference to "experts" when it comes to foreign policy. The ISG exemplifies the result: a befuddled, but essentially passive-electorate looks for guidance to a small group of unelected insiders reflecting a narrow range of views and operating largely behind closed doors.

The guardians of the foreign policy status quo are counting on the panel to extricate the US from Iraq. More broadly, they are counting on it to avoid inquiring into the origins of our predicament. So don't think for a moment that the ISG will assess the implications of America's growing addiction to foreign oil. Don't expect it to question the wisdom of President Bush's doctrine of preventive war or the feasibility of his Freedom Agenda, which promises to implant democracy across the Islamic world.

Far be it from the group to ask whether an open-ended "global war on terror" makes sense as a response to 9/11 or to ponder the flagrant manipulation and misuse of intelligence in the months leading up to the Iraq war. The ISG won't assess the egregious flaws in US military planning for the Iraq invasion or the manifest deficiencies in American generalship since the war began. On the role that Congress has played in enabling presidential fecklessness, you can be certain that Baker and Hamilton will remain silent.

The ISG will provide cover for the Bush administration to shift course in Iraq. It will pave the way for the Democratic Congress to endorse that shift in a great show of bipartisanship. But it will hold no one responsible.

Above all, it will leave intact the assumptions, arrangements, and institutions that gave rise to Iraq in the first place. In doing so, it will ensure that the formulation of foreign policy remains the preserve of political mahatmas like Baker and Hamilton, with the American people left to pick up the tab.

In this way, the ISG will make possible - even likely - a repetition of some disaster akin to Iraq at a future date.

Britain May Start Pulling Out Of Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Quinn

AP, November 28, 2006

LONDON (AP) - Britain said Monday it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, while Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski said his country, a U.S. ally in Iraq and Afghanistan, would pull its remaining 900 soldiers out of Iraq by the end of 2007. And Italian Premier Romano Prodi said the last of Italy's soldiers in Iraq - some 60-70 troops - will return home this week, ending the Italian contingent's presence in the south of the country after more than three years.

British Defense Secretary Des Browne was the second senior official in recent days to talk of reducing the number of British troops in Iraq. In a speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs, Browne also warned Iran that it faces increasing isolation if it does not use its influence in Iraq constructively.

Last week, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Britain may be able to hand over security responsibility in the southern port city of Basra by the spring of 2007. Britain also hopes to hand security control over to the Iraqis in the province of Maysan on the Iranian border in January.

(AP) Britain's Defence Secretary Des Browne delivers a speech regarding the British strategy in Iraq at...

Full Image"We have said that we and the Iraqis hope they will be ready to take over Maysan in January," Browne said. "We have said - and the foreign secretary reiterated last week - that we hope they will be ready to take over Basra in the spring.

"If both of these go to plan, we will be able to start drawing down our forces."

Browne said that handing over security would not mean a complete British withdrawal.

"I do not believe it is right to give precise numbers, nor to assume what the next 12 months will hold.

"But I can tell you that by the end of next year I expect numbers of British forces in Iraq to be significantly lower - by a matter of thousands. The planning for this has been going on for some months."

(AP) Britain's Prime Minister Tony Blair gives his speech at the Guildhall at the Lord Mayor's Banquet,...

Full ImageAny troop pullback, he said, would be "driven not by arbitrary deadlines but by reality on the ground."

"We will stay as long as we are making a positive difference, and as long as the Iraqi government need our support," Browne said.

Sectarian divisions in Iraq will not be resolved quickly, Browne said, but he argued against dividing the country into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish sections, warning that doing so would destabilize the region further.

The defense secretary also called on Iraq's neighbors to support efforts to calm the violence.

"Even Syria, whose motives the international community has often had cause to question, has shown signs of constructive engagement," Browne said.

Syria's foreign minister has indicated his country is willing to help stabilize Iraq, and on a visit to Baghdad last week he announced the full restoration of diplomatic relations.

Iran's behavior, Browne said, remained troubling. The U.S., Britain and others have accused Iran of providing support to Shiite militias blamed for much of the sectarian killing in Iraq. Iran has denied the claims.

Iran "has influence inside Iraq, the power to turn up or turn down the heat, to turn on or turn off the dialogue. It is not using that influence well," Browne said.

DOJ_NMG_0098981

"Iran's interest is in a stable and non-aggressive Iraq," he added.

"So the message to Iran is simple. Be a constructive partner, help yourself as well as the wider region - or face increasing isolation."

A New House Democrat With An Insiders' View Of Iraq (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — The sudden rise of Chris Carney, a pre-Iraq war Pentagon intelligence analyst turned newly elected Democratic congressman, has a remarkable quality about it.

In early 2002, Mr. Carney, a Naval Reserve officer, was assigned to work in a tiny intelligence unit created by Douglas J. Feith, then the under secretary of defense for policy, to search for links between terrorist groups and their possible state-sponsors, most notably Iraq. After the 2003 invasion, the Feith unit, the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, was caught up in the debate over the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence, and the office was investigated by a Senate committee and an independent presidential commission.

Today, Mr. Carney is back in Washington in a very different role, as the Democratic representative-elect from the 10th Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Carney, a 47-year-old political science professor at the Worthington campus of Pennsylvania State University and still a Naval Reserve officer, won his race in a heavily Republican district in northeastern Pennsylvania by defeating the Republican incumbent, Don Sherwood, who had been weakened by accusations that he had abused his former mistress.

Mr. Carney's victory was one of the building blocks in the Democratic takeover of the House, and as it happens, the Democrats will soon be considering whether to use their new power to further investigate the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence. If they do, they will not have far to look for an eyewitness account.

In the summer and fall of 2002, Mr. Carney was at the center of the storm, briefing George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, and Stephen J. Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser, on the Feith unit's assessment of any links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. At the time, the unit was creating controversy within the government for arguing that there was significant evidence of ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Ultimately, the Bush administration emphasized the threat the United States supposedly faced from Iraq's unconventional weapons as the primary justification for invading, while the Iraq-Qaeda connection gradually faded as a major talking point. In 2004, the independent Sept. 11 commission said it had seen "no evidence" that the contacts "ever developed into a collaborative operational relationship," challenging the administration's prewar assertions.

Today, Mr. Carney says he still believes there were links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, although he is careful not to overstate them.

"On a scale of 0 to 10, where 0 was no connection and 10 was operational control, I would say it's about a 2½," he said in an interview. "It was a relationship of keeping your friends close and your enemies closer," he added. "Saddam was a savvy guy, and I think he wanted to make sure that if Al Qaeda someday became a force, that he wanted to keep his options open. I thought that there was a relationship. Whether it was strong enough to go to war, that's the president's decision."

Mr. Carney said he was far more troubled by the way the Bush administration dealt with Iraq after the invasion, when he said it became clear that the United States was not prepared to deal with the growing chaos in the country. Mr. Carney recalled that there was a wealth of prewar intelligence predicting that an insurgency would develop quickly after the invasion, and he said he was stunned by the Pentagon's failure to plan for it or even acknowledge its scope.

"There was a lot of intelligence prewar," Mr. Carney said, "saying that Saddam wasn't going to fight force-on-force, like in the gulf war; it would be an insurgency." Referring to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, he added: "It bothered me when the secretary started calling the insurgency a bunch of dead-enders. The intel certainly didn't depict them as dead-enders."

He said of Pentagon officials: "They were saying that the looting was just the way the Iraqis behaved. It showed that we didn't seem to get it."

"I think they still thought they were fighting Desert Storm," he added. "That's the war they thought they had, and that's how they managed it."

After returning home to Pennsylvania in 2004 after his stint at the Pentagon, Mr. Carney began to gear up for what seemed to be a long-shot bid for Congress.

He said Iraq was a factor in his decision to run but not the overriding one. "It was one straw among many," he said. "It was the politics of division, and the way Congress eschewed its role of oversight and accountability. We didn't have any checks on the administration. I think that was the bottom line for me."

DOJ_NMG_0098982

Mr. Carney describes himself as "probably to the right" of most House Democrats on Iraq and opposes calls for an immediate withdrawal of American troops. Instead, during his campaign he proposed that for every new Iraqi battalion trained, one United States battalion should be brought home. He said the United States had to leave Iraq "at some point," but added, "We can't leave behind a mess; we have to focus on training Iraqi forces, who can then train other Iraqis."

But while Mr. Carney talked about Iraq during the campaign, it was Mr. Sherwood's missteps, mainly the abuse accusations made by his former mistress, that made the race competitive.

"I think Iraq was an issue everywhere this year, but the central issue in this race was the personal-values thing with Sherwood," said Ed Mitchell, a Democratic political media strategist in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Mr. Mitchell, who did not work for the Carney campaign, said Mr. Sherwood was "playing defense" for much of the campaign, making it hard for him to gain traction with any attacks on Mr. Carney.

"Chris pivoted off his military background to talk about honor and character," Mr. Mitchell added, "which was a nice way of presenting the contrast between him and Sherwood, without him attacking Sherwood for his indiscretions."

Republicans made a last-ditch effort to tar Mr. Carney on Iraq, sending out fliers late in the campaign criticizing him for his involvement in prewar intelligence, but they seemed to have little effect on the race. "They were playing catch-up ball from day one," Mr. Mitchell said of the Sherwood campaign.

Mr. Carney's campaign certainly caught the attention of some major players in the Bush administration's decision to go to war. Richard Perle, the former senior adviser to Mr. Rumsfeld who was an influential advocate of war with Iraq but has more recently criticized the administration's conduct of the war, was the host of a fund-raiser for Mr. Carney.

Immediately after Mr. Carney's election, Mr. Feith called to congratulate him. "He's a talented, intelligent person," Mr. Feith said. "Some of my best friends are Democrats."

Today, Mr. Carney is one of at least four newly elected Democratic members of the House with recent military credentials, a fact that was emphasized during the campaign by the Democratic Party leadership. Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois, who ran the party's Congressional campaign nationwide, said he thought Mr. Carney and the others would have a significant impact on the debate over Iraq in the new Congress.

"They are going to affect the debate on what you do for the troops, for veterans, and on what questions get asked," Mr. Emanuel said.

But Mr. Carney is not enthusiastic about the possibility of a new Congressional investigation of prewar intelligence, which he said would be a major distraction. For Mr. Carney, there is an element of been there, done that to looking back at the now-familiar cast of prewar characters, including Mr. Feith; Mr. Tenet; Paul D. Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary; and Ahmad Chalabi, the Iraqi opposition leader who was a prewar favorite of many in the Defense Department to take the reins of a future Iraqi government.

"Let's win the war first, then maybe look at how we got into it," Mr. Carney said. "The more energy spent on answering Congressional investigations, the less time will be spent on winning the war."

The Cowards Turned Out To Be Right (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

For several years, the White House and its Dobermans helpfully pointed out the real enemy in Iraq: those lazy, wimpish foreign correspondents who were so foolish and unpatriotic that they reported that we faced grave difficulties in Iraq.

To Paul Wolfowitz, the essential problem was that journalists were cowards. "Part of our problem is a lot of the press are afraid to travel very much, so they sit in Baghdad and they publish rumors," Mr. Wolfowitz said in 2004. He later added, "The story isn't being described accurately."

Don Rumsfeld agreed but suggested that the problem was treason: "Interestingly, all of the exaggerations seem to be on one side. It isn't as though there simply have been a series of random errors on both sides of issues. On the contrary, the steady stream of errors all seem to be of a nature to inflame the situation and to give heart to the terrorists and to discourage those who hope for success in Iraq."

As for Dick Cheney, he saw the flaw in journalists as indolence. "The press is, with all due respect — there are exceptions — oftentimes lazy, often simply reports what someone else in the press says without doing their homework."

Mr. Cheney and the others might have better spent their time reading the coverage of Iraq rather than insulting it, because in retrospect those brave reporters based in Baghdad got the downward spiral right.

"Many correspondents feel a sense of vindication that the administration finally accepts what we were screaming two years ago," notes Farnaz Fassihi, who provided excellent Iraq coverage for The Wall Street Journal. Now Ms. Fassihi wonders how long it will take for the administration to acknowledge the reality of 2006 that Iraq correspondents are writing about: the incipient civil war.

Dexter Filkins, who covered Iraq brilliantly for this newspaper until his departure this summer to take up a fellowship at Harvard, says he was constantly accused of reporting only the bad news, of being unpatriotic, and of getting Americans killed.

"I don't think it ever affected our reporting," he said. "But I did find it demoralizing, the idea that the truth — the reality on the ground that we were seeing every day — did not matter, that these overfed people sitting in TV studios and in their living rooms could just turn up the volume on what they wanted to be happening in Iraq and that that could overwhelm the reality."

Mr. Filkins added: "I have almost been killed in Iraq 20 or 30 times — really almost killed. "I've lost count. Do these people really believe that we were all risking our lives for some political agenda?"

Richard Engel of NBC says he was taken aback when pundits accused him of standing on a balcony in the Green Zone and simply feeding the world bad news. "Like most journalists in Iraq, I have never lived in the Green Zone," he notes, adding: "To imply from afar we were just lazy was missing the point, and also dangerous. I know several reporters who were so incensed by similar criticism, they took extra risks."

While it's the right that led those toxic attacks, the left is also vulnerable to letting ideology trump empiricism. Mr. Filkins notes that while he used to get nasty letters and e-mail primarily from conservatives, much of the fire more recently has come from liberals accusing him of covering up atrocities — all of it from people whose ideological certitude is proportional to their distance from Baghdad.

As we try to extricate ourselves from Iraq, a basic lesson for the administration is that it should deal with bad news in ways more creative than clobbering the messenger. From the beginning of the war, the Pentagon has had an incredibly sophisticated news operation (now including its own news channel, carried on some cable networks), but it has often seemed more concerned with disseminating propaganda than with gathering facts.

Take the Defense Department's Early Bird news clipping service, which traditionally had been a dispassionate collection of outside articles to keep senior military officers informed. Lately it has been leading with in-house spin. The Early Bird of Nov. 20, for example, began with three separate unpublished letters to the editor by Pentagon officials before getting to the news from around the world.

So how about if the administration devotes itself less to managing the news and more to trying to manage Iraq?

The Wars Of Perception (NYT)

By Dominic Johnson And Dominic Tierney

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

IN January 1968, Americans turned on their televisions to find scenes of chaos and carnage as Vietnamese communists unleashed their surprise Tet offensive. It would go down in history as the greatest American battlefield defeat of the cold war.

Twenty-five years later, in December 1992, the United States began a humanitarian intervention in Somalia that would be viewed as the most striking failure of the post-cold-war era. Then, in March 2003, American tanks charged across the dunes into Iraq, beginning, in the eyes of many Americans, the worst foreign policy debacle of the post-9/11 world. Tet, Somalia and Iraq: the three great post-World War II American defeats.

Except that, remarkably, Tet and Somalia were not defeats. They were successes perceived as failures. Such stark divergence between perception and reality is common in wartime, when people's beliefs about which side wins and which loses are often driven by psychological factors that have nothing to do with events on the battlefield. Tet and Somalia may, therefore, hold important lessons for Iraq.

The Tet offensive was an unmitigated disaster for the communists. Despite the advantages of surprise, the South Vietnamese insurgents, the Vietcong, failed to hold on to a single target in South Vietnam and suffered staggering losses. Of the 80,000 attackers, as many as half were killed in the first month alone, and the Vietcong never recovered. The United States had clearly won this round of the war.

Yet most Americans saw the Tet offensive as a failure for the United States. Approval of President Lyndon B. Johnson's handling of the war slipped to a low of 26 percent. Before Tet, 58 percent of Americans described themselves as "hawks" who wanted to step up American military involvement in the war, while 26 percent described themselves as "doves" seeking to reduce it. Two months after Tet, doves narrowly outnumbered hawks.

How did perceptions become so detached from reality? A key factor was overblown expectations. In the months before Tet, Johnson had begun a "progress campaign" to convince Americans that victory in Vietnam was just around the corner. Reams of statistics showed that infiltration rates were down and enemy casualties were up. And it worked. Public confidence ticked upwards. But after Johnson's bullish rhetoric, Tet looked like a disaster. The scale and surprise of the offensive sent a shock wave through the American psyche. As Johnson's former aide, Robert Koner, later recalled, "Boom, 40 towns get attacked, and they didn't believe us anymore."

The illusion of defeat was heightened by two powerful symbolic events. First, the communists attacked the American Embassy in Saigon. It was one of the smallest-scale actions of the Tet offensive, but it captured America's attention. The attackers had breached the pre-eminent symbol of the United States presence in South Vietnam: if the embassy wasn't safe, nowhere was. News outlets reported that the embassy had been captured when in reality all of the attackers were soon lying dead in the courtyard.

Gen. William Westmoreland, the commander of the American forces in Vietnam, held a press conference at the embassy to announce that Tet was an American victory. But behind the general, dead Vietcong were still being dragged away from the blood-spattered lawn. Reporters could scarcely believe what they were hearing. Said one: "Westmoreland was standing in the ruins and saying everything was great."

Second, Eddie Adams's photograph of South Vietnam's police chief executing a Vietcong captive in the street caused a sensation. After he fired the shot, the police chief told nearby reporters: "They killed many Americans and many of my men. Buddha will understand. Do you?" Back home in the United States, the image spoke powerfully of a brutal and unjust war. For some Americans, this image was the Tet offensive.

Finally, the American news media painted a picture of disaster in Vietnam. Even though communist forces incurred enormous losses, reporters often lauded their performance. As the Times war correspondent Peter Braestrup put it, "To have portrayed such a setback for one side as a defeat for the other — in a major crisis abroad — cannot be counted as a triumph for American journalism."

A similar story later unfolded in Somalia. From 1992 to 1994, the American humanitarian intervention in Somalia saved the lives of more than 100,000 Somalis and cut the number of refugees in half, for the loss of 43 Americans. Back in the United States, however, this noble mission was widely viewed as the greatest foreign policy disaster since Vietnam. By October 1993, approval for President Bill Clinton's handling of Somalia fell to 30 percent. Only 25 percent of Americans viewed the intervention as a success, and 66 percent saw it as a failure.

Like Tet, the mission in Somalia suffered from overblown expectations. Intervening in an anarchical, war-ridden country was bound to be difficult. But early efforts to provide food and security in Somalia went so well that the project looked deceptively easy. The American public and news media lost interest — until early October 1993, when American soldiers were killed in the infamous "Black Hawk Down" battle in Mogadishu.

With echoes of Saigon in 1968, powerful images of the Mogadishu battle pushed Americans towards a perception of defeat. Press coverage was dominated by pictures of the captured pilot, Michael Durant, and mutilated American corpses, often with the tagline of America's "humiliation." Journalists tended to ignore the bigger picture, in this case large pro-American demonstrations in Somalia and successful efforts to save lives and restore order outside of the capital.

Memories of Vietnam, and fears of getting bogged down in another messy quagmire, also promoted perceptions of failure. In October 1993, 62 percent of Americans thought that the intervention in Somalia "could turn into another Vietnam," even after Mr. Clinton announced that America was pulling soldiers out of Somalia, and at a time when American casualties were a thousand times lower than in Vietnam.

What does this mean for Iraq? At the least, Tet and Somalia suggest we should be very careful before concluding that Iraq is a defeat. There is real evidence of failure, especially the escalating sectarian violence. But our perceptions are nevertheless easily manipulated. Iraq looks like a defeat in part because the Bush administration fell into the same trap as President Johnson: raising expectations of imminent victory by declaring "mission accomplished" before the real work had even begun. And as with Somalia, fighting shadowy insurgents in Iraq while propping up a weak government engenders negative memories of Vietnam.

Perceptions of success and failure can change the course of history. Reeling from the supposed disaster at Tet, the United States began to withdraw. Memories of "failure" in Somalia were a major reason — perhaps the major reason — that the United States did nothing to stop the genocide in Rwanda in 1994. If Iraq is perceived as a failure, it is only a matter of time before America pulls out, leaving who-knows-what behind. With the stakes so high, Americans must be certain that their perception of failure in Iraq is not a mirage.

Wheat Monopoly Cited In Iraq Oil-for-food Scandal (WT/AP)

By Rod Mcguirk

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- Top officials from Australia's monopoly wheat exporter deceived the United Nations and likely broke Australian law by paying more than $200 million to Saddam Hussein's regime under the Iraq oil-for-food program, an inquiry reported yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0098985

Former Judge Terence Cole said he found no evidence of wrongdoing by government officials in his months-long investigation into kickbacks, but recommended police investigate 11 executives from the wheat exporter and a 12th from another company.

Prime Minister John Howard said the inquiry's key recommendations would be acted upon immediately. The Howard government instituted the inquiry after AWB -- formerly the state-owned Australian Wheat Board -- was named as the largest single payer of kickbacks in the corruption-ridden U.N. program.

Mr. Howard said a police task force would be set up to investigate AWB executives mentioned by Judge Cole, who identified possible crimes but did not have the power to file charges.

Mr. Howard also said the government would review the system granting AWB a monopoly over Australia's wheat exports. The system has been criticized as unfairly protective by Australia's competitors on world grain markets.

Mr. Howard said the report vindicated him, Foreign Minister Alexander Downer and former Trade Minister Mark Vaile, who claimed to have had no knowledge of the kickbacks.

In his five-volume, 2,000-page report, Judge Cole said he found no evidence of illegal activity by the government.

"The government has hidden nothing," Mr. Howard told a press conference after the report was released. "The commissioner has found in the most emphatic terms imaginable that there is no evidence of wrongdoing" by the government.

The inquiry's government-given mandate was to examine company executives -- not government officials. Mr. Howard denied the investigative powers were set deliberately narrow to ensure the government was not implicated in the scandal.

The report said 11 AWB officers may have breached Australian corporate and criminal law. Among them was AWB's former chairman, Trevor Flugge, who became widely known after a photograph became public of him, shirtless, brandishing a revolver during a trip to Iraq in 2003.

At the inquiry, Mr. Flugge said he was unaware the payments were in breach of U.N. sanctions. Brendan Stewart, AWB's chairman, said his board "deeply regrets" the way in which the wheat trade with Iraq was conducted.

From 1999 to 2003, AWB executives purportedly authorized $222 million in bogus transport fees to a Jordanian trucking company, Alia Transport, that was partly owned by Saddam's government. Payments to Saddam were illegal under U.N. sanctions.

AWB purportedly inflated the cost of wheat it was charging to the oil-for-food program by as much as $50 per ton to cover the bogus transport fees, which the Iraqi Grain Board demanded as a condition for lucrative grain contracts.

Judge Cole also found that the U.N. knew Iraq was breaching sanctions, but took no steps to stop the practice.

Australian Panel Says Firm Paid Bribes To Hussein (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia, Nov. 27 — A high-level commission investigating corruption in the United Nations oil-for-food program released a long-awaited report on Monday stating unequivocally that a major Australian wheat company paid more than $224 million in kickbacks and bribes to Saddam Hussein's government.

The commission also found that the company, ABW Ltd., had "deliberately and dishonestly" devised a scheme for the payments — from 1999 until the overthrow of Mr. Hussein in 2003 — that would deceive the United Nations. When the United Nations conducted its investigation in 2005, headed by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, AWB withheld thousands of pages of documents and its lawyers made statements to Mr. Volcker that were patently false, the commission found.

The Australian commission's report was the most thorough — and damning — investigation of corruption in the United Nation's oil-for-food program. It is certain to have repercussions for politicians in Canberra as well as in Washington, where incoming Democratic lawmakers have pledged to hold their own hearings.

The program was set up to alleviate the hardships of the Iraqi people while isolating Saddam Hussein's government. Its aim was to allow Iraq to trade some oil for food and other necessities under close United Nations supervision while the country remained under international sanctions.

Instead, the report found that both AWB and the Iraqi government used the program for profit.

In Canberra, the government of Prime Minister John Howard claimed vindication because the commission declared that it found no evidence that any government officials had knowledge of AWB's kickback scheme.

But the commission's chairman, Terence Cole, a retired state supreme court justice, left open the question of whether Australian officials could, or should, have known about the scheme — all AWB contracts were submitted to the government for approval — if they had conducted their own investigation. His mandate from the government for the inquiry did not include that question, he said.

The opposition leader, Kim Beazley, said that even if the government was not criminally culpable, it was at least negligent and incompetent for not knowing about the kickbacks.

The scheme AWB and the Iraq government set up for making the kickbacks involved using a Jordanian trucking company, Alia, which was a front for the Iraqi government, the report concluded.

At first, AWB paid Alia $12 for each ton of wheat it sold to the Iraqi government, money that went into the pockets of Iraqi officials. Later, the amount was increased by Iraqi government to $55 a ton, which included a "service fee." The money was supposedly for moving the wheat inland from the Iraqi port. But Alia had no trucks in Iraq.

AWB then passed on the cost of the bribes to the United Nations by recovering the inflated payments from the oil-for-food program's escrow account.

The commission's report — 2,065 pages in five volumes, costing more than $7 million and taking nearly a year to compile — was based on the testimony it took from some 70 AWB and Australian government officials during 75 days of public hearings. It also examined more than 1,500 internal company and government documents. (The report can be found at www.oilforfoodinquiry.gov.au).

When investigated by the Volcker commission, which found that AWB was the largest payer of kickbacks to Iraq under the oil for food program, lawyers said that the company had been deceived by Iraq and Alia, and that it did not know Alia was a front for the Iraqi government and had never paid a service fee.

And AWB lawyers repeatedly denied they had any knowledge that the payments they were making through Alia were in fact going to the Iraqi government.

"Neither statement was true," Mr. Cole concluded, rejecting the claims almost in totality.

"The facts are not now in doubt," he said.

Mr. Cole was blistering in his criticism of AWB, which has enjoyed a monopoly on wheat exports. The illegal payment scheme grew out of a "lack of culture of ethical dealing" at AWB, he said. He was also noticeably critical of AWB's lawyers for advising the company on how to hide the payments, and for lying to the Volcker committee.

The commission recommended that criminal prosecutions be considered against 11 AWB officials, including the general counsel, and against a former officer of BHP Billiton, one of the world's largest mining companies, who, Mr. Cole said, may have "conspired with or aided and abetted AWB" in transferring $8 million to the Iraqi regime as a part of debt supposedly owed to BHP.

BHP issued a statement on Monday saying that it had received the Cole Commission report and would have no further comment until it had reviewed it and completed its own internal investigation.

The current chairman of AWB, Brendan Stewart, who replaced one of the men who now faces criminal charges, said the company "deeply regrets" the manner in which the trade with Iraq was conducted. He said the company would issue a fuller statement in the next few days.

In Washington, Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, who is slated to become chairman of the House Agricultural Committee in January, has indicated he will hold hearings on the matter.

"The exact form and details of the inquiry have yet to be decided, although the report issued by the Cole Commission should be quite helpful to our efforts," Mr. Harkin said in a statement on Monday.

During the commission's hearing here, documents were introduced showing that in 2003, when the allegations of AWB's bribes began to seep out, the Australian ambassador in Washington, Michael Thawley, lobbied senior Bush administration officials on AWB's behalf. It is not clear what they did, if anything.

The ambassador also lobbied Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, who had been a loud critic of corruption in the oil-for-food program, but called off an investigation after being assured by Mr. Thawley that AWB had done nothing illegal. Mr. Coleman later said he had been misled by the ambassador. Senator Coleman said Monday that he would "review the Cole report with a fine-tooth comb to determine whether U.S. interests were hurt by AWB's gross misconduct." A major concern, he said, "is whether Australian officials were less than honest in their dealings with the subcommittee."

Mr. Thawley has said that the representations he made to Mr. Coleman were based on assurances from AWB that it had not made any illegal payments.

The U.S. Wheat Associates, a trade group, could also claim vindication. In June, 2003, it had written a letter to Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, suggesting that AWB was inflating its wheat contracts and that some of the excess had gone to the Iraqi regime.

The Australian government called the allegations "slanderous and outrageous" at the time and said they were part of an "insidious campaign" by AWB's chief competitor in the Iraqi wheat market.

Australia Cleared In Kickback Probe (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0098987

By Barbara Adam And Ray Brindal

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- A yearlong inquiry into $221.7 million in kickbacks paid to Saddam Hussein's former regime in Iraq cleared the Australian government of any wrongdoing, but the findings could increase pressure on the government to dismantle the country's powerful wheat-export monopoly.

U.S. and European growers have long tried to persuade Australia to end its wheat-marketing system, whereby growers sell their export wheat through a "single desk" managed by listed AWB Ltd., which then handles sales to foreign buyers. U.S. and European growers contend the monopoly distorts the world market by giving Australian farmers more clout overseas than they would have if they sold their wheat individually.

Australia is one of the world's most important wheat producers and recently ranked second among exporters behind the U.S.

AWB has survived many attacks in the past. But more recently it has come under renewed fire amid revelations that it paid illegal kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's government to secure wheat contracts as part of the scandal-plagued United Nations oil-for-food program. Australia was the dominant wheat supplier to Iraq beginning in the mid-1990s. By 1999, sales to Iraq accounted for 10% of Australia's annual wheat exports. In the past year, however, the U.S. has muscled AWB out of the Iraq wheat market, and the American wheat lobby has agitated for an inquiry into AWB's activities in Iraq.

Retired Australian Judge Terence Cole found AWB may have broken several Australian laws, including criminal and banking codes, by making payments to the Iraqi regime between 1999 and 2003 in breach of U.N. sanctions.

In a report to the Australian government yesterday, Mr. Cole named 11 former AWB executives, including a former BHP Billiton PLC executive, as possibly acting illegally.

In a statement to the stock exchange, AWB Chairman Brendan Stewart expressed "deep regret" about the way the company, based in Melbourne, conducted the wheat trade with Iraq under the oil-for-food program. He said AWB won't respond to allegations made against its former employees but added that it will hold a briefing tomorrow after reviewing the report.

BHP Billiton Chief Executive Chip Goodyear said he wouldn't be able to respond to the Cole report until it had been thoroughly reviewed.

The government pledged to introduce legislation in Parliament within two weeks to facilitate Mr. Cole's recommendation of a police task force to consider criminal prosecutions against AWB and those named in the report.

Two U.S. senators pledged yesterday to investigate the Australian wheat monopoly in light of the report. Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, probable chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee after the next Congress convenes in January, said the AWB report would be helpful for his panel's inquiry. Sen. Norm Coleman, while praising the Australian probe, said its findings raise worries about whether actions by the exporter harmed U.S. farmers. The Minnesota Republican, who heads the Senate's Homeland Security and Government Affairs investigative subcommittee until January, said he would examine whether AWB officials lied in testimony to the subcommittee.

Prime Minister John Howard, who appeared before the Cole inquiry in April to give sworn evidence about what he knew, said the government is reviewing Australia's wheat-marketing arrangements; the role of AWB in the nation's wheat trade, valued at as much as five billion Australian dollars, or about US$4 billion, a year; and the duties of AWB's regulator, the Wheat Export Authority.

Many analysts believe the Cole report's findings will make it difficult for Australia to avoid some kind of overhaul of AWB.

Some agricultural-industry groups in Australia still back a wheat-export monopoly so growers don't compete against each other on world markets, driving returns down. But they don't necessarily support AWB's operation of the monopoly. Meanwhile, a sizable minority of growers now supports freeing wheat exports.

The main national growers' lobby, the Grains Council of Australia, said the findings of the Cole inquiry will undermine growers' confidence in AWB.

The Australian government set up the Cole inquiry a year ago, after a U.N.-commissioned probe by Paul Volcker, former chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve, found AWB paid kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's regime through the oil-for-food program. That program allowed Iraq to sell oil in exchange for humanitarian goods, using the U.N. as an intermediary. Mr. Volcker found AWB was one of about 2,200 companies and individuals from 66 countries that paid a total of US$1.8 billion in illegal kickbacks to Iraq.

A report commissioned by AWB said changes to monopoly arrangements are probably warranted but must be done slowly, and not before 2010.

AWB's stock price has dropped more than half since the inquiry's public hearings began in January.

The Cole report found Mr. Howard, Deputy Prime Minister Mark Vaile and Foreign Affairs Minister Alexander Downer were never told of AWB's irregular payments in Iraq.

Shooting The Messenger (WP)

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

IN THE MESS that is Iraq, there's one entity that has done an unquestionably good job: the special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction. Under the leadership of Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general's office has found that the Coalition Provisional Authority could not account for almost $9 billion distributed to Iraqi ministries. Mr. Bowen's office determined that the U.S. government lost track of thousands of pistols and hundreds of assault rifles given to Iraqi security forces. It found that Halliburton Co. wasted $75 million on a failed pipeline project and that Parsons Corp. bungled construction of a $75 million police academy in Baghdad so badly that human waste dripped from the ceilings. Its audits have saved the government more than $400 million.

Now there's a move to close down Mr. Bowen's shop. More than a move, actually: A mischievous provision, slipped into the defense authorization bill by House Republicans without the knowledge of key senators, set an October 2007 termination date for the office. The bill was signed into law last month, but a number of senators, including Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee; Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's ranking minority member; and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), are trying to reverse this foolish plan during the lame-duck session.

Unfortunately, a promising legislative vehicle for their attempt, a military construction spending bill, is snarled in a separate dispute about earmarks. The Senate is poised to approve a stand-alone fix, but House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who was responsible for the early termination, is said to be resisting a fix. The rationale is that the need for the inspector general's services is diminishing along with U.S. reconstruction funds and that remaining work can be picked up by State and Defense Department inspectors general. But that ignores an additional $3.6 billion provided for reconstruction efforts in the latest defense bill and the expertise that Mr. Bowen's shop has demonstrated in doing this difficult work. When it returns next week, the Senate should pass the measure extending Mr. Bowen's tenure, and the House should go along.

Bush Visits Baltic Ally Ahead Of Talks On Afghanistan, Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia — President Bush arrived here Monday to promote freedom and democracy, using this small Baltic nation, a former republic of the Soviet Union, as a model.

Bush came to the seaport of Tallinn in advance of this week's NATO summit on Afghanistan and meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan.

Estonia and Latvia — site of the two-day summit — are U.S. allies in the war on terrorism. In a 2005 speech, Bush hailed Estonia and its neighbors Latvia and Lithuania for “one of the most dramatic” political transformations that proved “the love of liberty is stronger than the will of an empire.”

Charles Kupchan, an international relations professor at Georgetown University, said Bush's freedom agenda has been challenged by the rising violence in Iraq and Afghanistan.

“It's grown increasingly difficult for Bush to talk the talk of democratization as Iraq and Afghanistan spiral downward,” Kupchan said.

Bush's first trip to Estonia, however, provides a different backdrop for the debate. Since the Soviet occupation here ended 15 years ago, “we have seen Estonia consolidate its sovereignty and build a thriving free-market democracy,” said Judy Ansley, a senior director for the National Security Council.

In Tallinn's Old Town, where serpentine cobblestone streets and stone towers date to the 13th century, many residents said they were pleased about the first visit to Estonia by a U.S. president. In Town Hall Square, Estonians sold ceramics and clothing as a sound system blared White Christmas and an Estonian rendition of Here Comes Santa Claus. Several residents, however, said they are worried about conditions in Iraq.

“I'm not for the war, so I am not for Bush,” said Anna Dytyna, 22, who sells home furnishings not far from the central Town Hall Square.

Natalja Ikonnikova, 44, questioned whether the United States or another country could force democracy on Iraq or Afghanistan. “They must decide what to do in their country,” she said.

Evi Tigane, 74, said Bush's visit to her hometown is strictly about politics. As for Iraq, she said: “This is (about) oil.”

Bush's hopes for democracy in Iraq and Afghanistan have been threatened by ongoing insurgencies in both countries, which will be major topics of his week-long, three-country trip.

DOJ_NMG_0098989

"Things are not proceeding well or fast enough," said national security adviser Stephen Hadley, declining to characterize the violence in Iraq as a civil war.

"We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase," he said.

Bush plans to spend half a day today in Tallinn, meeting with the president and prime minister as well as local democratic activists. Bush and Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves have scheduled a brief news conference.

Bush then heads to Latvia's capital, Riga, site of the NATO summit. The meeting will be dominated by the situation in Afghanistan, where 32,000 NATO troops are battling a resurgent Taliban. A U.S.-led invasion in 2001 deposed the Taliban for harboring planners of the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

The trip ends Thursday in Jordan, where Bush will huddle with al-Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II. Hadley said Bush wants to hear from al-Maliki about his strategy for moving forward.

Hadley said Bush is open to all ideas, including recommendations coming soon from a special commission on Iraq headed by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton.

NATO Chiefs Focus On Afghanistan (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

RIGA, Latvia -- One issue will dominate this week's NATO summit: Afghanistan.

The 26 presidents and prime ministers know that the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is playing out in the deserts of Kandahar and mountains of Uruzgan rather than in their conference hall on the Baltic Sea.

The rise in Taliban violence since NATO's 32,800-strong force moved into those southern provinces and the resultant casualties among civilians and Western soldiers has called into question the strategy behind NATO's "stabilization" force in Afghanistan.

Before traveling to Europe for the summit, U.S. President George W. Bush spoke on the phone with his Afghan counterpart. "President Bush assured President Hamid Karzai that the United States of America will reiterate its commitment at the NATO summit to the strengthening of security and reconstruction in Afghanistan," said a statement from Mr. Karzai's office in Kabul.

The dangers to the NATO force were underscored by attacks that ended a period of relative calm. Two Canadian soldiers serving with the NATO force were reported slain by a suicide car bomber yesterday. A day earlier, a suicide bomber killed 15 Afghans in a restaurant.

The summit today and tomorrow in Latvia's capital, Riga, will be Mr. Bush's first meeting with European allies since he was chastened by Democrats' success in the midterm elections and bid farewell to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Bush To Pursue Fresh NATO Commitments (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia, Nov. 27 -- President Bush will seek fresh troops and equipment for the fight in Afghanistan, and fewer restrictions on how they can be used, when he sits down this week with NATO allies to review the state of the dangerous mission there, according to senior U.S. officials.

Bush flew Monday to this scenic capital, on his way to a summit of NATO's leaders in Riga, Latvia, that begins Tuesday. There, U.S. officials say, they are hoping allies will renew their commitments in Afghanistan, where a stepped-up Taliban insurgency is posing stiff new challenges for some 33,000 NATO troops, about a third of them American.

The mission is shaping up as the major issue for discussion among Bush and the leaders of the 25 other NATO member countries, who are gathering for the first time in two years. A failed operation in Afghanistan would threaten NATO's ambition to one day play a more robust role in helping address the world's crises.

Briefing reporters on Air Force One on the way to Estonia, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley cited "an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail."

Some key NATO countries, including Germany, France, Italy and Spain, have placed sharp limits on how their troops can be used, to the growing consternation of the United States and other countries whose forces are involved in fierce battles with the Taliban in southern parts of Afghanistan. Only the United States, Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have combat troops in the south.

Meanwhile, calls for more troops from NATO commanders have faced resistance from member countries, some of which have seen public support for the mission wane as casualties have increased. On Monday, a suicide bomber attacked a Canadian armored vehicle in the south, killing two soldiers and bringing to 44 the number of Canadian troops killed in the country.

"Events in Afghanistan are reaching a critical juncture, and European politics and perceptions, as well as U.S. commitments in Iraq, may prevent NATO from getting the assets necessary to ensure victory," said retired Gen. Joseph W. Ralston, the former U.S. supreme allied commander in Europe, at a briefing held by the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

U.S. officials say they hope the summit will help focus attention on the needs of the mission in Afghanistan, which they say include not only greater military assistance but also economic and political reconstruction efforts.

NATO military spokesmen in Kabul said they will seek to review the issue of troop restrictions, or "caveats," in the hopes that some personnel already stationed in Afghanistan might take on broader roles or be able to shift from one sector to another if needed. "If the caveats can be reduced, that is essentially the same as adding new troops, because it frees up troops that are here," said Maj. Luke Knittig, chief NATO spokesman in the Afghan capital.

Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state in charge of European and Eurasian affairs, told reporters of the "hard price" being paid by Canada as he sought to explain the need for more flexibility for NATO commanders.

"A country like Canada, and the Netherlands, has every right to expect that their allies are at their back, which means if they get into trouble, they can count on support from all of NATO," Fried said last week.

Privately, U.S. officials are playing down the prospects of any breakthrough this week. In Germany, where public opinion seems strong against lifting restrictions that keep troops in the safer northern areas, Chancellor Angela Merkel last week reiterated her determination to keep them from moving south. U.S. officials remained hopeful, however, that Merkel could continue to frame the debate to allow for some loosening of restrictions in the future.

The United States provides the largest number of NATO troops, with 11,800. Second is Britain, with 6,000; third is Germany, with 2,700; then Canada, with 2,500; followed by the Netherlands, Italy, France, Romania, Spain and Turkey. The United States also has several thousand troops who operate in Afghanistan outside the NATO umbrella.

In 2002 and 2003, NATO troops were confined to Kabul as the International Security Assistance Force. Over the past three years, the mission has been gradually extended to the entire country, with NATO troops moving into the east just last month.

In the past six months, NATO and U.S. troops have faced an unexpectedly aggressive insurgency by the revived Taliban militia. Officials report that attacks have increased fourfold since a year ago, reaching 600 a month, and that between 3,700 and 4,000 people have died in insurgent-related violence this year. The insurgents have also begun using suicide bombs, a new phenomenon for Afghanistan.

NATO commanders in Afghanistan have repeatedly asked for more troops and equipment. So far, only Poland has responded, pledging to send 1,000 troops in the new year.

The central message NATO commanders hope to deliver in Riga is "to put more in focus why we are here in Afghanistan," said Knittig, noting the country's importance in the wars against terrorism and drugs, and in the future security of NATO states. "We need to punch that message through."

Some European diplomats in Kabul expressed disappointment with the reluctance of NATO countries to send more troops and equipment.

"Some countries in Europe need to be reminded that Afghanistan is not just a faraway place we know little about," said Francesc Vendrell, the senior European Union representative in Kabul. "It is a country that is central to the security interests of the West. If Afghanistan were to collapse or the Taliban were to take over, the leaders would probably form close relations with al-Qaeda."

Ronald D. Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Transatlantic Center in Brussels, said there is a gap between NATO's expressed desire to play a more active role in addressing world crises and its members' will to do so. "In the Cold War, no one would have dared to put a caveat on how their forces are used at the front lines," he said. "People don't really believe in their hearts that they need to take the big risks to succeed."

But U.S. officials said the mission in Afghanistan is succeeding. "When you take a look at it, obviously NATO was challenged by the Taliban when they moved into the south," said Judy Ansley, the senior director for European affairs on the National Security Council staff. "But NATO has responded very strongly. They've stood and they've fought, and have been very successful against the Taliban. So I don't see Afghanistan as being a mission in trouble or someplace where we have a problem."

A NATO Bid To Regain Afghans' Trust (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098991

PANJWAI, Afghanistan -- The road to this southern Afghan farming town is wide, smooth and utterly empty, except for an occasional old man on a bicycle or a meandering herd of baby camels.

It was paved last year with Japanese funds to help farmers send their grapes to market and patients reach hospitals in the city of Kandahar, 20 miles to the east. But that was before war came to Panjwai, making its name synonymous with the physical destruction and political mayhem wrought by months of Taliban attacks and NATO bombing.

Now almost no one dares to drive on the road. NATO forces declared victory here in late September, claiming to have killed about 1,500 insurgents in a campaign named Operation Medusa. Yet Taliban fighters still linger in the surrounding orchards and launch sporadic attacks. On Monday, insurgents fired at several NATO bases in the district, although no one was injured.

Many shops in Panjwai remain shuttered, and most of the estimated 80,000 people who fled nearby villages have not returned. Some harbor bitter memories of NATO bombings that destroyed their homes and fruit crops. At least 50 civilians were killed over several weeks of bombing, and President Hamid Karzai last month ordered an investigation into the deaths. NATO officials have said the insurgents used villagers' homes as shelter, provoking the deadly airstrikes.

"I lost three of my sons, my brother, my wife, two daughters-in-law and many grandchildren," said Abdullah Shah, a white-haired farmer, wiping his eyes with a dirty shawl. "I moved the whole family into a tent for safety when the fighting started. The international forces said there were 20 Taliban in that tent, but it was not true. How could there be, when we were so crowded already?"

In an effort to regain public trust, NATO forces have moved into Panjwai with bricks, bulldozers and lots of cash. Local men have been hired to repair damaged buildings, the renovated high school reopened last week, and a new road is being laid from the town to several grape-growing villages that suffered the heaviest bombing damage.

NATO has pledged $8 million to improve Panjwai and the adjacent Zhari district, in hopes of creating a Taliban-proof development zone and a model for other post-conflict areas. Canadian troops have set up a base above the town and patrol the bazaar in armored convoys, while NATO officers meet often with local elders.

"Panjwai is a microcosm. The key is to move fast once the fighting stops, work with local institutions, get development projects going and get local people involved in their own security," said Maj. Steve Murray, deputy commander of a military reconstruction team in Kandahar. "We can fight the Taliban until the cows come home, but we can't make the area safe if we don't deal with the other issues."

Last Tuesday, a Canadian officer arrived as bulldozers were clearing land for the new road. He was soon surrounded by frowning farmers who demanded extra money to let the road cross their fields. The mayor joined the negotiations, calculating acreage on a pad of paper. The officer politely insisted on the previously agreed price.

In the chilly Panjwai bazaar, turbaned men huddling around sidewalk teapots raised more serious issues. They expressed deep ambivalence about the presence of international troops and both fear of and admiration for the Taliban insurgents.

"The coalition forces have brought us nothing but problems. They enter our houses and mosques without permission," said Abdul Jan Mohammed, a grape grower whose vineyards were damaged by NATO airstrikes. "The Taliban don't want to fight. They are just tired of all the corruption, as we are."

Bismillah, 45, whose farm is a half-hour walk from town, said his neighbors had begun to return home since the bombing ended but that insurgents were still lurking nearby. Like many Afghans, Bismillah uses just one name.

"Everything is confused now," he said. "At night we hear shooting and rockets, and we cannot light our lamps for fear of the Taliban. But if a mine explodes on the road, the army and coalition forces come and pressure us to find out who did it. The best thing to do is negotiate, but the Taliban will never negotiate as long as the foreign troops stay here."

One obstacle to security is the shortage of Afghan police and soldiers in the region. In terms of size and competence, the new national army and police force have lagged far behind what officials hoped for, so the government recently began recruiting and training local auxiliary police officers to serve in conflict zones such as Kandahar province.

The program has drawn praise and criticism. It gives men in poor rural areas an income and a vested interest in protecting their communities. But recruitment standards are low, training is cursory, and many who sign up are rejected because of hashish use or other habits.

Commander Ehsanullah Alizai, the provincial police chief, said local elders and district officials are choosing applicants for the new force and that each recruit is further vetted by his office. But he acknowledged that the two weeks of training they will get are far from adequate.

"Of course it is not enough. It takes a lot of time and education to become a police officer. But this is an emergency," Alizai said, adding that 250 of the expected 1,000 new police officers have completed training and started work. "The security situation in Panjwai and Zhari was getting worse, and the government had to take action."

But the threat of further NATO bombing has not stopped the Taliban from launching new attacks, often against civilians. Last month, two insurgents on a motorbike ambushed Fazel Mahmad, a Panjwai elder, as he was taking his daughter to a doctor in Kandahar. Mahmad, who works with a government program that helps local insurgents return to civilian life, was shot in the neck and throat but survived after surgery at a NATO base.

"The local Taliban are sons of our soil, but the Taliban trained by al-Qaeda see all Afghans as infidels and Americans. They do not want any reconciliation," said Mahmad, who now speaks with a lisp. He said he saw many wounded Taliban fighters being treated at the NATO field hospital, where he said they cursed the medical staff and refused to eat.

In a second recent attack, insurgents opened fire on a clinic at a camp for nomads and refugees beside the highway from Kandahar to Panjwai and briefly kidnapped the doctor. Now the clinic building sits abandoned beside the colony of patched tents and thorn-bush camel corrals.

On Tuesday, several women in the refugee camp said they had fled there after airstrikes on their villages near Panjwai. One woman, Badro, shrieked and wept, saying two of her brothers and all the family's sheep and camels had been killed.

"Everyone is a witness. There were no Taliban there at all," she cried, shaking a fist. "The dead bodies of my family are still there. It is not safe to collect the pieces."

[On Sunday, a Pakistani suicide bomber detonated himself in Paktika province, killing 15 people and wounding 24, including an Afghan special forces commander, the Associated Press reported.]

The Afghan government has made efforts to console and aid survivors in Panjwai. Abdullah Shah said he was paid about $8,000 as compensation for his dead relatives. He was also taken to Kabul, where he said Karzai gave him a hug and promised him a new house.

Last week, the minister of rural development flew to Kandahar and met with a large group of elders from Panjwai, asking what they needed most. He was accompanied by Christopher Alexander, deputy U.N. representative for Afghanistan, who told them the goal was to transform their region "from this year's battlefield to next year's construction ground."

The delegation did not visit Panjwai because it was considered too dangerous, but Alexander said elders from several villages told him security was better because young men who had been fighting for the Taliban were now earning money on NATO construction projects. He also noted that several elders did not attend the Kandahar meeting, suggesting that they were suspicious of the government and sympathetic to the insurgents.

Mahmad, a fruit grower who remained in Panjwai that day, complained bitterly that the residents were trodden upon by everyone.

"We don't support the Taliban, but we don't want the foreign troops here, either," he said. "I blame President Karzai, too. If we had laws and honest government in this country, the Taliban wouldn't be fighting."

Abroad, Bush Tests His Persuasive Powers (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

RIGA, LATVIA

What was sketched into the presidential agenda as a transatlantic foray to address the North Atlantic Alliance's future has instead become one of the more consequential foreign-policy trips of the Bush presidency - and one of the tougher tests of his international leadership.

From the NATO summit he attends in this Baltic capital Tuesday and Wednesday, to the sit-down with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he has added to his agenda, this has become the trip of the George W. Bush wars.

By adding a leg to Amman, Jordan, to meet with Mr. Maliki, the White House has made this trip a crucial part of the president's deliberations on policy adjustments to address the deteriorating situation in Iraq. But before that, Mr. Bush will take up the war in Afghanistan with his NATO colleagues - and Afghanistan is something the president dare not disregard even in the midst of Iraq developments.

Not only is the NATO-led war in Afghanistan facing its own mounting challenges, with potentially deep consequences for the international war on terror, but of the two wars, it is also the one where the United States has important allied assistance.

Yet between the NATO focus on Afghanistan and the Jordan stop to address Iraq, Bush has essentially undertaken a trip focused on the broader Middle East. The test for him will come in his ability to press others into closer cooperation with the US.

"The way Bush's trip has evolved, it highlights how the major security issues we face are no longer in Europe but in the Middle East," says Ronald Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Transatlantic Center in Brussels. "Rhetorically the US and Europe are together on that, but politically and psychologically the alliance hasn't really made the leap."

NATO leaders may not like the prospect of a summit with an American president preoccupied with Iraq, Mr. Asmus adds, but that should prompt them "to consider whether they are really addressing the central security challenges facing us today."

In Riga, Bush will press the 26-nation alliance for both more money and more troops for Afghanistan, according to White House officials. To make his case, Bush will emphasize the connection between international security and the battle to defeat a resurgent Taliban and elements of Al Qaeda.

"If NATO is to be successful [in Afghanistan], it will need enough troops and the right kinds of troops to be able to do the mission," says Judy Ansley, senior director for European affairs at the National Security Council. "If you look to the threats of the 21st century, most of them are not right on the borders of Europe as they used to be during the cold war. Afghanistan is a perfect example. You have a terrorist threat that has already hit our shores," she adds, and it "obviously will threaten NATO and NATO member nations if we don't deal with it there."

NATO already commands more than 30,000 foreign troops in Afghanistan. Gen. James Jones, the supreme allied commander, is looking for summit leaders to add 2,500 troops to the total.

The challenge for Bush, however, will be skepticism about his leadership in the wake of perceived defeat in the midterm elections, and what is viewed internationally as his lame-duck status.

"The alliance needs some honest discussion about what it will take to lead a successful counterinsurgency and win in Afghanistan, and normally that would take prompting and leadership from the American president," says John Hulsman, scholar in residence at the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "The problem is that Bush is in no position, given his political weakness and the shambles of his foreign policy, to lecture anyone at the [NATO] summit."

Afghanistan has become the central test of whether NATO will be able to act as a true alliance to take on the global security issues of the 21st century, says Mr. Hulsman, an expert in transatlantic issues. Too many countries are resorting to so-called "caveats" to exempt themselves from the most dangerous combat missions, he notes, and that raises questions about those members' dedication to the common goals of the alliance.

"The Germans say, 'We are deployed in the north of Afghanistan and that is all we can do,' but being in the north is kind of like guarding New Jersey. It's a little beside the point," he says. "If they and others aren't prepared to put troops in the south where the heavy fighting is and where they might take casualties, then what is the point of the alliance?"

Having that discussion at the summit "risks ruining the party," Hulsman says. "But if you can't get everybody to share the burden of facing the enemies that threaten all of us - and by that I mean Al Qaeda and the forces in the larger battle with terrorism - then why have the party at all?"

Moreover, tough decisions about issues like troop deployment will be extra hard to come by in Riga, other experts say, because NATO countries generally are in a period of weakened leadership.

"President Bush is not the only weak political leader going there. Most of them are rather weak or on their last political lap," says Simon Serfaty, a global security expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. Noting that British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac will be out of the picture by next summer, while others like German Chancellor Angela Merkel face growing challenges at home, he says, "You do have a great deal of political weakness, which makes it all the more difficult to make some of the more demanding decisions related to this renewal of the alliance."

One thing working in Bush's favor, some experts underline, is that US-Europe tensions have eased since the falling-out over Iraq. Misgivings among partners still exist, they add, but are now more common between those taking on the bulk of the burdens and those sitting out the "hot war" assignments in Afghanistan.

"These tensions go to the heart of whether NATO is really going to work as an alliance on the security challenges we all face and where we face them - and for the foreseeable future that means the Middle East," says Asmus of the German Marshall Fund. "If you really believed the security of your nation was at stake, would you put such conditions on how your soldiers could fight for your defense?"

Bush To Spur NATO On In Afghan Fight (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush will push for a stronger NATO commitment to fighting in Afghanistan during a summit in Latvia this week, before heading to Jordan to try to work through what the White House acknowledges is "a new phase" of sectarian violence in Iraq.

The Jordan detour, a late addition to the itinerary, will consist of meetings with Jordanian King Abdullah II and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki tomorrow night and Thursday morning, and promises to dominate the four-day trip.

The White House said Mr. Bush will also use the trip to make it clear that, even with control of Congress changing and independent recommendations such as the Iraq Study Group pending, the president still decides foreign policy.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said Mr. Bush is "listening to all of these voices for ideas," but will assure Mr. al-Maliki that in the end, "it is the president who will be crafting the way forward on Iraq."

Mr. Bush finds a situation rapidly deteriorating on the ground in Iraq, and decided he needed to meet face to face with Mr. al-Maliki to fine-tune the course in Iraq. Mr. Hadley said the president wants to hear how the prime minister plans to rein in militias, what he will do to speed up shifting control to Iraqi security forces, and how he can bring more political groups into his coalition government.

On his second international trip since voters handed control of Congress to Democrats on Nov. 7, Mr. Bush finds this trip dominated by the two wars to which he has committed U.S. troops.

He is trying to resist being pushed around by the political situation at home, where expectations are running high for the Iraq Study Group, the congressionally mandated panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Yesterday, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next year, said the commission "faces a tremendous opportunity and responsibility. The opportunity is to generate a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. The responsibility is to make the hard choices required to turn Iraq around."

While still resisting the term "civil war" for the Iraq conflict, the White House did acknowledge the situation is deteriorating and efforts to stop it have failed so far.

"We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase," Mr. Hadley said, though he had little specific to say about how Mr. Bush plans to respond.

Some Shi'ite leaders in Iraq have threatened to withdraw from the government there if Mr. al-Maliki travels to meet with Mr. Bush.

Meanwhile, Abdullah this weekend broadened the stakes of the meeting and the Iraqi conflict by saying it cannot be solved unless there is also a solution to the Israel-Palestinian issue.

Adding to the situation is Lebanon, which is teetering after the recent murder of the industry minister and continued political conflict between Hezbollah and the U.S.-backed government.

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," the king said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

Meanwhile, expectations for the NATO summit are low. European nations are resisting Mr. Bush's push for committing more troops to the dangerous areas of Afghanistan, and want to go slowly on expanding the alliance's ties to non-NATO nations who are assisting with security operations.

Mr. Hadley said the difficulties are understandable but said the leaders at the summit will make some announcements on those issues.

"I think there is an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail," he said.

Mr. Bush spent the night in Tallinn, Estonia, for what amounts to a brief social call, before flying today to neighboring Latvia for the NATO summit in Riga. He will also deliver a speech at Latvia University.

It is the first NATO summit on the territory of the former Soviet Union.

Slouching Toward Riga (NYT)

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

When NATO leaders gather in Latvia this week, there will undoubtedly be a lot of grand talk about how the cold-war alliance has managed to elude irrelevance, bringing in new members, dispatching humanitarian aid and deploying peacekeepers beyond Europe's borders.

But the real issue before the annual summit meeting is that NATO is failing its most significant post-Soviet test: stabilizing Afghanistan. Violence is spiraling as the Taliban and Al Qaeda reassert their power. The economy is addicted to opium production. The pro-Western government in Kabul looks increasingly powerless and irrelevant.

Unless NATO's members commit to sending in more troops and more resources, Afghanistan could go the way of Iraq. There may not be many more chances after this week's meeting.

The current 32,000-member NATO force is too small. Some provinces — including those along the border with Pakistan, where the Taliban have their sanctuaries — have little or no allied presence.

Many of the participating countries have imposed "national caveats" limiting how their contingents fight. Some cannot patrol at night, some cannot leave their assigned area, and some cannot mount offensive operations. That makes it much harder for commanders to fight the enemy or even defend their forces, and it leads to an unfair division of labor. Canadian, Dutch, British and American forces in southern Afghanistan are doing most of the heavy fighting, while the French, Germans and Italians patrol relatively quiet northern regions.

DOJ_NMG_0098995

In Riga, President Bush will urge more troops and fewer caveats. But the president can't do much more than cajole the allies. Iraq has deprived him of both international credibility and the military forces to do more. It is now up to the rest of the alliance. All NATO members must acknowledge that the Afghan war is not just some post-9/11 gesture, nor publicity for the New NATO. There is a life-and-death struggle under way against terrorists and extremism that is in all their national interests to win.

NATO And The Taliban (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

The NATO forces battling resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan call to mind the Normandy landing. Once again, mostly Canadian, British and American troops are fighting and dying. Most of the rest of Europe is absent from the fight, a fact sure to be discussed at the NATO summit this week.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer is desperately seeking an additional 2,500 troops to suppress the Taliban. But with a few exceptions, such as the Dutch and Danes, most NATO members prefer the by now traditional division of labor: The Anglo-Saxons do the fighting while the others compete for popularity as armed aid workers.

The cover of last week's Der Spiegel magazine neatly captured the problem. "Germans Must Learn to Kill" read the headline above a picture of a German soldier in Afghanistan. The magazine wasn't advocating a more muscular German army. Rather, it was citing what American officials had told Karsten Voigt, Berlin's coordinator for U.S.-German relations.

The 2,900 German troops in Afghanistan are concentrated in the relatively safe north, focusing on reconstruction. France may withdraw its 200 special forces and opposes American plans for NATO to establish stronger links with like-minded countries outside the alliance. Most NATO members, including Italy, France and Spain, have placed absurd restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan. Some can operate only in certain (read: calm) regions; others won't fight in winter. These limits partly reflect the insufficient training and equipment of many European armies. While the U.S. spends about 4% of GDP on defense, the European average is half that.

Whatever the reason, this resistance to committing the troops and funds necessary to defeat the Taliban hardly matches the rhetorical commitment to the cause. The same NATO partners that refuse to provide adequate resources declare that losing Afghanistan is not an option. And right they are. If the Taliban are allowed to re-establish Afghanistan as global jihad's international headquarters, Europe would probably suffer more than the U.S. or Canada. The terrorists are opportunistic killers, attacking where there is the least resistance. Since September 11, they have failed to carry out another attack on U.S. soil. Scores have died in bomb attacks in Europe.

Afghanistan is both a test case for the West's resolve in the fight against Islamic terror and portent for the future of NATO. It is supposedly the "good" war, the multilateral war, the war that even the United Nations approved. If NATO can't muster the forces to defeat the remnants of al Qaeda's original state sponsor, what is it good for?

Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 28, 2006

U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank.

The report, released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades.

The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops.

Opium has remained the nation's most lucrative crop by far, and drug traffickers — through incentives and intimidation — have kept farmers in the opium business across Afghanistan, which the United Nations says produces about 87% of the world's opium. Last year, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, Afghanistan produced 4,100 metric tons of opium, nearly as much as the biggest harvest in 1999. The United Nations predicts a record harvest in 2007.

Today's report describes how opium farmers' flexibility has helped harvests increase. When government officials end the opium trade in one province, opium brokers typically move cultivation and trade elsewhere, the report says.

Counter-narcotics efforts also have fueled corruption, the report says. Farmers who can afford it have bribed local officials to preserve opium crops, while the poorest farmers have been driven deeper into debt when their crops are destroyed, the report says. Investigators found several instances in which farmers planned to replant opium to pay their debts.

The report also says local government officials sometimes help drug lords drive competitors out of the market in exchange for a cut of the profits or protection payments.

Antonio Maria Costa of the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime has recommended focusing agents on areas with less opium cultivation to keep such farming from spreading and help establish an alternative economy. The U.S. State Department's Anne Patterson, acknowledging “there is no silver bullet” to the opium problem, has said much of the growth in production is in areas with weak local governments.

Inside Politics (WT)

Apology sought

The national commander of the American Legion called on Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, to apologize for suggesting that American troops would not choose to fight in Iraq if they had other employment options.

"Our military is the most skilled, best-trained, all-volunteer force on the planet," National Commander Paul A. Morin said yesterday. "Like that recently espoused by Sen. John Kerry, Congressman Rangel's view of our troops couldn't be further from the truth and is possibly skewed by his political opposition to the war in Iraq."

According to Mr. Rangel, "If a young fellow has an option of having a decent career, or joining the Army to fight in Iraq, you can bet your life that he would not be in Iraq. If there's anyone who believes these youngsters want to fight, as the Pentagon and some generals have said, you can just forget about it. No bright young individual wants to fight just because of a bonus and just because of some educational benefits."

Mr. Rangel was responding to a question during an interview on "Fox News Sunday."

Narrow victory

Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce, Ohio Republican, won re-election yesterday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required.

Unofficial results announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Mrs. Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner, by 1,055 votes.

Mrs. Pryce lost Franklin County, the district's most populous, but she retained her lead thanks to votes she picked up in two other counties that announced results last week, Madison and Union, the Associated Press (AP) reports.

The race was one of a handful that had remained unresolved across the country since Election Day, when Democrats took control of Congress.

Mrs. Pryce ended up with 50.2 percent of the vote, compared with 49.8 percent for Mrs. Kilroy in the unofficial totals. An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than one-half of one percent.

Jersey barrier

Conservative groups in New Jersey are pushing a proposal that would grant the rights of marriage -- but not the title -- to homosexuals, siblings and others involved in domestic partnerships, the AP reports.

The plan comes in reaction to a state Supreme Court ruling last month that said same-sex couples in New Jersey should have the same rights and benefits as married couples. Whether to call those rights "marriages," civil unions or something else was left up to lawmakers.

Under the conservatives' plan, rights would be available to twosomes who are not eligible to marry, said Len Deo, president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council. Besides homosexuals, such couples would include blood relatives, or simply two unmarried friends of the same sex. Unrelated opposite-sex couples, who can legally marry, would not be eligible for the designation.

'Civil war' fight

NBC News yesterday began calling the Iraq conflict a "civil war," adopting a phrase that President Bush and many other news organizations have avoided, the AP reports.

Matt Lauer said on the "Today" show that "after careful consideration, NBC News has decided that a change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized as civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0098997

The Bush administration said yesterday that it does not think Iraq is in a civil war, and that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki does not, either.

"You have not yet had a situation also where you have two clearly defined and opposing groups vying not only for power, but for territory," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences, and also trying to destabilize a democracy."

StopHerNow.com

A Dallas businessman has launched a Web site with a single, simple objective: prevent Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton from becoming president.

StopHerNow.com aims "to shed light on the REAL Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America," proclaims the site created by Dick Collins, a Texas newspaper publisher and Republican activist.

The site features links to news articles and commentary about the former first lady, as well as a humorous animated series, "The Hillary Show."

The first installment of the cartoon series shows Mrs. Clinton sparring with potential 2008 rival Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Mr. Collins says he hopes to continue the series with new episodes reflecting the latest news surrounding Mrs. Clinton's much-anticipated White House bid.

The cartoon was created by a group of artists who are "a bunch of libertarians, not really political, but they all dislike Hillary Clinton," Mr. Collins said.

"The Republican Party over the last couple of decades has had the problem of appearing to be a party of anger, and we wanted our effort to be ... one that would deliver a smile," Mr. Collins tells Robert Stacy McCain of The Washington Times.

Mr. Collins says the site is "a grass-roots effort to define Hillary Clinton. She's trying to be something that she's not. She's attempting to become a centrist Democrat, and in fact she's an ultraliberal Democrat."

Bad move, Alcee

When Rep. Alcee L. Hastings started naming names of his critics -- and lashing out at "anonymous bloggers" -- the Florida Democrat may have bit off more than he could chew.

"I hope that my fate is not determined by Newt Gingrich, Sean Hannity, Ann Coulter, Michelle Malkin, Michael Barone, [Matt] Drudge, anonymous bloggers, and other assorted misinformed fools," Mr. Hastings wrote last week in a five-page letter to House Democratic colleagues, seeking support for his bid to become chairman of the House intelligence committee.

"The letter may have done more harm than good to Hastings' cause, however, because Malkin answered in kind with a post that labeled Hastings a 'fool' and his letter to colleagues an 'unhinged rant,' " K. Daniel Glover wrote at National Journal's Web site (www.nationaljournal.com).

Mrs. Malkin's response to Mr. Hastings at michellemalkin.com "included plenty of background links on the Hastings bribery case and current criticisms of his leadership bid," Mr. Glover noted.

Other bloggers, not all of them conservatives, have joined in the anti-Hastings response, highlighting the facts of the former federal judge's 1988 impeachment and removal from office for bribery, including the names of prominent Democrats who condemned Mr. Hastings as guilty of corruption.

The public-relations debacle unleashed by Mr. Hastings' letter prompted Glenn Reynolds (www.instapundit.com) to observe that Mr. Hastings is "the perfect target for hostile bloggers -- a guy with a really lousy record who'd rather people didn't think about it, whose every complaint just provides an opportunity to remind people how lousy that record is."

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Garcia Faces Tough Calls (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 28, 2006

Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia knew there would be some tough calls to make when he accepted an appointment to one of the most high-profile law enforcement jobs in the country.

Garcia, 45, was sworn in as U.S. Attorney on Sept. 6, 2005. During a little more than a year as the top federal prosecutor in Manhattan, he had to pull the plug on several celebrated cases to defend subordinates from almost unprecedented criticism over their handling of a non-prosecution agreement with KPMG.

But Garcia does not take refuge in the fact that the cases he has had to clean up were launched well before he took office last year.

DOJ_NMG_0098998

"We don't measure the value of this office in terms of wins and losses," he said in a recent interview in his office at One St. Andrew's Plaza in lower Manhattan. "The value is in the type of cases we bring and the example we set for the rest of the country."

Garcia said that the Southern District has always taken "hard cases, cutting edge cases," that come with some risk attached.

"We go in because we believe the case is strong and we do the right thing," he said. "We have some assistants saying 'I'm 11-0,' but what does that mean? A guy might be 5-5 but he's bringing very tough, important cases."

Garcia opted in August to avoid a retrial and reach a deferred prosecution agreement with former investment banking heavyweight Frank Quattrone on charges that he obstructed investigations into the process for allocating shares in initial public offerings while head of the Credit Suisse First Boston Technology Group.

Then, after a jury in September was unable to reach a verdict in the third racketeering trial against John Gotti Jr., Garcia announced it would not be in the interests of justice to pursue a fourth trial.

And last week, the office dismissed charges against five New York Stock Exchange specialists who were accused last year with defrauding customers of millions of dollars by exploiting their position as middlemen by trading ahead of buy and sell orders. Prosecutors previously had dropped charges in two other cases. They have obtained guilty pleas or verdicts from five specialists. Two other defendants have been acquitted at trial, and one case is pending.

While the Quattrone, Gotti and stock exchange cases received their share of media attention, they are far removed from the day-in, day-out work done by the office on issues including international narcotics trafficking, violent gang crimes, organized crime and white-collar cases such as stock fraud and market manipulation.

When Garcia took office, he emphasized his great respect for its traditions and national reputation, and said he had no intention of radically changing the way the office does business.

Garcia indicated he would pay particular attention to public corruption, announcing a higher profile in the district's northern counties by establishing a corruption hotline.

Last month, he announced the indictment of state Assemblyman Brian M. McLaughlin, a labor leader, for stealing, with others, more than $2 million from labor organizations, nonprofits and the state of New York.

Garcia has pressed the ongoing investigation into corruption in the United Nations sponsored "Oil-for-Food" program. The program, which was designed to mitigate the harm done to civilians in Iraq from international sanctions against the regime of Saddam Hussein, allegedly spawned a series of insider deals for connected businessmen and prominent public officials.

On Nov. 1, Garcia announced the indictment of Sanjaya Bahel, a former procurement agent at the United Nations, who allegedly received real estate in return for steering more than $50 million worth of United Nations' contracts to Nishan Kohli of Thunderbird Industries. Kohli was also charged in the scheme.

And Nov. 20, Garcia announced the indictment of Salvatore "Hot Dogs" Battaglia, president of the Local 1181 of the Amalgamated Transit Union on racketeering charges in connection with his status as a member and associate of the Genovese organized crime family.

DUAL USE TECHNOLOGY

The personnel of the office has remained relatively stable since Garcia took office.

But he has made some changes in the structure of the office, including breaking up the organized crime and terrorism unit into two distinct groups. Richard Daddario is chief of the organized crime unit.

The newly formed terrorism and national security unit, headed by Edward O'Callaghan and David Raskin, is charged with augmenting and supporting what Garcia said is primarily a military battle against terrorism.

The unit focuses on crimes such as immigration and document fraud, violations of trade sanctions regimes with outlaw nations, and, of particular interest to Garcia, enforcement of import-export restrictions on technology that has both a military and civilian use, such as machine tools that have a benign purpose but could be used in a nuclear program. Garcia had previously worked on the issue as an assistant secretary of commerce.

He has formed an "ad hoc working group" with his office, Commerce Department officials and his old organization within the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Its efforts, he said, are geared toward "pro-active investigations."

"We might start to see some results soon in that area," he said. "It might not be a pipeline going directly to Hamas, but there is some stuff that is going into very sensitive areas, such as Iran."

Garcia said he has made a priority of interagency cooperation, sending O'Callaghan and Raskin to regular morning meetings with their counterparts in other federal agencies to review the latest "real-time" intelligence on possible threats.

The meetings, he said, "send a great message to our law enforcement partners" and brings "focus" to the anti-terror efforts of prosecutors in New York and Washington D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0098999

Other changes at the office this year included the departure of Richard Owens as chief of the securities and commodities fraud unit for a partnership in the New York office of Latham & Watkins. Owens' shoes were filled by David Esseks.

PROSECUTORS CRITICIZED

Garcia has faced major challenges stemming from his office's tactics in the KPMG case.

The criminal case, touted as the largest tax fraud prosecution in U.S. history, alleges that KPMG partners and employees sold illegal tax shelters to wealthy clients, costing the U.S. Treasury more than $2 billion in revenue. The government reached a non-prosecution agreement with the firm in August 2005 that had strings attached -- KPMG must provide real cooperation to prosecutors trying to win convictions against the former partners and employees.

But in June 2006, Southern District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted the government for using its leverage over KPMG to force it to cap the payment of legal fees for ex-employees under investigation.

The judge said that, in following the guidelines for determining whether a company is cooperating fully with an investigation, outlined in the Justice Department's Thompson Memo, the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment," and violated the Fifth and Sixth amendments.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," he said.

Garcia jumped to the defense of his prosecutors.

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Justice Department policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," he said in a statement following the decision.

Garcia declined to specifically discuss the KPMG case during a recent interview. But generally, he said, on one hand, he would not make it a point to just "sail into a dispute" with a federal judge and on the other, "I certainly don't want to see assistants criticized unfairly."

The case had forged an unusual set of bedfellows opposing the government, with the Chamber of Commerce and the Association of Corporate Counsel teaming up with the defense bar to fight the Thompson memo.

Veteran defense lawyer Gerald Lefcourt said the case has riveted the defense bar and that his colleagues were pleased to hear that top Justice Department officials are reconsidering some of the policies enshrined in the memo.

TOUGH APPROACH

Lefcourt said Garcia has reinforced what he called an increasingly harsh, or "Calvinistic" approach, to plea negotiations and charging decisions in the Southern District. One example was the recent attempt by the government to obtain a 30-year sentence for defense lawyer Lynne Stewart, who was convicted of providing material support for terrorism by helping the Islamic Group of Egypt send messages to and from its imprisoned spiritual leader, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman.

Judge John Koeltl opted instead to give Stewart 28 months in prison, which the defense attorney and her followers hailed as a victory outside of the courthouse at 500 Pearl Street.

Garcia laughed at the term "Calvinistic," and said his approach to charging decisions and plea negotiations is entirely consistent with past Southern District policy, a policy he said has a proven track record.

"This office, as much as any other, has traditions and has things that are tried and true and work," he said.

Garcia said the prosecution of Stewart, Mohamed Yousry, and Ahmed Abdel Sattar was "a complex trial that we got convictions on" -- an example of a cutting-edge prosecution that was risky and sent an important message.

His office is expected to appeal Koeltl's sentence of Stewart.

Lefcourt and other defense lawyers said of the few setbacks suffered by the office that Garcia "shouldn't be tagged with the problems people see."

"It's too early" to judge Garcia's performance to date, Lefcourt said. "The jury is still out."

U.S. Attorneys are appointed to four-year terms.

BIOGRAPHY

A graduate of Albany Law School, Garcia was an associate at Cahill, Gordon & Reindell and clerked for state Court of Appeals Judge Judith S. Kaye before joining the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office in 1992.

He served in the office for nine years, successfully prosecuting the defendants in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing case and the four defendants charged in the Osama bin Laden indictment for the bombing of two U.S. embassies in Africa.

He left the office in 2001 to become assistant secretary for export enforcement at the Department of Commerce and was named acting commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service in November 2002.

Following the reorganization that resulted in the Department of Homeland Security, he was named by President George W. Bush in March 2003 as assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a position he held until August 2005.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Affiliated Computer Ousts King, Edwards After Probe (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Benedikt Kammel

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

Nov. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Affiliated Computer Services Inc., the world's biggest processor of student loans, ousted Chief Executive Officer Mark A. King and finance chief Warren D. Edwards after a probe showed that stock options were backdated.

King, 49, and Edwards quit yesterday after violating the company's code of ethics with options awards, according to a statement today. Chief Operating Officer Lynn Blodgett, 52, will become CEO and John Rexford, 49, will be chief financial officer.

The two managers at the Dallas-based company are among more than 60 executives that have left their jobs after investigations into whether options grants were backdated and compensation costs misreported. Options probes to see whether grants were retroactively dated to increase their value to executives and other recipients have affected at least 187 companies.

``Investors need to be on their guard'' with companies that backdated options plans, said Pieter Wind, head of securities at ING Private Banking in Amsterdam, which oversees about $14.4 billion and doesn't hold stock in Affiliated Computer. ``We're not talking Enron here, but it makes you wonder if they did more to the expense of shareholders.''

Shares of Affiliated Computer rose as much as 5.6 percent to $53.60, and traded at $52.46 as of 10:10 a.m. in New York. Before today, they had lost 14 percent this year.

`Intentional Misdating'

The Affiliated Computer managers ``used hindsight to select favorable grant dates'' on options after Chairman Darwin Deason had authorized the issue of the option grants, the company said. Another unidentified manager was also aware of the ``intentional misdating'' of the documents, Affiliated Computer said.

King and Edwards will no longer be entitled to their existing severance agreements and will have their salaries cut while they remain at Affiliated Computer in a transition period through June 30, 2007, the company said. The two executives will no longer be eligible for any bonus plans.

The incorrect accounting unearthed in the probe, which scrutinized option practices between 1994 and 2005, will lead to about $51 million in costs plus tax-related expenses, the company said. The sum may be higher or lower depending on the final outcome. Affiliated Computer said it has yet to determine whether it will need to restate earnings as a result of the adjustment.

``Neither Mr. King nor Mr. Edwards told the company's directors, outside counsel or independent accountants that the company's stock options were often granted by looking back and taking advantage of past low prices,'' Affiliated Computer said.

Delayed Earnings

Affiliated Computer had delayed its fiscal first-quarter earnings report because of the options grants. The company on Nov. 1 said earnings dropped 6.9 percent to 60 cents a share from 74 cents a year earlier, more than analysts had predicted, as sales advanced at the slowest pace in six quarters and new orders declined.

King's tenure as CEO only lasted for a little more than year. He was appointed in October 2005 to replace Jeff Rich, who had run the company since 1999. King, who was chief operating officer, was replaced by Blodgett at the time.

Blodgett joined Affiliated Computer in 1996 after the company he founded, Unibase Technologies Inc., was acquired by ACS. Rexford joined the company the same year and was previously in charge of overseeing the mergers and acquisitions program at Affiliated Computer.

Multiple Probes

Affiliated Computer has been investigated on several occasions in recent years. In May this year, it said a current and a former employee may be charged with crimes uncovered in a Justice Department antitrust probe. In February 2004, the company said the SEC was investigating contracts in Florida, where the company has acknowledged employees manipulated wage rates and start-date information to make their performances look better.

In January 2004, a former vice president of Affiliated Computer was convicted on charges that he orchestrated a $3.8 million billing fraud.

More than 150 companies have disclosed internal or federal reviews of their options-granting practices to determine if they manipulated grant dates to enrich employees.

Brinkley Morse, the former CFO of Quest Software Inc. quit after refusing to answer questions about past option grants at the maker of database-management programs, the company said on Nov. 24. Property and casualty insurance seller HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said on Nov. 17 that CEO Stephen L. Way and General counsel Chris L. Martin resigned after accountants found misdated options that may lead to restatements of as much as $37 million.

Affiliated Computer received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for New York's Southern District and an informal inquiry from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, both concerning options grants.

Corporate In-house Lawyers No Longer Low-key And Low-paid (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

Becoming a corporate general counsel used to be something leading American lawyers did to slow down.

The jobs were considered relatively low-key, low-profile and low-paid, at least in comparison to a partner at a big law firm, and lawyers who went in-house often held their jobs until they retired or got bored.

Not any more. In the wake of the 2002-03 corporate scandals and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate accountability law, general counsels are now central figures at most US companies, often reporting directly to the board and often appearing on the list of the five highest paid corporate officers.

The post has also become a much riskier assignment. In the past six months, 12 public companies have changed chief legal officers amid investigations into whether the firms illegally backdated stock options grants to pump up executive compensation.

Hewlett-Packard is also in the market for a lawyer to replace general counsel Ann Baskins, who resigned after the company's use of "pretexting" during an investigation of board leaks came to light.

"These positions are not for the faint-hearted," says Catherine Nathan, head of general counsel practice for search firm Spencer Stuart. "The whole environment has changed. Corporations are under a microscope. CEOs are under intense scrutiny and they rely heavily on their general counsels."

Between the departures over stock options and ordinary turnover, the American market for in-house lawyers is hopping, search firm executives say. In-demand candidates are fielding multiple inquiries and compensation packages are rising.

The average bonus for the nation's 100 highest-paid general counsels was $906,820 last year, up 16 per cent, and the average restricted stock grant was nearly $1m, up 35 per cent, according to a study of Securities and Exchange Commission filings by Corporate Counsel magazine.

When salaries were included, the total average package reached nearly $2.5m.

"I'm seeing a bit of sticker shock [at the size of the wage bills]," says June Eichbaum, senior partner at the search firm Heidrick & Struggles, which has been hired to fill at least four of the positions vacated in the options scandal.

"Historically, the general counsel was not thought of as a profit centre," she says, adding that the job had now become a critical business function.

Worried boards are asking for candidates with a different set of skills than they did 15 years ago. Back then, companies wanted merger-and-acquisition experience and investment banking ties.

Now even companies not facing immediate regulatory problems want former prosecutors and SEC enforcement lawyers.

Search firms date the shift to the Enron and WorldCom scandals, which put corporate fraud on the public radar. Since then, Fortune 500 companies PepsiCo, Lockheed Martin, Boeing and Estée Lauder have all turned to lawyers with Justice Department experience.

"The board wants someone who can walk into the offices of the SEC and the justice department and know people there . . . someone who understands what the regulators care about today, not what they cared about 10 years ago," Ms Eichbaum says.

Today's boards are equally clear about what they do not want - anyone with ties to options backdating. With 160 companies enmeshed in the scandal, boards have become insistent that candidates are scandal-free.

"They have to have clean hands," says Martha Fay Africa, managing director of legal search firm Major, Lindsey & Africa. She says boards are asking: "How can we know that this person wasn't implicated?"

The new focus on regulatory issues dovetails with the on-the-job experience of in-house lawyers.

For the second year in a row, "keeping apprised of company activities that may have legal implications" has replaced "reducing outside legal spending" as the main concern of American in-house lawyers, with 86 per cent mentioning it in a survey for the Association of Corporate Counsel.

"With all of the international operations, they are really on call 24/7," says James Wilber, a leader of services to corporate law departments at Altman Weil, a consulting firm. "The pressure has increased significantly."

Date Set For Milberg Weiss Trial (WSJ)

By Andrew Simons

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099002

LOS ANGELES -- The trial of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a prominent class-action law firm, and two of its top partners, will get under way here Jan. 8, 2008, a federal judge said at a hearing Monday.

The setting of the trial date came amid further questions from defense lawyers about whether government prosecutors would file additional indictments, a subject that has been a sticking point in setting a firm trial date.

Prosecutors had been aiming for a trial date in October 2007, while defendants were seeking a February 2008 setting.

Federal Judge John Walter started Monday's hearing suggesting an October trial date. Defense attorneys balked, saying that wasn't enough time to prepare for a case if more indictments were filed against Milberg Weiss.

"October is unrealistic to get this done in an orderly way," said Bill Taylor, the lead attorney for Milberg Weiss.

So far, the government's efforts to obtain further indictments have remained under seal at the request of prosecutors, and Judge Walter said at the hearing that the efforts were "a red herring" in the case.

In May, a federal grand jury here indicted the firm on fraud charges. According to the 20-count indictment, the firm paid plaintiffs millions of dollars in exchange for filing more than 150 lawsuits. Two of the firm's top partners, Steven Schulman and David Bershad, also were charged with participating in the alleged kickback scheme.

In addition, Seymour M. Lazar is accused of acting as a paid plaintiff in some of the firm's cases and Paul T. Selzer is charged with laundering money on Mr. Lazar's behalf.

The defendants have maintained their innocence.

At one point in Monday's hearing, government prosecutors said they would not add charges in the case if the trial date could be set in October. Defense attorneys shot back that the government could still pursue the charges later in a future case.

"Are we simply postponing allegations?" asked Mr. Taylor.

Judge Walter was critical of government prosecutors taking so long to investigate the case, as he had been at a hearing in September. "The problem is this continuing moving target," he told government prosecutors, in reference to more indictments.

Milberg Weiss has been one of the most aggressive law firms in the U.S., essentially pioneering the business of filing giant securities class-action lawsuits -- bringing together hundreds or thousands of investors into one big case against a corporation. The firm's lawyers have engineered $100 million-plus settlements against Prudential Insurance Co., Lucent Technologies Inc. and CVS Corp., among others. In cases such as these, shareholders typically sue a company claiming it misstated its finances.

Federal law prohibits lead plaintiffs from being paid more than other plaintiffs in securities class-action lawsuits (with some exceptions for incidental expenses). The government charged the firm, as well as Messrs. Bershad and Schulman, with multiple fraud counts.

The Deferred Prosecution Racket (WSJ)

By Richard A. Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Corporations suffer a peculiar vulnerability. The rules of criminal liability allow federal and state prosecutors to unduly punish those corporations that fall within their crosshairs. But the recent emergence of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) to force major changes in corporate governance should give pause to even the most ardent populist.

A DPA is a provisional settlement of a criminal lawsuit whereby the prosecutor agrees to suspend -- but not to dismiss -- any prosecution in exchange for the corporation's promise to reform its internal operations in specified ways. A sensible settlement can split the difference, by having a defendant pay half the maximum fine or sentence. But with corporations they take on an entirely different -- and sinister -- complexion. * * *

The last thing a corporation fears (since it cannot be imprisoned) is the maximum fine from a successful criminal conviction. Rather, the deadly force of the DPA rests in a combination of two key factors: vicarious corporate criminal liability, and the collateral consequences of the initial indictment prior to, and independent of, any eventual conviction.

Vicarious liability, as first developed in tort law, allows innocent third parties to sue not only an individual wrongdoer for damages, but also his employer, so long as the wrongdoer's act is within the scope of his employment. In the context of tort law, this rule ensures funds for compensating innocent victims, while giving a firm the incentive to monitor its employees. Many judicial decisions have, however, unwisely imported this doctrine wholesale into the criminal arena -- allowing a corporation to be punished criminally for the actions of any midlevel or senior employee, even if the corporation neither authorized nor condoned the wrongful action.

Writing in January 2003, Larry Thompson, then deputy U.S. attorney general, exhorted federal prosecutors to use vicarious liability to extract favorable settlements to reform corporate defendants from the outside. The Thompson memorandum insisted that corporations receive a temporary reprieve only if they purge themselves of individual wrongdoers and agree to extensive government oversight to make them walk the straight and narrow path.

In pursuing Mr. Thompson's strategy, prosecutors face both a dilemma and an opportunity. Their only credible threat against a recalcitrant corporation is the criminal indictment -- yet simply filing an indictment triggers huge collateral repercussions sufficient to drive the firm out of business, as teams of state and federal regulators are now duty-bound to suspend the licenses and permits under which the corporation does business. Thus, the corporation that has strong protections against false convictions -- proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the elements of the crime, the ability to examine evidence or cross-examine witnesses -- is helpless to protect itself. A conviction carries at most a million-dollar fine, but simple indictment, which lies wholly within the prosecutor's discretion, imposes multibillion-dollar losses.

Faced with that kind of pressure, the indictment is all that matters. Yet given these weird incentives, DPAs no longer serve the public interest. The agreements often read like the confessions of a Stalinist purge trial, as battered corporations recant their past sins and submit to punishments wildly in excess of any underlying offense.

Evidence of the gravity of the situation is only a mouse-click away. In one such notable agreement, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey, Christopher J. Christie, put the screws to Bristol-Myers Squibb, which got into hot water because of a potential securities violation for inflating its quarterly earnings by a business practice known as channel stuffing. BMS told its distributors that they had to take into inventory large amounts of BMS products immediately, with the understanding that down the road they could return the excess for a refund. The alleged securities violation arises from the overstated earnings quarterly reports, without indication of any expected future write-offs.

The naïve reader might think that a DPA should prohibit the firm from engaging in future conduct of the sort that got it into hot water in the first place. But Mr. Christie had larger ambitions. The most striking evidence of the abuse of power is paragraph 20 of the agreement, which requires BMS to "endow a chair at Seton Hall University School of Law," Mr. Christie's alma mater, for teaching business ethics, a course that he himself could stand to take.

That mild government peccadillo is a mere prelude to the sterner stuff to come. BMS agreed not only to abide by the law and to purge its ranks of the parties responsible for the scheme, but also to exhibit "exemplary corporate citizenship." To that end, all its activities have been overseen by Mr. Christie's independent adviser, former federal district court judge Frederick B. Lacey, who has the power to attend all meetings and review all documents -- and to report his findings to Mr. Christie. BMS was ordered to restructure its internal operations and appoint a new chief compliance officer to assist Mr. Lacey. It also agreed to pay a $100 million fine and make contributions of $350 million to a fund for present and former shareholders.

All these key provisions flunk the most elementary standards of business rationality -- if the object of these DPAs is to restore the confidence of shareholders in the firm. How can any firm act decisively with a government mole in its midst? What other firm would seek to acquire BMS, knowing that they must thereby give Mr. Christie the keys to its boardroom? And what purpose do shareholder funds serve, other than to impose random transfers among shareholders?

A DPA such as this one erodes the most elementary protections of the criminal law, by turning the prosecutor into judge and jury, thus undermining our principles of separation of powers. The Bristol-Myers Squibb DPA allows the prosecutor to lower the boom following the recommendation of Mr. Lacey. The corporation's sole remedy is to plead its case before the prosecutor in an environment wholly devoid of the most rudimentary procedural protections.

These powers were implemented when Mr. Christie threatened to reinstate the indictment if the board did not remove CEO Peter R. Dolan for his role in an aborted agreement with Canadian corporation Apotex. The agreement -- to delay Apotex's introduction of a generic competitor to Plavix, BMS's best-selling blood thinner -- led to a criminal antitrust investigation. Any connection between channel stuffing and price fixing remains unclear. * * *

BMS is not the only instance of prosecutorial zeal. A New York deferred prosecution agreement with KPMG in essence required the firm to stop payment to former employees to cover the defense expenses in criminal prosecutions for tax fraud before Judge Lewis A. Kaplan in New York's southern district. Mr. Kaplan rightly treated the government's decision as an unwarranted interference with the defendants' constitutional right to the assistance of counsel and a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. He has ordered a cessation of proceedings until the defense lawyers could regroup their forces.

Yet we should do far better. For starters, the Department of Justice should engage in unilateral disarmament by disavowing the odious Thompson memo, and rethinking why it ever needs to threaten the nuclear option of a corporate indictment. For its part, our new Congress should repeal by statute the doctrines of vicarious liability for criminal conduct in a corporate context -- because these give the government unwarranted and arbitrary power over corporations.

At bottom, corporations are just individuals tied together by an elaborate network of contracts; and we don't need yet another sorry reminder of how mindless government policies harm the innocent shareholders whom they are supposed to protect. The government has a vital role in criminal enforcement. So let it go after real, i.e., human, criminals the old-fashioned way, by careful investigation and skilled prosecution.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Government To Appeal Acquittal Of Former San Diego Councilman (AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (AP) -- The Justice Department said Monday that it will appeal a federal judge's ruling that overturned a jury conviction of a former City Council member accused of taking money from a strip club owner in exchange for political favors.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam poured significant resources into winning a conviction against Michael Zucchet in July 2005, forcing the councilman to resign and relinquish his position as interim mayor. Four months later, U.S. District Court Judge Jeffrey Miller acquitted Zucchet, saying the evidence against him on charges of fraud and extortion was insufficient.

"Because it is rare for a trial judge to overturn a jury's unanimous finding of guilt, it should not surprise anyone that the government would seek to defend the jury's verdicts on appeal," Lam said in a statement.

Zucchet's attorney, Jerry Coughlan, insisted on Zucchet's innocence.

"They've got an uphill battle ahead of them to convince an appellate court that one of the best judges around was wrong," Coughlan said.

Zucchet and fellow former Councilman Ralph Inzunza were convicted of taking money from Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi in exchange for trying to ease restrictions on touching dancers at San Diego strip clubs.

Zucchet was convicted of four counts of fraud and three counts of extortion on his first day as interim mayor. Mayor Dick Murphy had resigned amid federal probes into the city's scandal-plagued pension fund.

Inzunza was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Lance Malone, a former Clark County, Nev., commissioner and a lobbyist for Galardi, was sentenced to three years in prison.

Fan Hacks Into Cell Phone Data For Linkin Park's Lead Singer, Threatens Wife, Feds Say (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - ALBUQUERQUE, New Mexico-A woman is accused of using a computer at a national laboratory to hack into a cell phone company's Web site to get a number for Chester Bennington, lead singer of the Grammy-winning rock group Linkin Park.

According to an affidavit filed by the Department of Defense Inspector General, Devon Townsend, 27, obtained copies of Bennington's cell phone bill, the phone numbers he called and digital pictures taken with the phone.

Investigators said she also hacked into the e-mail of Bennington's wife, Talinda Bennington, and at one point called her and threatened her.

Talinda Bennington told federal authorities last month that someone had accessed their Verizon Wireless account online, according to the affidavit, and expressed concern that a "stalker" had access to personal information.

Townsend waived her right to a preliminary hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court and was released to her mother's custody. She is accused of using a computer at her former workplace, Sandia National Laboratories, to access Bennington's cell phone information. Lab spokesman Michael Padilla said Wednesday that she no longer worked there.

Townsend's attorney, Ray Twohig, said that investigators were still analyzing his client's computer and that it remains to be seen what exact violations will be alleged.

"This is the Internet version of a groupie hiding in Mick Jagger's dressing room," Twohig said. "We're in a different age, and fans have more skills than they used to."

Townsend's computer wasn't connected to classified data, Padilla said.

The affidavit says that during a search of Townsend's home in Albuquerque, investigators found Linkin Park posters, autographed band memorabilia, pictures of Townsend with Chester Bennington, bootlegged Linkin Park music and copies of messages and photographs intercepted from the Bennington family's e-mail accounts.

A person who answered the phone Friday at Time Warner - Linkin Park's label is Warner Bros. Music - said no one would be available to comment until Monday.

Sandia National Laboratories develop technology to support national security, according to its Web site.

Linkin Park has sold more than 36 million records worldwide. In February, Linkin Park and rapper Jay-Z shared a Grammy Award for best rap/sung collaboration for "Numb/Encore." In 2001, the band won a Grammy for best hard rock performance for "Crawling."

At Trial, Transcripts Reveal 2 Detectives' Last Minutes (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Two covert police detectives spent their final minutes touting their underworld credibility and evading their surveillance team in an effort to put the men they were investigating at ease, according to testimony and recordings delivered in court yesterday.

"What is the big deal?" one detective asked the two men in his car, according to a surveillance tape transcript provided by prosecutors. "I know. Everybody's leery. Listen, I'm leery, I'm leery too. I, I understand. I don't want to get caught up."

Minutes later on the evening of March 10, 2003, the detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, and his partner, Rodney J. Andrews, 34, lay dead on a street in Staten Island.

Their supervisor, Sgt. Richard Abbate, found their bodies shortly after losing the signal from a surveillance transmitter one detective wore disguised as a pager.

"I saw that he had one eye closed and one eye opened," Sergeant Abbate said, speaking from the witness stand about Detective Andrews. "He had sustained a wound to his head. I then approached Detective Nemorin. There was a long line of blood coming from his head."

It is likely that no one will ever know whether the detectives' efforts to disguise their employment succeeded. The man on trial for their killing in federal district court in Brooklyn, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty on charges of murder in furtherance of racketeering.

Prosecutors have dropped charges of obstruction of justice murder, because a witness crucial to those charges rescinded his earlier account that Mr. Wilson knew the men were detectives.

That witness, like several others in the case, was a member of the so-called Stapleton Crew, a street gang that prosecutors said sold drugs and guns, shot, robbed and terrorized a path across Staten Island.

"It grew from a group of guys selling crack cocaine on the corners and in the projects to having a route," an assistant United States attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said in her opening statement yesterday.

In the years since the shooting, seven members of the group have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges in exchange for their testimony against Mr. Wilson.

Ms. Kavanagh told jurors that Mr. Wilson intended to steal $1,200 from the detectives, money they were carrying to purchase a Tec-9 pistol, though the stack of police-issued $100 bills remained in Detective Nemorin's pocket after he was killed. She told jurors that the members of the Stapleton Crew had speculated on Detective Nemorin's police status, but she stopped short of suggesting that Mr. Wilson knew for sure.

"The evidence will show, ladies and gentlemen," Ms. Kavanagh said, "that the defendant did not care."

A lawyer for Mr. Wilson, Ephraim Savitt, told the jury that the witnesses were unreliable. Aside from the man who changed his account, others have lied to prosecutors and violated the conditions of their cooperation deals, Mr. Savitt said.

The fourth man in the car on the night of the shootings, Jesse Jacobus, then 17, has assaulted his fellow inmates as he waits to testify, the defense lawyer said.

"He still is a brute," Mr. Savitt said. "You're going to have to rely on the word of Jesse Jacobus to find that Ronell Wilson was actually the shooter, as the government alleges."

Mr. Jacobus is one of the seven men who have pleaded guilty in the case. As the lawyers made their arguments, a crowd of police officers watched on a screen from an overflow room. Inside the courtroom, their colleagues were dressed in business suits, prohibited from appearing in their uniforms.

Friends and relatives of the slain detectives, including several small children, watched from the gallery. As testimony began, the police supervisor, Sergeant Abbate, described following his detectives through the streets of Staten Island, listening to the signal from the surveillance transmitter in his sport utility vehicle. The car the detectives were driving, a Nissan Maxima, had once been his own department-issued vehicle.

Sergeant Abbate said he watched two men climb into the seats behind the detectives, ride around and then stop for a red light. When the light changed, Sergeant Abbate testified, the Maxima did not move. A man got out of the back seat. Inside his S.U.V., another officer leaned over and blew the horn. The man in the street turned and looked at the S.U.V., Sergeant Abbate said, identifying the person he saw as Mr. Wilson. Then the Maxima drove out of his sight.

The sergeant said he could tell that Mr. Wilson had later returned because he heard the same voice resume on the transmitter.

In their transcript, prosecutors identified that voice as “Ronell Wilson.” The recording played in court was unintelligible for long portions, a mixture of static, overlapping voices and hip-hop music, presumably from the car stereo. The audible parts are dominated by Detective Nemorin’s lilting Haitian accent.

Using profane street language riddled with racial slurs, Detective Nemorin sought to convince the men in the car that Detective Andrews was his brother-in-law.

“There’s nothing to worry about,” Detective Nemorin said. “Look, we’re not going to deal in front of him, O.K.? I’m coming. I could step out and we do the deal outside.”

The voice attributed to Mr. Wilson argued every point:

“That ain’t how Frankie run business, yo,” he said.

“It’s mad hot, man,” he said, meaning the police are watching closely.

“It’s mandatory, we gotta search you,” he said.

Between arguments, the voice directs Detective Nemorin where to turn as he drives, a winding series of lefts and rights punctuated by talk of frustration at red lights.

“That’s it, that’s it,” Detective Nemorin said, 20 seconds before the tape cuts to static. “All right? All right?”

Rare Death Penalty Trial Begins In New York (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 28, 2006

A federal prosecutor told a jury yesterday that the Staten Island man accused of executing two undercover detectives during a gun sale in 2003 had considered that his victims might be police and simply "did not care."

The defendant, Ronell Wilson, now 24, could face the death penalty if convicted in a trial that opened yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But the judge, Nicholas Garaufis, instructed the 12 jurors and six alternates not to think about sentencing Mr. Wilson during the first stage of the trial, as they decided the factual question of his guilt or innocence of the federal racketeering crimes he is charged with.

Mr. Wilson is a reputed leader of the Stapleton Crew, a gang named after the Staten Island housing project of the same name. Mr. Wilson is accused of killing detectives James Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews as he gave them driving directions from the back seat of the car.

The car, a Nissan Maxima, is at the center of the case. The ride began at about 7:15 p.m. on March 10, 2003, when the detectives pulled up in front of Wilson, then 20, and his 17-year-old associate Jesse Jacobus at the housing development.

The aim of the detectives, both members of the elite Firearms Investigation Unit, was to purchase a TEC-9 submachine gun for $1,200 and get "one more gun out of the hands of one more violent criminal," an assistant U.S. attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said. A half-hour later, the bodies of detectives were found in a nearby street. Both men had been shot in the head.

The conversation from the final 30 minutes of the detectives' lives was captured on a static-filled audiotape that prosecutors played yesterday. The conversation between Mr. Wilson and the detectives was fueled by suspicion. Mr. Wilson had expected only one man, not two, to show up for the deal. Nemorin repeatedly tries to allay Mr. Wilson's suspicions by saying Andrews is his brother-in-law.

Feds' Probe Of James Now Takes Close Look At Newark Land Deals (NSL)

By Ian T. Shearn And John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), November 28, 2006

A federal investigation into the administration of former Newark Mayor Sharpe James has expanded, with more subpoenas delivered to City Hall and agents now scrutinizing real estate deals that benefited some of the ex-mayor's biggest supporters, according to sources close to the probe.

FBI agents in recent weeks have interviewed a number of city employees, and prosecutors also have demanded additional records from Newark City Hall, among them personnel files of at least four current and former city employees, including James' son, Elliot.

The federal investigation began in late August, when federal officials issued subpoenas and executed a search warrant following a Star-Ledger story detailing travel expenses that James and his security detail had charged to a police department credit card. James, who stepped down in June after 20 years as mayor, remains a state senator.

While investigators continue to look at travel-related expenses, they are also probing the administration's sale of surplus city lots to developers at cut-rate prices, according to sources familiar with the investigation. Among those winning the no-bid contracts were several people with close ties to James, including some with little or no development experience, a Star-Ledger investigation found in 2005.

In June, a state Superior Court judge in Essex County halted the discount land sales, saying that the timing of developers' campaign contributions to James and other city officials and the approval of their projects "raises concerns."

James, now head of the newly created Urban Issues Institute at Essex County College, did not return phone messages left at his home and office. At a recent event sponsored by the institute, James declined to comment on the probe, saying, "We are not interested in that. I'm a college professor now."

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Chris Christie, declined comment.

On Nov. 2, federal investigators delivered a subpoena to City Hall, demanding the personnel files for Elliot James, the ex-mayor's son and former aide; Leonard Anton H. Wheeler, a school board member and former planning board member who was Sharpe James' legislative aide; Calvin West, who was James' top aide for years; and Diana Jarrell, an investigator for the city's Alcoholic Beverage Commission. A copy of the subpoena was viewed by The Star-Ledger.

It was unclear why the grand jury sought those records.

West, who is now employed as the governor's representative in North Jersey, said he was unaware that his records were subpoenaed, adding that he has not been called to testify before a grand jury.

"I've been out of City Hall for four years," West said. "Nobody has said anything to me."

Wheeler, now an Irvington school teacher, also said he was unaware that his records were subpoenaed. He said he had not been contacted about testifying, but would do so if called.

"I don't know what they hope to find by looking at my records," Wheeler said. "I wasn't paid much and I came to work."

Wheeler said he believes the investigation is politically motivated.

"This is about doing away with the old regime," Wheeler said. "This is about destroying Sharpe's legacy. Everything good that happened in this city in the last 20 years has Sharpe James' fingerprints on it."

Neither Elliot James nor Jarrell could be reached for comment.

In August, the U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed travel records and personnel files for 10 city employees, including five former police bodyguards, two department heads, two former mayoral aides and a former city councilman.

Anthony Fusco, a Passaic attorney representing three of James' former bodyguards, said his clients have been interviewed by FBI agents, but have not appeared before a grand jury. His clients -- officers Jerome Ramsey, Robert Moore and Lucinda Simmons -- are complying with federal investigators, he said.

Earlier this month, Newark attorney and longtime James confidant Raymond A. Brown and his son, Raymond M. Brown, went to City Hall and asked for copies of James' travel and expense account documents recently turned over to federal investigators, a spokeswoman for Mayor Cory Booker confirmed. City lawyers declined the request, said the spokeswoman, Desire Peterkin-Bell.

In an Aug. 20 story, The Star-Ledger detailed James' use of a police department credit card to augment his travel, dining and entertainment expenses.

While in office, James used two credit cards to pay for his travel and expenses -- one billed to the police department and the other to City Hall. According to incomplete records obtained by The Star-Ledger, James put more than $200,000 in charges on the two cards over the past 4 1/2 years, with more than $125,000 attributed to travel.

The two expense accounts came on top of $25,000 that the City Council added to his annual salary in 1993 to cover such costs.

In addition to demanding James' travel records, the U.S. Attorney's Office also has subpoenaed travel records and personnel files for 10 other city employees, including the police bodyguards, two department heads, two former mayoral aides and a former city councilman. Investigators also have asked for e-mails generated by James and another bodyguard, Adelino Benevente, dating to 2001.

3rd Woman Is Identified Among 4 Victims In Ditch (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Nate Schweber

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Investigators yesterday released the identity of the third of four women found dead last week in a ditch near a squalid strip of motels just outside Atlantic City. They noted that like two other victims, she, too, had a history of prostitution arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0099008

The victim, Barbara Breidor, 42, is believed to have been dumped into the ravine about two weeks before pedestrians discovered the women's bodies on Nov. 20, according to a statement by the Atlantic County prosecutor, Jeffrey S. Blitz.

The cause of her death, and that of the unidentified victim, have not been determined. But investigators have said that autopsies on the other two victims showed that one, Tracy Ann Roberts, 23, died of asphyxiation and that the other, Kim Raffo, 35, was killed by ligature strangulation.

All four victims were found in several inches of water behind a $15-a-night motel, barefoot and with their heads facing in the same direction, a few hundred feet apart, Mr. Blitz has said.

Medical examiners have told investigators that the varying decomposition of the victims' bodies indicates that they had been killed and dumped at different times during the past month, and that the most recent victim had most likely been dead for only two days before she was found.

While drug dealing and prostitution have long been commonplace near the rundown strip of the Black Horse Pike where the bodies were found, many residents and business owners have been terrified at the prospect of a serial killer preying upon women who live on the margins of Atlantic City's economy.

Local authorities have formed a task force with the New Jersey State Police and the F.B.I. to try to solve the killings. Two dozen investigators have been assigned to the case, Mr. Blitz said. .

Ms. Breidor's friends said they had been worried about her since she disappeared about six weeks ago. She lived in a quiet neighborhood of well-tended homes across the street from the Ventnor Educational Community Complex.

Lori Adams, a former roommate, said that despite the problems that led Ms. Breidor to struggle for a living on the tawdry outskirts of Atlantic City, she was bright, upbeat and funny.

"She made you laugh every second of every day you were with her," Ms. Adams said.

Ms. Adams became agitated when asked about Ms. Breidor's record of prostitution arrests. "It's nobody's business what she did with her life," she said. "The things she did she will take to her grave."

Ms. Breidor was raised in the suburbs of Philadelphia, according to a cousin, Lance Breidor, and lived intermittently along the Jersey Shore during the past two decades. Mr. Breidor, 45, said they spent a lot of time together as children but drifted apart when they became adults. He said he remembered hearing that she had struggled with drug addiction.

When he last saw Ms. Breidor eight years ago, he said, she was working at a jewelry store at a mall outside of Philadelphia and appeared to have her life in order

"She seemed to be the type that would always be smiling and joking," he said. "Usually when there are people who'd take a bad turn there are signs. But we never saw any with her."

A.C. Killings Echo Three Earlier Cases (PHI)

By George Anastasia And Jacqueline L. Urgo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 28, 2006

ATLANTIC CITY - Earlier this year, three suspected prostitutes were attacked on North Georgia Avenue a few blocks from the city's Boardwalk casino strip.

All three were slashed across the throat. Two died.

Those unsolved crimes have attracted the attention of investigators probing the killings of four suspected prostitutes whose bodies were found last week in a drainage ditch in the West Atlantic City section of Egg Harbor Township.

"Major Crimes, the FBI and the state police have been in," said Atlantic City Police Detective Richard Johnson, a city arson investigator who worked on the Georgia Avenue cases.

Johnson was quick to point out that there was no hard evidence linking the Georgia Avenue slashings to the marsh killings, which some have attributed to a serial killer. Investigators are interested because all of the victims were apparently prostitutes, Johnson said.

Though the victims on Georgia Avenue were slashed, authorities have determined that at least two of the women whose bodies were dumped in the marsh had been strangled. Pathologists could not determine the cause of death of the two other marsh victims because the bodies were too badly decomposed.

Yesterday, as a task force of federal, state and local authorities pressed the hunt for the killer of the women in the marsh, a third victim was identified as 42-year-old Barbara V. Breidor. The fourth victim, whose body had been in the ditch for up to a month, remains unidentified.

Authorities pointed out that all four women in the ditch were white with blond or light hair.

Two of the Georgia Avenue victims, including one who died, fit that description, Johnson said. The other woman who died was African American.

DOJ_NMG_0099009

"They're all from the same victimization group," Capt. Jim Hutchins of the Atlantic City police said, referring to the women's background as suspected prostitutes. He said yesterday that linking the two sets of killings would be speculation at this point.

The first Georgia Avenue slaying was on May 3, according to police, who opened an investigation after firefighters responding to a fire in an apartment at 29 N. Georgia Ave. discovered a charred body.

The victim was later identified as Veronica Fields, 45.

"She was badly burned," said Johnson, the arson investigator. "It wasn't until the autopsy that we realized her throat had been slashed.

Authorities believe Fields' killer put her on a bed in her apartment and set the bed on fire.

In July, a suspected prostitute was attacked in a parking lot next to that building, Johnson said. Her throat was slashed, but she survived.

Police would not release the woman's name yesterday.

Two months later, on Oct. 1, police were summoned to an apartment at 26 N. Georgia Ave., where they found Karen Luongo dead in her bathtub. Her throat had been slashed.

Luongo was last seen entering her apartment a few nights earlier with an unidentified man, according to a report in the Atlantic City Press.

Johnson said investigators had been pursuing several angles in that case, including one theory that Luongo was killed because she knew who had killed Fields.

The two apartment buildings are across the street from each other, just a few blocks from the Boardwalk casino strip and the city convention center and train station.

The apartment building at 26 N. Georgia has a notorious history. Twenty-five years ago it was the residence of mob boss Nicodemo "Little Nicky" Scarfo, who is now serving a 55-year prison term for racketeering and murder.

"Back then that was one of the safest blocks in the city," an investigator said.

The Atlantic City Police Department Vice Squad has been providing information to the law enforcement task force investigating the West Atlantic City murders.

The four marsh bodies were discovered Nov. 20 within about 300 feet of one another in a drainage ditch behind a strip of seedy motels along the Black Horse Pike, about a mile outside Atlantic City.

All four were barefoot, lying facedown, with their heads pointed toward Atlantic City.

Breidor last lived on Lafayette Avenue in Ventnor. She was identified through dental records, Atlantic County Prosecutor Jeffrey S. Blitz said.

Earlier, investigators identified two other victims as Tracy Ann Roberts, 23, and Kim Raffo, 35, both of Atlantic City. Both had been strangled.

Breidor was wearing Capri-style jeans and a brown, long-sleeve zippered jacket. Blitz estimated her body had been in the water at least two weeks and authorities could not determine a cause of death.

Breidor, Roberts and Raffo had arrest records for prostitution, Blitz said.

The fourth victim, described as 5 feet tall and weighing about 160 pounds, has not been identified. Authorities believe her body was in the water for up to a month. Investigators hope several identifying tattoos, including a black-and-white bulldog on the small of her back, a crudely designed Playboy bunny on her shoulder, and the name "Yolly" or "Molly" on her stomach, will help them learn her identity.

The three known victims have been described as transient, living in boardinghouses and apartments in Atlantic City's poorer fringes. Fields and Luongo, the Georgia Avenue victims, also skipped from house to house.

"They're easy targets," said Hutchins, a 25-year police veteran. "If they disappear for two weeks, nobody cares. They just figure they're 'cracked out.' "

Hutchins said most prostitutes in Atlantic City - as in other cities - are drug addicts likely to take risks.

"It's an occupational hazard," he said. "But they'll pretty much do anything for a dollar."

Fairfax Police To Seek FBI Help (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Fairfax County police plan to ask for help from the FBI as they investigate the recent killings of two similar-looking elderly women who shared the same first name and lived two miles apart.

"We want to make sure we're looking into all possible leads," said Officer Camille Neville, a Fairfax County police spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0099010

Officer Neville said that officers canvassing the Springfield neighborhood near where the women were killed received some "promising" tips.

Police stopped cars at Hyland and Craig streets Sunday night, handing out 4,000 fliers and asking residents for information.

"We did receive some interesting information -- not necessarily pertinent at this point, but things we would not have known otherwise," she said.

Marion Newman, 74, of the 7100 block of Reservoir Road, was found dead inside her home by a friend about 11:15 a.m. last Tuesday. She had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier.

Police said there was no sign of forced entry into Mrs. Newman's home, but there were signs of a struggle. They also said that Mrs. Newman suffered trauma to her upper body.

Investigators are examining whether the case is linked to the August slaying of Marion Barbara Marshall just two miles away.

A friend found Mrs. Marshall, 72, dead in her home in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14. An autopsy revealed that Mrs. Marshall had been beaten to death.

Surveillance photos showed Mrs. Marshall about 11:15 a.m. Aug. 14 at the Giant Food store in the Bradlick Shopping Center, located at 6980 Braddock Road, police said.

Police said that they have not connected the two killings through physical evidence but are investigating the similarities.

Officer Neville said police are planning to ask for help from the FBI's Quantico, Va.-based Behavioral Science Unit, which develops profiles of suspects based on evidence patterns.

Police do not believe the killings of Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Newman were related to the death of a 52-year-old Falls Church woman found in her house about 4:30 p.m. Saturday.

Officers found Julie Mansfield Adams of the 8300 block of Glastonbury Court after receiving a tip from West Virginia State Police, who were investigating the suicide of a 41-year-old man.

Police initially said that Mrs. Adams suffered trauma to the upper body, but autopsy results released yesterday showed that she died from a stab wound.

The killing was domestic in nature, police said.

Fairfax County has recorded 15 homicides this year.

Inmate At Big Sandy Prison Slain; Second Killing In Three Weeks (LEXHL)

By Lee Mueller, EASTERN KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 28, 2006

INEZ - Federal authorities are investigating the second slaying in less than three weeks at a maximum security prison in Eastern Kentucky.

Prison authorities Monday confirmed the stabbing death of Shamoni Peterson, 32, on Nov. 13, three weeks after the U.S. Penitentiary-Big Sandy in Martin County reported the first slaying since it opened in 2003.

"Preliminary information indicates he was the victim of an assault," a Federal Bureau of Prisons news release said Monday.

Peterson, like the first victim, Calvin Speight, 42, was from Washington, D.C. Peterson was transferred to the Martin County prison on Dec. 14 and was serving a sentence of six years and three months for unlawful possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, according to authorities.

Like Speight, who died Oct. 24, Peterson was transported to Highlands Regional Medical Center near Prestonsburg, where he was pronounced dead, Floyd County Coroner Roger Nelson said.

Nelson said Peterson apparently had been stabbed repeatedly with a sharp weapon and was pronounced dead at 6:40 a.m.

"He bled out, more or less," Nelson said.

Prison spokeswoman Mashelle Arisman said that no charges have been filed in either case, but that the FBI is investigating.

Arisman said the prison, which houses 1,600 high-security inmates near the Johnson County line, has been placed on lockdown status during the investigation.

Warden Suzanne Hastings could not be reached for comment, but Felica Ponce, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons in Washington, said "there is no correlation between the two deaths that have occurred there."

Slick Admits Lying To FBI In Miller Case (CRG)

By Dorothy De Souza Guedes

Cedar Rapids Gazette, November 28, 2006

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA - In a small federal courtroom crowded with reporters, investigators and members of Evelyn Miller's family, Danny Slick pleaded guilty to lying during a July 3, 2005, interview with the FBI about Evelyn's disappearance.

Details of the plea agreement, which could require Slick to cooperating with prosecutors, were not available.

Slick was accused of lying to FBI agents July 3, 2005, about a drug dealer known as "Porky" and where "Porky" lived.

Slick's friend Randy Patrie, 34, told Slick that he had stopped to get "dope" at "Porky's" after he dropped off Slick at their residence about 2:30 a.m. July 1, 2005, after the two men left the apartment where Evelyn lived with her family.

At the time of Slick's arrest, authorities said it was an important step forward in piecing together the events that led to the disappearance of Evelyn and her death.

"This is the first time that somebody is having to take responsibility for anything connected to Evelyn's disappearance," said Brandi Hoffman, of Des Moines.

Hoffman spoke outside the courthouse on behalf of the family. She is the sister of Casey Fredericksen who was engaged to Evelyn's mother and responsible for the girl's care the morning she disappeared.

Man Pleads Guilty To Misleading FBI In Evelyn Miller Case (AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

CEDAR RAPIDS (AP) — A man believed to have been one of the last to see Evelyn Miller alive pleaded guilty Monday to lying to FBI agents investigating the girl's 2005 disappearance and death.

Danny Slick, 27, of Charles City, admitted in federal court to giving investigators false statements during interviews days after the five-year-old girl disappeared from her Floyd apartment.

He faces a maximum of five years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 20 in U.S. District Court in Sioux City.

Prosecutors and investigators have said little on whether Slick's legal case has any significant bearing on the ongoing investigation into Miller's slaying.

But U.S. District Judge John Jarvey agreed Monday to seal most of the details of Slick's 13-page plea deal.

Relatives of the young girl viewed Slick's guilty plea and its confidential details as some positive pieces to the puzzle.

"I think he knows who did it and what happened," Brandi Hoffman, the girl's aunt, told reporters afterward. "There has to be a reason for them to have sealed" the plea deal.

Slick was arrested in June and indicted by a grand jury on two counts of making false statements to FBI agents working the case.

He pleaded not guilty, was released after posting bond, but arrested again in August for violating his probation and held in custody since.

Dressed in a prison gray shirt and pants and handcuffed around the waist, Slick offered few words during his brief hearing, mostly just answering "yes" to a series of the judge's questions.

Under the deal, Slick admitted to lies alleged in the indictment's second count, involving statements Slick gave about his whereabouts and that of his former roommate, Randy Patrie, the night Miller disappeared.

Initially, Slick said he and Patrie visited the apartment to see Casey Fredericksen, the live-in boyfriend of the girl's mother, Noel.

Slick said he and Patrie left Miller's apartment and returned to their home in Charles City at about 2:30 a.m, but that Patrie left for about 15 minutes, allegedly to buy drugs at the home of someone named "Porky."

In the indictment, authorities say Slick altered details of his initial story during a second interview. In court documents, Slick said he did not see Patrie again for several hours after Patrie left their home, and that he misled agents when he denied knowing Porky's real name and where he lived.

Where Are They? 2 Little Boys Have Vanished Without A Trace (MINNST)

By Terry Collins And Richard Meryhew, Star Tribune S Taff W Riters

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 28, 2006

Ground and air searches turned up no sign of the Red Lake brothers, opening up other theories about what happened.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- Now that the air and ground crews are gone, the question on everyone's mind is: If Tristan and Avery didn't wander away from their home, then what happened to them?

"We just don't have any indicators one way or another," on whether the brothers wandered off or whether foul play was involved, FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said Monday.

Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, were last seen playing outside their home Wednesday morning in a remote area.

Although authorities have said they have found no evidence so far that would suggest the boys were abducted, that scenario seems more probable with each passing day, said an expert familiar with cases of missing children.

"There's not a break in the ice, not the scent in the trails that would normally tell you they wandered off," said Nancy Sabin, executive director of the Jacob Wetterling Foundation.

Sabin added: "They used a lot of sophisticated tools to figure out how far those boys went and how fast. And as of the moment, there isn't any evidence that they went into the water anywhere. ..."It's a stumper I think at this point, anything is possible," she said.

The Wetterling Foundation is a nonprofit organization that educates families and communities to prevent the exploitation of children.

Paul Burke, a consultant with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, agreed with Sabin.

"I don't know where this will go," Burke said Sunday after thanking the scores of volunteers at the Red Lake Humanities Center. "It's hard. It's tough."

The ground and air searches were called off on Sunday, but "pinpoint searches" will continue. Under dreary skies, authorities on Monday surveyed some empty houses near the missing boys' home.

While the brothers haven't been seen, their smiling faces are on fliers that have been posted in surrounding areas and the Twin Cities.

After five days of intense searching, McCabe said they haven't ruled out the possibility the boys might still be on the Red Lake Reservation in northern Minnesota.

"Whenever you do a ground search, you can't always be sure," he said. "There's never a guarantee every area has been covered, even after a thorough search."

Sabin encouraged anyone who might have information about the case to call authorities. The FBI has set up a tip hot line at 1-866-333-4969. Citizens also can call the FBI at 612-376-3200 or the Red Lake Tribal Police at 1-218-679-3313.

"The public's eyes, ears and hearts are really needed in this situation to break this case in some way," Sabin said. "We need some good, quality leads. And you just never know what's going to break it. Somebody out there knows something."

Stranger abductions of children are extremely rare in the United States. The most recent study by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children showed that about 115 occur each year.

Nevertheless, Sabin said , parents of children who have questions about the Red Lake case should talk with them to reassure them that they are safe and loved.

"Parents need to give an extra hug or spend time in conversation or a hand held here or there to make sure they are going to be OK," she said.

'POP' TART SCAMS BIGWIG (NYPOST)

By Dan Mangan

The New York Post, November 28, 2006

November 28, 2006 -- A pretty, young swindler who first met a top Pepsi Bottling Group executive online later anonymously shook him down for $125,000 by threatening to tell his wife, children and bosses he was trolling the 'Net at work for women, shocking court papers reveal.

"I'm sure this will be an unpleasant surprise. I'm sure when your wife finds out that you've been looking for a fill-in for her . . . it will be unpleasant for her, too," Jessica Wolcott, 22, e-mailed multimillionaire exec Gary Wandschneider, 54, in August.

Wolcott - who had met the exec face-to-face five months earlier - hid her identity in the threatening missive by using the e-mail account "cheater_eater@hotmail.com."

"After all these years of being married, this is how you repay your vows?" Wolcott asked Wandschneider, a father of three and executive V.P. for worldwide operations at Westchester-based Pepsi Bottling.

"You are disgusting . . . you are pathetic," Wolcott continued in the August e-mail.

Wolcott warned Wandschneider he would end up known as "just another hated Peter Cook" - supermodel Christie Brinkley's cheating hubby - if he didn't pony up the cash.

And when Wandschneider tried to stall by asking for time to gather the $125,000, she warned, "Here's hoping your life is still a living hell and worrying every day that your name will be in the news or on a TV movie for what you've done to your wife."

Wolcott eventually got the funds transferred to her online account - but only after Wandschneider alerted the FBI, which provided the money and set up a sting to nail her.

The feds discovered her identity by determining she sent the e-mails from various locations in Pennsylvania.

When Wandschneider learned her name from FBI agents, he told them he had met her last February through the craigslist.org Web site. A month later, after exchanging e-mails and photos, he met her at a Mount Kisco bar.

The Ridgefield, Conn., man also copped to giving her $30,000 shortly after that meeting because she told him she needed to pay debts.

Although court papers do not identify Wandschneider by name, his identity was confirmed by Pepsi Bottling.

Wolcott pleaded guilty to the extortion scheme in White Plains federal court last week. She was ordered to repay the swindled $125,000 and surrender her computer.

She faces up to two years in prison at her February sentencing, but remains free on bail.

Wandschneider - who admitted to the feds that he used craigslist.org and another Web site to meet other women - could not be reached for comment.

But his wife, Dana, said, "I can't wait for her to be sentenced. You know, extortion is a bad thing."

A Pepsi Bottling spokeswoman said the company - the world's largest bottler of Pepsi beverages - learned of the scandal only yesterday and has launched an internal investigation.

Wolcott told thesmokinggun.com Web site, which first reported the case, that she did not have a "relationship" with Wandschneider.

Her lawyer, Susan Brody, told the Web site that Wolcott was "a young girl who has not had an easy life."

When Wandschneider first received an anonymous threatening e-mail on his office computer from Wolcott, she told "Gary" that she knew he had used his work e-mail account on a Web site that catered to wealthy men trying to meet attractive women, court records say.

"I'm sure [Pepsi Bottling] would be very proud to have an employee with such high morals," she wrote. "I don't like cheaters, not at all, men like you become my profession . . . You think you can just [throw] money at some young girl . . . who needs it because you are in a better position and use it to get sex?"

Admitting that what she was doing was extortion, Wolcott told Wandschneider she had no criminal record, so that even if she got caught, "I will get a slap on the wrist."

Ex-city Worker Pleads Guilty (RMA)

By Jack Flynn, Jflynn@repub.com

The Republican (MA), November 28, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - Another day, another guilty plea.

A former Springfield Housing Authority maintenance foreman yesterday became the 25th defendant to be convicted or admit guilt in Springfield's corruption probe. He pleaded guilty to two felonies for his role in building the Rhode Island summer home of ex-City Councilor Francis G. Keough III.

Daniel J. McNamee, 40, of Springfield, pleaded guilty to one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false federal tax return during a hearing before Judge Michael A. Ponsor in U.S. District Court.

The guilty pleas were part of a deal with the U.S. Justice Department that will spare McNamee a trial but potentially expose him to 12 to 18 months in prison, Ponsor said. Sentencing was set for March 1.

The pace of the six-year federal corruption offensive has picked up since August, with 10 defendants pleading guilty and two others accepting plea deals in the housing authority scandal.

Last week, Fred Swan, a prominent city activist and brother of state Rep. Benjamin Swan, D-Springfield, pleaded guilty to fraud and other charges for his management of the taxpayer-funded Caring Health Center in Springfield.

In the only defeat for the federal government, Ponsor ruled that charges were filed too late against housing authority contractor Peter Davis following his trial in October on racketeering and bribery conspiracy charges.

Details of McNamee's agreement, including whether he will be required to cooperate in upcoming cases, were not immediately available yesterday.

The outlines of the deal were discussed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven H. Breslow and McNamee's lawyer, Mark J. Albano, during a brief private conference with Ponsor.

The plea came seven months after a grand jury accused McNamee of misleading investigators about a heating system he installed at Keough's Rhode Island vacation home, and failing to report $11,000 in income from construction work at Friends of the Homeless, a taxpayer-financed charity run by Keough after he left politics in the mid-1990s.

Until quitting in 2002 to run his own contracting business, McNamee had worked as a $47,000-a-year maintenance foreman for the housing authority's Reed Village development.

During yesterday's hearing, Breslow said the defendant not only worked on Keough's property on authority time, but was accompanied by other employees as well.

No charged were filed against McNamee for defrauding the authority, but the 50-count indictment against Keough and two other men states that the $1,700 boiler installed at his home was obtained from the authority.

Keough, one of Springfield's most influential figures, is facing fraud, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, tax evasion and other charges related to his decade-long tenure at the homeless charity.

In the Springfield Housing Authority case, ex-director Raymond B. Asselin and 11 others pleaded guilty or accepted plea agreements in a multi-million dollar embezzlement scheme.

The housing authority and Friends of the Homeless are operating under new management.

Gentry Admits He Shot Tame Bear (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, November 28, 2006

Country music star Troy Lee Gentry admitted Monday that "Cubby," the bear he killed on a Minnesota farm in 2004, wasn't a wild beast after all.

Appearing in federal court in Duluth on the day his trial was to start, Gentry pleaded guilty to a charge of falsely claiming the animal was wild. The charge, a misdemeanor, was the result of a plea bargain reached last week with federal prosecutors.

"He's glad to get it over with," said Gentry's attorney, Ron Meshbesher, of Minneapolis. "Obviously, he's saddened by all the publicity in this case, which inferred all kinds of improper conduct."

Gentry, 39, and Lee Marvin Greenly, 46, who owns Minnesota Wildlife Connection near Sandstone, were charged in August with conspiracy and falsely "tagging" the "trophy-caliber" bear by claiming it was shot in the wild. In reality, the tame bear was shot in a fenced area of several acres.

After the indictment, Gentry's Nashville agent shifted the blame for any improper conduct to Greenly, and online fan discussion forums were abuzz with debate over whether Gentry was a bona fide big-game hunter or a wannabe.

Gentry, in a statement released by his management company, said he regrets what happened, but he stops short of accepting any culpability other than relying on Greenly's guidance.

"I did participate in improperly tagging the animal I shot, without realizing the seriousness of what I was doing. For that, I am truly sorry," the statement said. "I relied on the experts around me for guidance, and I regret that today. Not so much because I was fined and punished, but because it appears that I don't have respect for the law."

He says the legal case "has been a humbling experience for me, and one which I deeply regret."

Gentry, half the country duo Montgomery Gentry, had previously declined to speak publicly about the bear shooting. The band's Web site works to craft an image of him and Eddie Montgomery as authentic country music icons.

"We're not trying to candy-coat anything. Who we are is who we are. It's all about being real, being yourself, and playing real music to the people," Gentry is quoted as saying in a biographical blurb.

But federal wildlife officials alleged Gentry's self-professed prowess as a bow hunter was candy-coated and in fact not real. The music star paid Greenly $4,650 for "Cubby," a 600-pound black bear that lived on Greenly's 80-acre business.

Gentry, who lives in Tennessee and has a Minnesota hunting license, killed the bear with a bow and arrow as a video camera recorded the action.

When the kill was registered with the state's Department of Natural Resources, however, he said the bear was killed in the wild.

Meshbesher and the U.S. attorney's office worked out the plea bargain last week, and Gentry entered his new plea Monday morning before U.S. District Judge Paul Magnuson, sitting in Duluth.

In return for the guilty plea, prosecutors dropped a felony count against Gentry.

"It was emphasized by the judge … that he was merely charged with an improper tagging where the bear was killed," Meshbesher said. "The bear was legally harvested."

Greenly pleaded guilty to two felony counts. He is alleged to have set up illegal baiting stations inside Sandstone National Wildlife Refuge, then helped other hunters kill bears at the stations.

Both men will be sentenced later. Greenly could face up to five years' imprisonment on each count and a $400,000 fine.

Gentry has agreed to pay a $15,000 fine and not hunt in Minnesota for five years. He also will turn over the mounted bear, which Meshbesher said is in Gentry's home in Nashville.

While it may not rise to the collectibility status of Hank Williams' Martin D-28 guitar or a Lefty Frizzell rhinestone Nudie suit, the bear could wind up in the hands of a fan. Forfeited items are usually sold by the government at auction, Meshbesher said.

DOJ_NMG_0099015

In a notice posted on Montgomery Gentry's Web site after the indictment in August, Johnny Dorris, whose Hallmark Direction Co. manages the band, lashed out at the "false accusations made against Troy in the indictment."

He said Gentry was "disheartened that he has been falsely accused" and shifted the blame to Greenly, saying Gentry had killed and tagged the bear "per the guidance of his professional guide."

Dorris could not be reached for comment Monday.

Gentry is an avid hunter, Meshbesher said. The band's 10-page contract rider even includes an "Attitude Enhancement" section that said any promoter booking the band in winter should provide for "snow skiing, snowmobiling, boating, hunting and/or fishing."

CIVIL LAW:

Justices Let Stand A Decision To Void Big Award Against Philip Morris (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court refused to revive a $10.1 billion award against Philip Morris USA yesterday, rejecting an appeal from smokers who said they were misled about the health risks of "light" cigarettes.

The justices, without comment, left intact an Illinois Supreme Court decision that threw out the case against Philip Morris, which is a division of the Altria Group and is the nation's largest cigarette maker.

Antismoking activists had hoped the verdict would be the first in a series of awards around the country against the industry over light cigarettes.

"It's clearly the end of lights litigation in Illinois," said David Adelman, a Morgan Stanley analyst who has an overweight rating on Altria. Altria shares fell 33 cents, to $83.42, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

In overturning the award last year, the Illinois Supreme Court said smokers could not invoke a state consumer protection law because the Federal Trade Commission had endorsed the "light" and "low tar" descriptions in settlements with other cigarette makers. Like many states, Illinois bars claims over actions specifically authorized by a government agency.

Supreme Court intervention might have complicated plans by Altria, which is based in New York, to spin off its Kraft Foods unit. On Nov. 16, Altria's chief executive, Louis C. Camilleri, said the company was ready to split off the food company, pointing to what he said was a waning risk of costly tobacco-related awards.

The tobacco industry is still defending a separate nationwide class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in New York on behalf of light cigarette smokers. That suit, which invokes federal racketeering law, also raises questions about the legal force of the F.T.C. settlements.

Arguments in Major Antitrust Case

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 (AP) — The Supreme Court pressed both sides Monday in a case that turns on the question of how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust-conspiracy suit.

Some experts consider the case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, which stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years.

The class-action suit was filed in 2003 on behalf of United States consumers of local telephone and Internet service, claiming that incumbent local telephone companies, or Baby Bells, illegally conspired to prevent competition by excluding new local phone companies from their territories and agreeing not to compete against each other.

The original seven incumbent local phone companies have been reduced to four through mergers and acquisitions: Verizon Communications, the BellSouth Corporation, Qwest Communications and AT&T.

A federal district court dismissed the case, saying plaintiffs did not have enough evidence to show that a conspiracy would most likely be proved at trial. That decision was reversed by the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which ruled in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a "short and plain statement of the claim" to survive a motion to dismiss.

The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, who contend that a low standard would allow "meritless" and "abusive" cases to go forward. But the plaintiffs argue that a higher standard could make it too difficult for individuals to bring valid antitrust cases.

Supreme Court Rejects Reinstatement Of $10.1 Billion Cigarette Verdict (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099016

The U.S. Supreme Court sided with one of the largest U.S. tobacco companies on Monday and refused to disturb a court ruling that threw out a $10.1 billion verdict over Philip Morris USA's "light" cigarettes.

The Court issued its order without comment.

Last year, the Illinois Supreme Court threw out the massive fraud judgment against Philip Morris, a unit of the Altria Group Inc., in a class action lawsuit that involved "light" cigarettes.

Because the Federal Trade Commission allowed companies to characterize their cigarettes as "light" and "low tar," Philip Morris could not be held liable under state law even if the terms it used could be found false or misleading, the state court said.

The case involved 1.1 million people who bought "light" cigarettes in Illinois. They claimed Philip Morris knew when it introduced such cigarettes in 1971 that they were no healthier than regular cigarettes but hid both that information and that light cigarettes actually had a more toxic form of tar.

An Illinois judge ruled in favor of the smokers in March 2003, saying the company misled customers into believing they were buying a less harmful cigarette.

A separate case involving Philip Morris is pending before the Supreme Court. Justices are considering whether to allow a punitive damages award of $79.5 million to the widow of a longtime smoker.

Laws Prohibit Smoking Around Children (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 28, 2006

Anti-tobacco forces are opening a new front in the war against smoking by banning it in private places such as homes and cars when children are present.

Starting Jan. 1, Texas will restrict smoking in foster parents' homes at all times and in cars when children are present, says Darrell Azar of the Department of Family and Protective Services.

Vermont, Washington and other states and counties already prohibit foster parents from smoking around children in their homes and cars.

Arkansas and Louisiana passed laws this year forbidding anyone from smoking in cars carrying young children. Courts are ordering smoke-free environments in custody and visitation disputes.

“We are very rapidly moving to protect children from secondhand smoke,” says John Banzhaf, executive director of Action on Smoking and Health. “Even from their own parents and grandparents.”

Former surgeon general Richard Carmona said in June that children exposed to secondhand smoke suffer an increased risk of respiratory ailments and sudden infant death syndrome.

Most smoking bans apply to workplaces and spots like bars and restaurants.

Smokers' rights groups liken banning smoking in private to the “Salem witch hunt,” says Gary Nolan, spokesman for The Smoker's Club, Inc. He says secondhand smoke is not dangerous. “If we don't reverse this, they'll be telling us what we can eat and what we can feed our children,” Nolan says.

Former smoker Bob Mathis, a Democratic state representative in Arkansas, sponsored a law that bars smoking in a car carrying a child young enough to require a car seat. It took effect in July. A violator can be fined $25 but can get out of it with proof of participation in a smoking-cessation program. A similar law took effect in Louisiana in August.

“We have laws on the books in every state of the union against child abuse,” Mathis says. “This is a form of child abuse.”

At least six states and some counties prohibit foster parents from smoking when foster children are present, says Kathleen Dachille, director of the Legal Resource Center for Tobacco Regulation, Litigation & Advocacy at the University of Maryland School of Law. “There are times when it's appropriate to regulate what people can do in their home,” she says. “The state is responsible for that child.”

Some courts are ordering parents in custody and visitation disputes not to smoke around their kids.

Initially, courts considered restrictions when children had ailments such as asthma that are exacerbated by smoke, says Linda Elrod, a law professor and editor of Family Law Quarterly. Now, they're more willing to restrict smoking even when there are no obvious health problems, she says. It generally comes up when one parent complains about the other's smoking.

Prosecution Finishes Argument In US Smuggling Deaths Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099017

(AP) - HOUSTON-A prosecutor on Monday described the truck driver at the center of America's deadliest human smuggling attempt as a "vile and heartless person" who ignored the pleas of the illegal immigrants stuffed in his trailer as the temperature inside rose.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors in closing arguments that Tyrone Williams, a Jamaican citizen, was concerned only with getting paid, not the welfare of the illegal immigrants he was transporting during the failed 2003 smuggling attempt. Nineteen people died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

Williams' attorney, Craig Washington, acknowledged Williams is guilty of transporting illegal immigrants, but he insisted Williams never meant to hurt them.

Rodriguez said Williams failed to turn on his vehicle's air conditioning, which would have prevented the deaths. When Williams found out his passengers had punched holes through the trailer's back doors in an attempt to get fresh air and call for help, his only concern was getting more money to pay for the damage, Rodriguez said.

During his closing statements, Rodriguez showed the jury crime scene photos of the 19 victims.

"This government takes no pleasure in showing you these horrific photos," Rodriguez said. "These deceased individuals can only testify through these photos."

Williams is charged with 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting illegal immigrants. He faces a possible death sentence if convicted.

Authorities say Williams was part of a smuggling ring that tried to transport more than 70 illegal immigrants from Mexico, Central America and the Dominican Republic in his airtight tractor-trailer from South Texas to Houston in May 2003.

Washington blamed Abel Flores, a member of the smuggling ring, for overstuffing the trailer. Washington said Williams did not know the immigrants were dying until one spoke to him in English, long after the journey had begun.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston, after the immigrants succumbed to the deadly heat inside.

Prosecutors argued Williams ignored the immigrants' cries for help during the four-hour trip. The immigrants' body temperatures went from their normal 98.6 degrees Fahrenheit (37 Celsius) to as high as 113 degrees F (45 C).

Survivors testified they could not understand how Williams did not hear or feel as the immigrants desperately banged on the trailer's walls and shouted.

Fatima Holloway, a woman who rode in the cab with Williams, testified he did not respond to her pleas to free the immigrants.

Williams' defense attorney, Craig Washington, countered his client could not hear the immigrants' cries from the packed trailer until it was too late.

Washington also argued Williams did not know other smuggling ring members overfilled his stifling trailer.

Several survivors called by Williams' attorneys testified the air conditioning unit was turned on during the trip.

Washington tried to discredit Holloway's testimony by highlighting inconsistent statements she made to authorities about the smuggling attempt.

A jury convicted Williams last year on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on 20 other counts. However, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the decision, saying the verdict did not count because the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Williams, 35, who lived in Schenectady, New York, is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty.

So far, seven people have been sentenced to prison in the case. Sentencing for three others is pending. Charges against two were dismissed, and one man remains a fugitive.

Police Informant Denies Buying Drugs At Elderly Woman's Home (CNN)

CNN.com, November 28, 2006

ATLANTA, Georgia (CNN) -- An informant cited in a search warrant as having purchased narcotics at an elderly Atlanta woman's house denies buying drugs there, authorities say.

Undercover officers raiding the 88-year-old woman's house shot her to death last week after she fired on them while they broke down her door in a high-crime neighborhood.

Federal prosecutors will investigate the case, Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington announced Monday.

Pennington said the eight-member narcotics squad that took part in the raid has been placed on paid leave while investigators look into the informant's story and the circumstances surrounding the Nov. 21 death of Kathryn Johnston. The informant also told investigators from the Atlanta police internal affairs bureau that he was told to lie about the matter, the chief said.

DOJ_NMG_0099018

"The FBI will investigate his statements, along with the police officers' statements as well," Pennington said.

Police said Johnston opened fire on police who tried to enter her home, prying off burglar bars and forcing open her door, during a "no-knock" drug raid last Tuesday. Officers returned fire, killing her.

Relatives put Johnston's age at 92, but Fulton County medical examiners said she was 88.

Neighbors and relatives said the raid had to have been a mistake. They said Johnston lived alone and was so afraid of crime in her neighborhood west of downtown Atlanta that she wouldn't let neighbors who delivered groceries for her come into her home.Reviewing 'no-knock' policy

In an affidavit used to obtain the search warrant, narcotics officers said an informant had purchased two bags of crack cocaine from a man identified only as "Sam" in the home earlier that day. Pennington said he called in federal prosecutors and the FBI after internal affairs investigators questioned the informant over the weekend.

"After we brought the informant in and interviewed that informant, he told us that he had no knowledge of going into that house to purchase drugs," he said. "That's what he told us. I don't know if he went in or not. We don't know if he's telling the truth."

Pennington said the man was being "put away in a secure place" until he could be questioned by the FBI. The chief also promised to make "every document, every witness and piece of evidence" available to investigators.

Meanwhile, the seven narcotics officers and a sergeant were put on administrative leave with pay, and the department is reviewing its use of "no-knock" raids after the shootout, he said. The warrants are common in narcotics cases when officers fear suspects may try to dispose of drugs or evidence in the time it takes authorities to gain access to the home.

In addition to the FBI and the Justice Department, the Fulton County district attorney's office and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation are taking part in the probe.

Pennington made his reputation cleaning up a breathtakingly corrupt New Orleans Police Department in the 1990s. He said the "intense speculation and suspicion" surrounding Johnston's death spurred him to call in outside agencies.

"There are many unanswered questions. I promise each and every citizen that the complete truth will be eventually known, whatever that might be," he said. "But we must all exercise patience while we examine and re-examine every single aspect of these tragic events."

A spokesman for Johnston's family, the Rev. Markel Hutchins, went to Washington to request a federal investigation Monday. Hutchins said he had received assurances that agents would conduct a "swift and thorough" investigation into the woman's death.

Hutchins said the three mid-level officials with whom he met also promised "all resources at our disposal" to help counter the fallout in the African-American community from the shooting. He said he urged the Justice Department officials to press for strong federal guidance to local police departments against the use of no-knock warrants.

McKinney: Study Police Shootings House Member Seeks Federal Investigation (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 28, 2006

U.S. Rep. Cynthia McKinney has added her voice to a growing chorus of prominent Americans concerned about a spate of high-profile police shootings, including one that killed a New York man the day of his wedding.

The congresswoman has asked the Justice Department to investigate police-involved shootings around the nation, including in her home district of DeKalb County, where police have fatally shot a dozen people this year.

"There is a belief by some citizens that the police-involved shootings are steeped in the intentional use of excessive force, even deadly force," McKinney said in a Nov. 25 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. "There definitely appears to be a developing national pattern of police misconduct and abuse resulting in an inordinately high number of serious injuries and deaths to the victims."

McKinney has also asked the House Judiciary Committee to conduct hearings on "the state of America's law enforcement agencies' use of force and deadly force and the impact on Americans on the basis of race and economic standing," her letter said.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said Monday that the shooting early Saturday of three unarmed men, in which 50 bullets were fired, was "unacceptable." Sean Bell, who died in the shooting, was to have been married later that day.

Mayor Calls 50 Shots By Police 'Unacceptable' (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell And Sewell Chan

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099019

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg convened an extraordinary meeting of black religious leaders and elected officials at City Hall yesterday to calm frayed tempers over the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man in Queens, calling the circumstances "inexplicable" and "unacceptable."

"It sounds to me like excessive force was used," the mayor said of the conduct of the officers, who fired 50 shots outside a Queens nightclub early Saturday, killing Sean Bell, 23, hours before he was to be wed, and injuring two others. "I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50-odd shots fired."

Mr. Bloomberg made the remarks after meeting with some of the city's most influential black politicians and community leaders, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, the Rev. Al Sharpton and dozens of others.

The mayor's decision to meet with Mr. Sharpton and other black leaders was a stark turnabout from the approach of Mr. Bloomberg's predecessor, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who did not reach out to black leaders in the immediate aftermath of the fatal 1999 shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant who died in a hail of 41 police bullets.

Mayor Bloomberg's blunt assessment of events still under investigation was striking, although he took pains to point out that the facts were not all in, saying several times that he did not yet know what happened in the shooting, but that he expected that a grand jury would be impaneled by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown.

In a move that suggests the officers feel their actions were justified, the lawyer representing the men said he had contacted Mr. Brown's office and offered to have the officers speak to prosecutors and appear before a grand jury voluntarily without immunity. The police have not released the officers' names, saying they are trying to protect them from retaliation or harassment.

Philip E. Karasyk, who is a lawyer for the Detectives' Endowment Association, said, "We feel confident that once all of the facts and circumstances of this tragic incident are known, then our detectives will be exonerated."

"This was a tragedy, but not a crime," he said.

Mr. Brown said in a statement that he intended to convene a grand jury to hear evidence in the case. While Mr. Karasyk has represented the four men who are detectives in the preliminary stages of the investigation, three of the four will get new lawyers, possibly as soon as tomorrow, because each must have his own and it remains unclear whether they will pursue the same strategy. The fifth man, an officer, has different representation.

Participants at the private meeting at City Hall, which included Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly and several high-ranking Bloomberg aides, described the discussions as frequently heated, with the mayor sitting next to leaders whom he counts as supporters. Those more critical of the administration's response to the shooting, including Mr. Sharpton and City Councilman Charles Barron of Brooklyn, sat on the opposite side of the table.

Mr. Bloomberg's approach of reaching out to community leaders has drawn praise, and he plans to go to southeast Queens today to meet with community leaders there. But his efforts have left some unconvinced that the underlying conflicts between the police and predominantly black communities are being addressed.

"We prefer talking than not talking, but the object is not a conversation, the object is fairness and justice," Mr. Sharpton said as he left City Hall. "Because we're not just interested in being treated politely, we're interested in being treated fairly and rightly. And that will happen when police are held as accountable as anyone else."

Mr. Bloomberg pledged to do just that, saying that the city would review its policies and training procedures to ensure fair treatment, but he added that he did not believe that the shooting was racially motivated. Of the officers who fired on Mr. Bell's car, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

"I do not at this point believe that there was anything racially motivated here, but we'll wait and see whatever the facts are," Mr. Bloomberg said. "A lot of people feel that this on top of other incidents that have happened in the past is a pattern that is unacceptable. I find that pattern unacceptable as well," Mr. Bloomberg continued, adding that he saw the shooting as an isolated case.

"There is no evidence that they were doing anything wrong," he said of the men who were shot, referring to the moments leading up to the confrontation with the police.

Some policies appear to have been violated in the shooting, which occurred when, according to the police, undercover officers fired 50 bullets at Mr. Bell's car after he drove into one of the officers and an unmarked police van.

Officers are trained to shoot no more than three bullets before pausing to reassess the situation, Mr. Kelly said in his most detailed assessment of the shooting yet. Department policy also largely prohibits officers from firing at vehicles, even when they are being used as weapons.

Although several of the leaders at City Hall expressed confidence in the mayor and the police commissioner, the emotional meeting, which began with outbursts of anger and ended calmly, laid bare some of the rifts among New York's black leaders themselves. Some expressed support for the mayor's handling of the case or refrained from criticizing him. Many, however, expressed concerns that the administration was failing to deal with what they described as continuing tensions between black residents and police officers even when the officers are not white.

"There were some heated exchanges," said the Rev. Herbert Daughtry, an influential Pentecostal minister in Brooklyn. "We all agree that there is a pattern of police abuse of power, and this abuse of power ranges from police killing to police brutal behavior to disrespect. We reiterated that over and over again."

Mr. Daughtry warned the mayor not to confuse patience with complacency. "There is a temperature in our communities that is rising, and the tension is intensifying," he said. "While we don't want to try to ignite anything, we'd be blind to overlook what's happening and not to sound the alarm."

But other leaders played down the anger in the room, saying that some participants seemed determined to bring up past history or to pursue agendas with little bearing on this specific case.

"There's always anger after incidents like this and there's always a lot of people that bring up other incidents," said City Councilman Leroy G. Comrie Jr. of Queens. "People confuse history, and specific people are concerned about their individual actions." He added: "You have different people that don't know each other, there's always room dynamics, you know, because people come in with different agendas or some people are off topic altogether."

The shooting happened as the police were undercover in the club, Club Kalua, to investigate reports of prostitution and drug dealing. There was a dispute outside between two groups of men, and one group of three or four left. One undercover officer followed them, believing they might have been going to get a gun before returning to the club. In the officers' version of events, the undercover officer confronted the men in Mr. Bell's silver Nissan Altima, and they tried to run him over, prompting the fusillade from him and his backups.

Some of the leaders expressed dismay over Mr. Kelly's revelation that one of the undercover officers had had two beers in the course of the operation inside the nightclub, but was not given a breath analyzer test. Mr. Kelly said that undercover officers are allowed the two drinks and are not normally tested for intoxication. He said they were deemed fit for duty by their superior.

While the office of Mr. Brown, the Queens district attorney, will oversee the criminal inquiry, the tactics employed by the detectives and their supervisor during the events leading up to the shooting and the shooting itself will also be reviewed by the Police Department. Several people who have been briefed on the detectives' version of events raised questions about their tactics.

For instance, they said that one undercover officer who had been inside the club without his weapon retrieved it from a police vehicle and then engaged the men in the Altima, even though that task should have been left to the backup team. Mr. Kelly said that sequence of events was unusual.

Saying there was a "grave crisis" of confidence in his southeast Queens community, Bishop Lester Williams, who was to have performed Mr. Bell's wedding, said there had been no improvement in police-community relations since the height of tensions under Mayor Giuliani.

"It's Little Iraq, I'm sorry, especially toward the blacks in the community," he said before attending the meeting. "We don't feel protected."

But others said that Mr. Bloomberg had made some progress simply by setting a new tone. "Just the simple fact of meeting, or discussion, or expressing concern and outrage on the part of this administration, was different," said Comptroller William C. Thompson Jr., the city's top black elected official.

Shortly after 5 p.m., many of the same black leaders who had attended the meeting with Mr. Bloomberg went to a briefing at the Queens County Courthouse with Mr. Brown.

Mr. Bell's fiancée, Nicole Paultre, 22, the mother of their two daughters, arrived with her father and Mr. Bell's mother, Valerie, and uncle.

Nearly two hours later, Mr. Sharpton and Mr. Bell's family left, pushing past reporters without saying anything. Several other civic leaders said the meeting had been emotionally difficult, with Ms. Paultre and Ms. Bell bursting into tears. The civic leaders declined to discuss the meeting's specifics, but said they were satisfied with what they had heard.

While officials met and discussed the case, Mr. Bell's father, William, 53, stood by his house on a quiet, suburban street near Cambria Heights and said that they were all missing the point.

"It's more about politics than human life," he said. Mr. Bloomberg has spoken with Sean Bell's fiancée and said he plans to visit the family soon, but William Bell said none of the officials had reached out to him.

"At least they could say 'I'm sorry,' " he said. "Say 'I'm sorry, I'm going to find out what's going on.' "

"He's gone," he said of his son. Then, patting over his chest, he added, "Not here in my heart he's not gone, but he's gone."

N.Y. Mayor Calls Shooting 'Inexplicable' (WP)

By Michael Powell And Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099021

NEW YORK, Nov. 27 -- Once again a hail of police bullets has ended the life of an unarmed black New Yorker, and the city's mayor finds himself walking an uncertain line between reassuring black and Latino residents and defending his police force.

With a City Council member saying that black people are being "murdered" and some black clergy signaling their discontent with Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R), who is white, walked into a news conference Monday and spoke of his profound unease with the shooting by undercover police that claimed the life of a bridegroom on his wedding day.

"I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50 shots fired," Bloomberg said. "It sounds to me that excessive force was used, but that's up to the district attorney to find out."

In a visible symbol of Bloomberg's concern, he was accompanied by a number of prominent black pastors and politicians, including activist preacher Al Sharpton and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). The night before, Sharpton journeyed to the Community Church of Christ in the Jamaica neighborhood of Queens and vowed that he was going to "keep this in the street."

The shooting occurred early Sunday morning as an undercover officer trailed three men -- Sean Bell, 23, Joseph Guzman, 31, and Trent Benefield, 23 -- as they left a bachelor party at the Kalua Cabaret club in Jamaica. The trio had argued with two men inside the club and left, trying to avoid trouble, witnesses said.

The officer told the three men to stop, although witnesses differ about whether the officer identified himself and flashed his badge.

Bell and his friends, witnesses told the New York Daily News, feared that the undercover officer was a friend of those they had argued with and that he was carrying a gun. The men tried to pull away in their car, scraping the leg of an officer. An officer fired a shot, and four more officers pulled out their 9mm guns and began shooting.

Three bullets fatally struck Bell, a delivery man and father of two, who died just hours before his marriage ceremony was to take place.

Benefield and Guzman were injured; the latter had 11 bullet wounds. None of the three men carried a gun, and police manacled the two survivors as they lay bleeding, a fact that concerned civil libertarians.

"It's not as if people so seriously wounded were a flight risk," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "Yet they were treated as criminals for having gotten shot by the police."

Kelly offered a carefully calibrated defense, noting that the Hispanic officer who opened fire was a 12-year veteran and apparently thought the car was trying to hit him. Three of the five officers who fired shots were black or Latino.

Kelly's spokesmen released data showing that New York officers now fire 40 percent fewer shots per incident than in 1995. Police killed 30 people in 1996, compared with nine in 2005 and 10 so far this year.

Maki Haberfeld, a John Jay College of Criminal Justice professor and specialist in the use of deadly force, said she was not inclined to second-guess officers operating under stress at night. "There are distorted perceptions of time and motion, and fear and adrenaline, and it takes 20 seconds to fire 50 shots," she said. "I'm taken aback by how the mayor indicted these officers. How could he know?"

But such arguments and statistics soothed few nerves, particularly for those who live in neighborhoods with a history of frayed relations with the police. Sunday's shooting called to mind the fatal shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant, in 1999. Diallo, a peddler and student, was returning home when undercover police officers told him to stop. He panicked and officers fired 41 shots, 19 of them hitting Diallo. His death came to symbolize the unsightly underbelly of then-Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani's war on crime.

That history was very much alive in the minds of residents on the streets of Jamaica on Monday. Theirs is a prosperous lower-middle-class neighborhood with vibrant shops, the crack-fueled crime of 10 years ago a fading memory. Yet many said police officers still pat down young men for guns and stop cars with little reason.

"The demeanor when they talk to people -- they have a nasty attitude," said Wayne Johnson, 43, a car-service driver. "They'll come and see us talking on the corner and say: 'What you doing here?' They think everyone is a drug dealer."

Monique Holley, 23, attends the nearby Queensboro Community College and has passed her exam to become a police officer. Monday, she found herself struggling with second thoughts. "If I become a cop, how would people look at me? That's what I am debating today."

Bloomberg enjoys far better relations with the city's black leaders than Giuliani did. There was no more visible evidence of this Monday than the presence at the news conference of the rhetorically flammable Sharpton, who was persona non grata at City Hall throughout the Giuliani era.

African Americans, Sharpton said on a radio show after the news conference, appreciate that the city's crime drop means that their neighborhoods are safer and that many young men are alive who might otherwise have died in violent crime. But he said that peace carries an unacceptably high price tag.

DOJ_NMG_0099022

"I told the mayor, 'Yes, we want crime down. Yes, crime is higher in many of our communities than elsewhere,' " Sharpton said. "But it's worse to have to live in these neighborhoods and be afraid of the cops and the robbers."

Calls For Justice At NYC Vigil For Groom (FINDLAW/AP)

By Deepti Hajela, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-An angry crowd shouted "No justice, no peace!" Some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner. Many counted off to 50, the number of rounds that are estimated to have been fired by police at three unarmed men, killing one on his wedding day.

Several hundred people gathered Sunday for a vigil and rally to demand answers about why officers let fly a flurry of bullets at 23-year-old Sean Bell early Saturday, hours before he was supposed to marry the mother of his two young children.

The five officers were placed on paid administrative leave and stripped of their guns, said Paul Browne, chief spokesman for the NYPD. Police and prosecutors promised a full investigation.

But none of that stemmed the fury of a community outraged by the shootings.

"We cannot allow this to continue to happen," the Rev. Al Sharpton said at the gathering outside Mary Immaculate Hospital, where one of the two wounded men was in critical condition. "We've got to understand that all of us were in that car."

Relatives of the men, including Bell's fiancee, attended the vigil and rally but none spoke publicly.

Some in the crowd called for the removal of Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly, yelling "Kelly must go!"

Kelly has said that police shot at the car after it drove forward and struck an undercover officer and an unmarked police minivan. The information was based on interviews with witnesses and two officers who did not fire their weapons, he said.

But a witness account emerged Monday disputing that version of events.

Trini Wright, a dancer at the strip club where Bell's bachelor party was held, told the Daily News she was going to a diner with the men and was putting her makeup bag in the trunk of their car when the police minivan appeared.

"The minivan came around the corner and smashed into their car. And they (the police) jumped out shooting," Wright, 28, told the newspaper for Monday editions. "No 'stop.' No 'freeze.' No nothing."

Kelly had said Saturday the police department was still piecing together what happened and that it was too early to say whether the shooting was justified. He said it was unclear whether the officers, who were in plain clothes, identified themselves before firing.

On Sunday, Browne said, "We are continuing to look for additional witnesses to shed light on the incident and assisting the district attorney's office with its investigation."

Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Kelly planned to meet with community leaders at City Hall on Monday. Bloomberg and his aides were in contact with Bell's family and community leaders throughout the weekend.

The shootings occurred after 4 a.m. Saturday outside the Kalua Cabaret in Queens. Kelly said the incident stemmed from an undercover operation by seven officers investigating the club.

Bell was struck twice. The survivors were Joseph Guzman, 31, who was shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, who was hit three times. Guzman was in critical condition Sunday and Benefield was stable.

The officers' shots struck the men's car 21 times. They also hit nearby homes and shattered windows at a train station, though no residents were injured.

Police thought one of the men in the car might have had a gun, but investigators found no weapons. It was unclear what prompted police to open fire, Kelly said.

According to Kelly, the groom was involved in a verbal dispute outside the club, and one of his friends referred to a gun.

An undercover officer walked closely behind Bell and his friends as they headed for their car. As he walked toward the front of the vehicle, the car drove forward, striking the officer and minivan, Kelly said.

The officer was apparently the first to open fire, Kelly said. He had served on the force for five years. One 12-year veteran fired his weapon 31 times, emptying two full magazines, Kelly said.

In total, it is believed 50 bullets were fired, he said. It was the first time any of the officers, all of whom carried 9 mm handguns, had been involved in a shooting, he said.

At some point, Bell backed the car onto a sidewalk, hitting a building gate, police said. He then drove forward, striking the police vehicle a second time, Kelly said.

The police department's policy on shooting at moving vehicles states: "Police officers shall not discharge their firearms at or from a moving vehicle unless deadly force is being used against the police officers or another person present, by means other than a moving vehicle."

DOJ_NMG_0099023

The police officers' group 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care said it was issuing a vote of no confidence in Kelly over the shooting.

Community leaders planned a rally Dec. 6 at police headquarters.

This isn't the first time the NYPD has come under scrutiny over officer-involved shootings.

In 1999, police killed Amadou Diallo, an unarmed immigrant from Guinea in western African who was shot 19 times. The four officers in that case were acquitted of criminal charges. And in 2003, Ousmane Zongo, a native of Burkina Faso in western African, was hit four times, twice in the back.

50 Bullets And A Death In Queens (NYT)

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Much has changed in New York since Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant, was killed in a hail of 41 bullets fired by city police officers in 1999. Mr. Diallo's death sent racial tensions in the city nearly to a boiling point — helped along by Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who regularly shunned meetings with black leaders and failed to treat the crisis with the urgency it required.

Now Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his police commissioner, Raymond Kelly, are dealing differently with their own Diallo-style disaster. Police officers firing 50 rounds early last Saturday killed Sean Bell, an unarmed man who was to have married his high school sweetheart later in the day. The mayor and the commissioner moved quickly to answer questions and to hear the concerns of the victim's family and the community. But their responsiveness will not bring back Sean Bell. The challenge here is far greater than good communications.

The officers who killed Mr. Bell were part of a sting operation at a Queens nightclub suspected of narcotics, prostitution and weapons violations. According to published reports, the officers have said that as Mr. Bell and his friends left the club and headed toward their car, an undercover detective heard one of them say he was going to get a gun. They also reportedly said that when the men entered the car, the detective pulled his gun and identified himself, but the car suddenly gunned forward, hit him in the shin and then struck an unmarked police minivan. The officers then opened fire.

The tragedy may simply involve two sets of very frightened men who reacted instinctively to what they thought was imminent danger. But only one of the sets was armed. There was no gun in the car, nor on the shooting victims, who sat helpless inside while five police officers began firing 50 rounds at them. One emptied his gun, a 9mm semiautomatic, reloaded and emptied it again, accounting for 31 rounds. The shooting appears to have been frantic, with bullets shattering windows as far away as the AirTrain station, hundreds of yards from the scene. Two of Mr. Bell's companions were injured; miraculously, there were no other casualties.

Unlike the Diallo tragedy, the officers involved in the Queens shooting were not all white. They were also not inexperienced. The first bullet came from an officer with five years on the job, and the detective who fired the 31 rounds had 12. But it is hard to explain their actions as anything but panic.

Police rules mandate that an officer pause after firing three rounds to assess the situation. If the shooters had followed procedures, they might have seen there was no threat before it was too late. Mayor Bloomberg has rightly called for a quick and impartial investigation. The officers must be held accountable for what has happened. But the Police Department must also confront the fact that a disaster that everyone swore to prevent seven years ago has repeated itself in Queens.

Which Officer Shot Girl Can't Be Known (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

Probe fails to find definitive evidence. The toddler was killed as her father held her in a gun battle with police.

So many bullets were discharged during a siege last year at a South Los Angeles auto shop that investigators cannot determine which LAPD officer fired the shot that killed 19-month-old Suzie Peña, Chief William J. Bratton said Monday.

The finding, which follows a 15-month investigation that used outside weapons experts, complicates the Police Commission's task today in deciding whether the officers should be disciplined.

Suzie Peña was shot twice as her father held her in front of him as he exchanged gunfire with Los Angeles police officers in July 2005. The fatal shot hit Suzie in the head but did not lodge there. Investigators could not determine which of the bullet fragments they found had hit her.

Her death set off a debate about Los Angeles Police Department tactics, prompting investigations by the FBI and the Los Angeles County district attorney's office and calls for better rules on how SWAT officers respond to hostage standoffs.

Bratton described the investigation as one of the most complex in the department's history. It involved microscopic analysis of about 130 bullets and more than 100 casings involving 13 firearms, and more than 80 interviews of witnesses and 36 DNA tests.

"The issue is, can we with any definitiveness determine who fired the fatal shot," Bratton told The Times. "The subsequent investigation has not been able to make a more definitive determination. That's unfortunate, but that's pretty much where we are with it."

Figuring out which of 13 officers who fired shots actually killed Suzie is a key question both for the LAPD and the family's attorneys, who are suing the department. By identifying the officer, they could determine where he or she was standing, figure out his or her vantage point, and assess whether proper tactics were used.

The Police Commission will decide today whether any of the officers involved in the standoff violated department policies. Without being able to link Suzie's death to a specific officer, however, officials said, it would be difficult to build a case against any individual.

LAPD sources who are familiar with the investigation said the detectives who examined the incident broke it down into three distinct stages that the commission will examine.

It began when Jose Raul Peña's 16-year-old stepdaughter called police to say that her father had a gun and was threatening to kill her. Officers responded, and during a brief gun battle with Peña were able to rescue the stepdaughter from the auto shop. The sources said investigators examined whether any officer failed to follow policy by initiating a crossfire in the direction of other officers.

The second segment occurred more than two hours into the standoff when an officer on top of an LAPD armored vehicle shot at Peña as the gun-wielding man held Suzie. Commissioners are expected to examine who gave the authority to fire, the sources said.

The final segment occurred when officers decided to storm the auto store. The officers found themselves in a small interior office of the shop, firing at Peña as he shot at them, Suzie still in his arms. One SWAT officer, Daniel Sanchez, was wounded; Suzie and her father were killed.

Sources said investigators were looking at why police decided to enter the building. In the days after the shooting, LAPD officials said they moved in because they thought that Peña was perhaps incapacitated.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the probe publicly, said it was possible that the commission could find some of the tactics used by the officers violated policy while upholding their actions in Suzie's death.

In an interview Monday, Bratton declined to reveal his recommendation to the commission.

He said it may be hard for some to understand how the investigation was unable to identify Suzie's shooter.

"Everybody likes closure, likes completion. Sometimes you are not able to get there," Bratton said. "We will not be able to make that determination. We have no ability to make a determination as to who fired that [fatal shot]."

The Police Commission is one of several panels and agencies looking into the Peña case. The district attorney's office plans to announce today whether it will file criminal charges related to the girl's death. The FBI and an LAPD board of inquiry also are reviewing the standoff.

At least four officers were carrying rifles. All of the rifle bullets were fired close to Peña and his daughter.

The complexity of the case "had to do with the sheer size of the incident, the number of officers, the number of shooting officers, the number of rounds fired, the circumstance," Bratton said.

Whatever the outcome of the commission meeting, Bratton said, Suzie's father was solely responsible for her death as authorities have said that Peña used his daughter as a "human shield" against officers.

"He's the one who set that whole chain of events in motion," Bratton said. "All the actions that day were precipitated by Mr. Peña's actions. The death of that young child is totally in his hands."

Bratton also defended his department's investigation. "I'm very comfortable, based on my review, that they did an outstanding job on the investigative portion of it and the Police Commission will have a lot of information to work with in terms of making their final recommendations," he said.

Luis Carrillo, an attorney for the child's mother, said he was suspicious about the LAPD's inability to identify where the shot that killed the toddler came from. He alleged that officers moved the child's body, interfering with efforts to trace the trajectories of bullets.

Carrillo has filed a lawsuit — seeking damages and a change in LAPD policies — against the city.

"It is important to know who fired that bullet," he said.

Supreme Court Debates Deadline For Pay-discrimination Claims (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, November 28, 2006

Employees must complain about pay discrimination within six months or forfeit their claim, the Supreme Court was told Monday in a case closely watched by companies and civil rights groups.

Justices engaged in a lively but inconclusive debate about how to apply a 180-day deadline for complaining about discriminatory pay decisions under Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Lilly Ledbetter sued Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., claiming that after 19 years at the company's Gadsden, Ala., plant, she was making $6,000 a year less than the lowest-paid man in the same job.

Ledbetter claimed the disparity existed for years and was primarily a result of her gender. A jury agreed, but an appeals court overturned the verdict.

Lawyers for Goodyear and the Bush administration argued against her claim.

Glen Nager, Goodyear's attorney, said the appeals court was correct.

"Bring that claim or lose it," he said.

Justice Department lawyer Irving Gorenstein said if the court were to side with Ledbetter, "it would undo the statute of limitations in pay cases."

But Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin Russell, told the justices that each smaller paycheck should be treated as a new act of discrimination.

Eight justices joined in the questioning. Justice Clarence Thomas was, customary for him, silent, but he could play a pivotal role in deciding the case.

Thomas once was chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is responsible for investigating workplace discrimination claims.

Applying the 180-day deadline to decisions made years ago makes no sense in a situation in which the disparity grew over time, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

Early on, "there is no reason to think there is going to be this inequality," she argued.

But Chief Justice John Roberts was skeptical that employees could "challenge the discrimination 15 years later."

Ledbetter was initially awarded more than $3.8 million. A judge reduced the award to $360,000.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict. The appeals court said Ledbetter mainly was complaining about decisions made by her supervisors long ago, well after the deadline for raising allegations of discrimination.

In Ledbetter's appeal to the Supreme Court, her lawyers said each paycheck represented a violation of civil rights law by Goodyear, even if the lower pay resulted from discriminatory decisions made years earlier.

"Under the court of appeals' rule, an employee is condemned to perpetually unequal pay for equal work unless she recognizes and complains about the discrimination within a few short months after it first begins," Ledbetter's lawyers said in a court filing.

Supporting Ledbetter, the NAACP, AARP and other rights groups said employers would not suffer any consequences for recurring discrimination if they could rebuff allegations merely by arguing the deadline for complaining about the first episode passed.

Goodyear denied discriminating against Ledbetter. She received periodic raises despite being ranked near the bottom of her group of workers, the company said.

"Title VII requires allegedly aggrieved employees like Ledbetter to assert their intentional discrimination claims within the 180-day charge-filing period or lose them," the company told the court.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business said if the court rules for the worker in this case, employers would be subject to damages for innocent decisions made years ago that would be difficult to defend because of the passage of time.

Court Explores Complexities In Job Discrimination Case (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — Federal law prohibits discrimination on the job, requiring employers to pay their employees without regard to race, sex, religion or national origin. Many complexities lie behind that simple statement, as a Supreme Court argument on Monday made abundantly clear.

The question for the court was how to treat a discriminatory action that happened long ago, beyond the statute of limitations for the federal Civil Rights Act, but that has effects that continue to the present day. Is each new paycheck, reflecting a salary lower than it would have been without the initial discrimination, a recurring violation that sets the clock running again? Or does the passage of time, without fresh acts of intentional discrimination, render the initial injury a nonevent in the eyes of the law?

The case was brought to the court by a woman, Lilly M. Ledbetter, who worked for 19 years as a manager at a Goodyear Tire and Rubber plant in Gadsden, Ala. For years, Ms. Ledbetter was paid less than men at the same level, and by 1997, as the only female manager, she was earning less than the lowest-paid man in the department. In 1998, after an undesired transfer, she retired and filed a discrimination charge against the company with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

She took her case to federal court and won a jury award of more than $3 million in back pay and compensatory and punitive damages. Because of caps imposed by the law, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the judge reduced the award, to $360,000. But the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, in Atlanta, overturned the verdict entirely. It ruled that Ms. Ledbetter had no case because she could not show any intentional discrimination in the 180 days before she complained to the employment commission.

Other federal appeals courts, including those here and in New York, disagree with that analysis, as does the E.E.O.C. The agency has long applied what is known as the "paycheck accrual rule," under which each pay period of uncorrected discrimination is seen as a fresh incident of discrimination. So although the 180-day limit applies to discrete actions like a discriminatory refusal to hire or failure to promote, it does not, in the view of the federal agency charged with administering the statute, prevent lawsuits for the continuing effects of past discrimination in pay.

But the Bush administration has disavowed the commission's position. After the court agreed in June to hear Ms. Ledbetter's appeal, Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company Inc., No. 05-1074, the administration entered the case on the company's behalf.

Irving L. Gornstein, an assistant to the solicitor general, argued that "employees who allow the 180-day period to pass may not years later, and even at the end of their careers, challenge their current paychecks on the grounds that they are the result of a number of discrete, individually discriminatory pay decisions that occurred long ago."

When Justice Antonin Scalia asked, "Why should we listen to the solicitor general rather than the E.E.O.C.?" Mr. Gornstein acknowledged that the commission "has taken a different position," one that he said was based on a misunderstanding of a Supreme Court precedent.

Ms. Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin K. Russell, said it was often difficult for employees to learn that their pay was discriminatory. Employees who receive regular raises, Mr. Russell said, may well not realize that the raises were smaller than they should have been.

"It's only when the disparity persists," he said, "when the different treatment accrues again and again and the overall disparity in the wages increases, that the employee has some reasonable basis to think that it's not natural variation in the pay decisions but actually intentional discrimination."

Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer appeared most sympathetic to Mr. Russell's argument. Justice Breyer commented at one point that "there will be probably a significant number of circumstances where a woman is being paid less, and all she does is for the last six months get her paychecks and she doesn't really know it because pay is a complicated thing." It could take "even a year for her to find out," he said.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. appeared the most skeptical, several times raising the question of how employers could shoulder the burden of defending long-ago pay decisions.

"It could be 40 years, right?" Chief Justice Roberts asked Mr. Russell, adding, "I mean, if it happened once 20 years ago, you have a case that you can bring" under the plaintiff's analysis.

The Goodyear lawyer, Glen D. Nager, noting that the statute required proof of intentional discrimination, said the basic point was that "no one at Goodyear took Miss Ledbetter's sex into account" in the salary she was paid in the 180 days before she filed her complaint.

The law does not permit the accusation "that there is discrimination today merely because there was discrimination yesterday," Mr. Nager said, adding that when the "filing period passes and no charge is brought, the employer is entitled to treat that past act as if it was a lawful act."

Justice David H. Souter asked, "Is that so even if they know it was in fact originally an unlawful act?"

"Yes," Mr. Nager replied.

EEOC Seeks To Block Sidley Discovery Bid In Former Partners' Age Discrimination Case (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 28, 2006

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is suing law firm Sidley Austin for allegedly demoting around 30 partners on the basis of age, is seeking to block discovery concerning the subsequent job performance of several of the former partners, as well as the mental health of one.

Chicago-based Sidley has denied having a mandatory retirement policy and claims that the partners at issue were demoted in 1999 due to performance factors, including low billable hours and poor business development skills. The firm is hoping to show that new employers encountered similar performance from demoted partners who left Sidley.

But in a motion for a protective order filed Nov. 17 in Chicago federal court, the EEOC asked that Sidley be denied discovery relating to the billable hours, equity status and business development efforts of six former partners now working at other firms. The agency, which is arguing that performance reasons for the demotions were pretextual, called the information sought by Sidley "not relevant to any disputed fact" in the case.

"Evidence concerning the Former Partners' hours, billings, business development and time devoted to specific clients at the Subsequent Firms would not have any tendency to prove or disprove whether such factors actually motivated Sidley's decision to change Former Partners' status in 1999," the EEOC said in its motion before Judge James Zagel of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

The agency, which has agreed to stipulate that Sidley's records concerning billable hours and other performance metrics are accurate, also highlighted a potential hazard to former partners of permitting the firm to seek such records from those partners' current firms.

"The Subsequent Firms of several of the Former Partners are not aware of the circumstances under which these Former Partners' employment at Sidley ended," the EEOC said in its motion. "Disclosure of those circumstances would cause great embarrassment to these Former Partners and would likely cause substantial damage to these Former Partners' careers and professional reputations."

The agency also asked the judge to block Sidley from deposing "Partner A" about his mental health and history of mental health treatment. The EEOC said Sidley had previously said mental health problems Partner A experienced in 1993 had nothing to do with his demotion six years later and should not now be able to assert otherwise.

"Other than simple harassment, no purpose would be served by an inquiry into Former Partner A's present or former state of mental health or treatment history," the agency argued.

In its opposition to the EEOC's motion, Sidley, represented by Chicago's Grippo & Elden, argued that the information about the partners' subsequent performance was highly relevant to countering the EEOC's claim that performance issues were a mere pretext for age-based discrimination.

"Many of the putative claimants clearly and undeniably had below-average hours and billings for partners with their experience," the firm said in its opposition. "Sidley has identified those below-average hours and billings as contributing to Sidley's decision to change the putative claimants' status.

"The EEOC and the putative claimants may attempt to attribute those below-average hours and billings to something other than lack of effort or talent, but a similar experience at the putative claimants' subsequent law firm will belie such an argument," Sidley continued.

Most of Sidley's argument concerning its questioning of Partner A was redacted from public documents, but the firm did say in its opposition to the EEOC's motion that the discovery it was seeking was "obviously relevant."

HIGH-PROFILE LAWSUIT

The EEOC's suit against Sidley, filed in January 2005 after a five-year investigation, has received widespread attention in the legal profession because law firm partners have traditionally been considered employers exempt from anti-discrimination laws. The agency is taking the novel position that Sidley's highly centralized management structure, in which an unelected executive committee made almost all major decisions, rendered most partners at the firm employees.

But the suit's high profile has also raised fears that embarrassing information about the partners at issue may come to light, despite the issuance of a number of protective orders. Several of the demoted partners have asked the EEOC to sever them from the case out of concern that such information will be publicly disclosed. The EEOC, which is seeking millions of dollars in back pay for the former partners, has refused such requests on the grounds that only the agency itself and none of the demoted partners is an actual party to the case.

According to a partial transcript of a hearing held Oct. 6, Zagel noted the unwilling participation in the matter of several of the former partners, saying that "perhaps no single individual whose case is being pled by the EEOC has the slightest interest in having a case pursued for professional reasons and maybe personal ones as well."

At the same hearing, Zagel suggested he understood Sidley's need for at least some discovery concerning the partners' subsequent performance. He recalled an earlier case of his in which an employment discrimination plaintiff was allegedly fired for persistently violating minor firm procedures and earning a reputation as someone who "just doesn't follow the rules."

"Investigation of his subsequent employer established that at the subsequent employer he did the same thing, and at the employer after that he did the same thing," Zagel said at the hearing. "And I thought it did a pretty good job of destroying the pretext argument that was offered by the plaintiff, so good a job that the case settled for what was essentially a nominal amount."

But the judge also used another example to illustrate a danger for Sidley. He said: "[O]ne of the things that makes life very difficult for employers who want to raise this defense is, they may very well fire somebody because they're habitually late to work ... and then you look at all the future employees and it's a disaster for the defendant because they're never late now."

ERA Proponents Roused By A Big Change In Congress (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

The Democratic takeover of Congress should revive interest in an issue many Americans think is settled -- adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment -- as new bipartisan groups pursue the Republican-leaning states needed for its ratification.

"I think a great way to commemorate the elevation of the first woman speaker would be to elevate all women in the Constitution," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews, New Jersey Democrat and one of nearly 200 ERA proponents in the House.

Supporters say that despite advancements for women's rights since the ERA's official death in 1982 -- primarily prohibitions against sex discrimination -- the constitutional amendment is needed because women lag in career advancement and pay equity.

In 1972, for instance, the ratio of female-to-male earnings for full-time, year-round work was 58 cents on the dollar. Last year, it was 77 cents on the dollar, according to Census Bureau data.

"The equal treatment of women should be made a pillar of our society," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat. "Unlike under the previous majority, I think we will at least have a discussion of rights that should exist and that most people in fact believe are already in the Constitution."

The one-sentence ERA -- "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex" -- has been promoted since the 1920s to ensure that women are treated on an equal basis with men, especially in the workplace.

The ERA was passed by Congress in 1972 but declared dead on June 30, 1982, when only 35 of the 38 necessary states ratified it.

Now activists are working to get three more state legislatures to ratify the ERA, and they expect a Democrat-led Congress and historical precedent to ensure its enactment.

"Once the American public really wants it, it will be had," said Jennifer Macleod, national coordinator of the ERA Campaign Network.

The rationale behind this "three-state strategy" is that Congress accepted the 27th "Madison" Amendment, which concerns congressional pay increases, after a 203-year ratification period and can therefore accept more ERA ratifications even after the deadline.

To which legendary ERA opponent Phyllis Schlafly said: "I think they are dreaming. I think they're beating a dead horse."

Opponents, led by Mrs. Schlafly, founder of Eagle Forum, helped sink the ERA with warnings about a military draft for women, unisex toilets, same-sex "marriage," and loss of family and workplace protections for wives, mothers and widows.

The ERA has its veteran supporters, such as the National Council of Women's Organizations. But in recent years, at least two new groups have emerged with the mission of getting three more state ratifications.

The two new groups are purposefully bipartisan, recognizing that Republican ERA support is a necessity: Of the 15 unratified states, Illinois is the lone "blue" state; the other 14 are "red" states that sweep from the Carolinas through the South, and into the West, with Arizona and Utah. The most vigorous ERA campaigns are in Florida, Missouri and Illinois.

"It's a myth" that Republicans don't support the ERA, said Idella Moore, who founded www.4ERA.org in Atlanta in early 2003.

Republicans have a long history of "doing the right thing" -- they're the party of the Emancipation Proclamation and a Republican cast the deciding vote for women's right to vote, said Lynn Fountain, a Georgia research scientist, Republican voter and board member of www.4ERA.org.

DOJ_NMG_0099029

The Nov. 7 midterm elections showed that Republicans "don't have a very good image" with women right now, she said. "Wouldn't you like to fix that?"

Ms. Macleod of the 6-year-old ERA Campaign Network in New Jersey said her group is strongly bipartisan, but she agreed that a new Congress led by California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the first female speaker of the House, offered fresh opportunities. Under Republican-led committees, pro-ERA bills were "locked up for years," she said. New leadership "will surely make it more likely, more possible to move it ahead."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, is a leading ERA proponent, as are both Mr. Andrews and Mrs. Maloney, who also support a second strategy that calls for restarting the process completely.

Many Americans will be puzzled to hear about a new ERA battle, partly because they think the issue is over and partly because many of them think the ERA is already part of the Constitution.

For example, at least 22 states have either adopted ERAs or constitutional prohibitions against sex discrimination, according to a 2005 a Rutgers Law Journal article.

The death of the ERA was celebrated in June 1982 -- it's "dead for now and forever in this century," Mrs. Schlafly told supporters, according to a 1982 Time magazine article -- and implied by the U.S. Supreme Court in October 1982, when it declined to take up an ERA-related lawsuit because the issue was "moot."

However, Ms. Moore and Ms. Macleod say if three more states ratified the ERA, Congress could certify it by a simple majority vote.

Mr. Andrews' bill addresses this point: "If three states ratified [the ERA], the courts would sooner or later get the question of whether the prior ratifications were valid. And I want the House to go on record and say, 'Yes, they are,' " Mr. Andrews said last week.

ANTITRUST:

Supreme Court Case On Baby Bells May Affect Antitrust Enforcement (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a case with implications for antitrust enforcement, the Supreme Court heard arguments on how specific a plaintiff's allegations must be to claim anticompetitive behavior.

The case springs from the decades-old legal saga that ended the Bell system telephone-service monopoly and created today's marketplace.

The 1996 Telecommunications Act gave the Bell system's regional successors, the Baby Bells, the right to sell long-distance service in return for opening their local networks to competitors. Despite Congress's expectation the law would create a competitive market, the Baby Bells have remained dominant in their respective regions.

The plaintiffs, a group of individuals who bought local telephone and Internet service since the law was enacted and represented by the class-action firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, filed suit in 2003, alleging the Baby Bells conspired to restrict entry into their territories of competitors in local telephone and Internet service. They claimed the Baby Bells, which after several mergers and name changes now include AT&T Inc., BellSouth Corp., Qwest Communications International Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc., violated the Sherman Antitrust Act, which prohibits "every contract, combination...or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce."

The plaintiffs had no direct evidence of such a conspiracy, however, and instead based their claim on circumstantial indicators of anticompetitive behavior, such as the parallel conduct of the Baby Bells in declining to compete in each other's territory and allegedly impeding other carriers from connecting to their networks. The Baby Bells argued that without more -- such as an allegation of a specific meeting in which a deal was made to restrain trade -- the case should be dismissed without allowing the plaintiffs discovery of internal documents.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure impose minimal requirements to file a lawsuit, specifying little more than that plaintiffs file "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that [they are] entitled to relief." Court rulings have interpreted the rule to require that the claim provide defendants "fair notice" of the accusation so they can respond and prepare for trial.

A federal judge in New York dismissed the suit, ruling the plaintiffs' allegations fell short of this standard. The Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, also in New York, reinstated the lawsuit, saying the evidentiary test applied by the trial court was better suited at a later stage of proceedings -- summary judgment, which a party can seek after discovery and presentation of evidence -- on the grounds no reasonable jury could agree with its opponent.

The appeals court acknowledged that the ease of filing lawsuits imposed on defendants the "sometimes colossal expense of undergoing discovery" and could thereby encourage unjustified settlements to avoid trial. But the Second Circuit said "if that balance is to be recalibrated...it is Congress or the Supreme Court that must do so."

Yesterday, a lawyer for the Baby Bells, Michael Kellogg, told the Supreme Court that no recalibration was needed because existing law already required dismissal of the suit.

Several justices, however, seemed unpersuaded. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg suggested the Baby Bells were trying to rewrite a 68-year-old rule by adding evidentiary requirements to the initial claim, and Justice John Paul Stevens said "dozens" of antitrust claims were no more specific than that alleged in the Baby Bells case.

The Bush administration, siding with the Baby Bells, argued that parallel conduct was common in the U.S. economy, and that allowing antitrust suits based only on it would be too burdensome for business. Pressed by Justice Antonin Scalia, however, Assistant Attorney General Thomas Barnett agreed that some parallel conduct could be so suspicious as to be sufficient to support a claim.

But the plaintiffs' attorney, J. Douglas Richards, fared no better. Under the standard the plaintiffs favored, Justice Stephen Breyer said, half the companies in the U.S. could be sued. Adopting that position would have the Supreme Court "restructuring the economy," he said.

A decision is expected by the end of the court's term, in June.

(Bell Atlantic Co. v. Twombly)

Separately, the court refused to consider reinstating a $10.1 billion tobacco judgment against Philip Morris Inc., a unit of Altria Group Inc.

The Illinois Supreme Court last year threw out the judgment, issued by a state trial court in 2003, in a class-action lawsuit over light and low-tar cigarettes. The Illinois high court ruled 4-2 that the state-level class action wasn't allowed because Federal Trade Commission consent orders -- settlements between the federal government and tobacco companies -- have allowed tobacco companies to advertise light and low-tar cigarette products.

Yesterday's action paves the way for Altria to seek the return of a $6 billion note that secured the judgment pending appeal.

Supreme Court Presses For Answers In Baby Bell Case (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday pressed both sides in its search for how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust conspiracy lawsuit against several Baby Bell companies.

Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ), BellSouth Corp. (BLS), AT&T Inc.'s (T) SBC Communications Inc. unit, and Qwest Communications International Inc. (Q) have all been trying to block a class-action lawsuit alleging they engaged in an anticompetitive conspiracy to restrict competition in the local telephone and broadband Internet markets.

The lawsuit is still in its early stages. The companies and the U.S. Justice Department, at oral arguments on the appeal, urged the Supreme Court to set private antitrust lawsuit standards that ends the case before expensive legal discovery takes place.

"The private plaintiffs do not have the authority to pursue purely investigative complaints," said Michael Kellogg, a Washington-based attorney who represented the companies.

The justices are considering whether the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York was right to overturn a federal trial court ruling that threw the case out. The high court will specifically decide whether the plaintiffs in the case - a proposed class-action for customers since 1996 federal telecommunications law changes - must allege specific anticompetitive acts that are suspicious enough to warrant consideration for a trial.

The justices probed for how to draw a legal line between allowing a lawsuit against illegal conduct and barring one for corporate activity that simply reflects prudent business decisions not to compete in some geographic areas or with some product offerings.

Thomas Barnett, the Justice Department's antitrust chief, told the justices that plaintiffs "should not be able to survive a motion to dismiss unless it challenges a set of facts."

Barnett faced tough questioning from several justices who wanted him to justify the government's position based on antitrust rulings that have taken place since a 1986 Supreme Court ruling made it easier to stop private lawsuits before trial.

But the court was equally hard on J. Douglas Richards, the New York attorney who represented the plaintiffs. Richards told the court that the lawsuit could proceed to legal discovery without proving the allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0099031

"You don't have to prove your case in the complaint," Richards said. Instead, he said the Second Circuit was correct when it ruled more court proceedings are required before the telecommunications companies can win a dismissal.

Justice Stephen Breyer and others appeared concerned about making it too easy to bring private antitrust litigation under the Sherman Act, telling Richards at one point that upholding his position would result in the court "engaging in a major restructuring of the economy."

Prior to the Second Circuit decision, a U.S. District Court judge dismissed the case, ruling the plaintiffs hadn't shown the companies might have violated federal antitrust laws. A ruling overruling the Second Circuit and backing the trial court would likely make it harder for consumers to challenge anticompetitive activity in telecommunications and other industries. If the court upholds the appeals court ruling, companies facing similar lawsuits would likely face higher litigation costs as they fight in court to get class-action conspiracy suits thrown out.

Supreme Court Hears Telecom Antitrust Case (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, November 28, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer on Monday didn't seem too impressed with the notion that competitors taking similar actions is enough to file a lawsuit charging antitrust violations.

"If you're right," Breyer told J. Douglas Richards, attorney for respondent William Twombly, who filed a class action against Bell Atlantic Corp. and the rest of the telecommunications companies, "I guess we can engage in a major restructuring of our economy."

Twombly charged the phone companies had violated the Sherman Act -- which prohibits conspiracies -- by agreeing not to compete outside the regions in which each was essentially the dominant phone provider. The proof that there was an actual agreement was a statement in the initial brief that said that the same decision by all the companies was contrary to the interest of the firms, Richards told the court.

"Conduct against self interest is a way [for the court] to infer a violation" of the Sherman Act, Richards said.

But he was having a hard time arguing with eight justices who appeared incredulous and at times jockeyed for a chance to ask more questions, with only Justice Clarence Thomas remaining apart from his querulous brethren.

"You have a suspicion and you want to use the discovery process to see if that is true, isn't that the case?" Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg asked Richards.

The high cost of discovery, which would trigger class actions that businesses would have to settle rather than litigate, is the big fear of the various companies and individuals filing friend of the court briefs in this matter, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, The Commonwealth of Virginia and 15 other states, a group of economists, and MasterCard International Inc.

Without a clear statement of the actual illegal acts in the pleading, the courts would be clogged with antitrust lawsuits, according to several parties who filed friends of the court briefs in the matter, including the government. And antitrust cases, unlike any other type of law, permit courts to triple the damages.

Breyer, a former antitrust professor, pressed each of the lawyers before him to clarify how an antitrust complaint could be written, while still consistent with the standards of federal "notice pleading," which simply requires enough information to make it clear why the defendant is being sued, and state a claim.

Michael Kellogg, who represented the phone companies, told the court the pleadings couldn't be vague, and Assistant Attorney General Thomas Barnett went farther, arguing the pleadings needed to specify a place and time for any illegal agreement.

"Parallel activity is ubiquitous in our society," Barnett said as he argued the case for the government. He explained that "the facts need to demonstrate some unlawful action."

Scalia seemed to agree, and said this process of making decisions about competition affects "every business, every day."

Barnett seemed to get nods from justices, while heads were shaking as Richards suggested that economists should be allowed to prove the correct decisions corporate executives should make about competition.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts leaned forward in his chair to say, "companies get proposals all the time. They don't have to do everything that is in their economic self interest, do they?"

"Life is short," Roberts said, and so some companies would limit investments or growth opportunities, because you can't do everything. In that case, how do the companies prove they just made decisions on their own without entering into an agreement?

"They have to document all of that," Richards said, as his time expired.

Supreme Court Considers Whether Local Telephone Antitrust Case Should Proceed (AP)

Associated Press
AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court pressed both sides Monday in the opening arguments of a case that businesses of all stripes care deeply about: how hard should it be to get evidence that a company might be violating antitrust laws?

The case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, with some experts citing it as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years.

The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, including airlines, credit card issuers and trade associations representing the wireless communications and pharmaceutical industries, all of whom have submitted or signed onto friend-of-the-court briefs.

The plaintiff in this case is represented by Milberg Weiss, known for its class-action lawsuits alleging securities fraud against major corporations. The firm filed a lawsuit in 2003 on behalf of William Twombly and all individuals in the continental United States who bought local telephone and Internet service between February 1996 and the present.

The suit alleged that the incumbent local telephone companies, or "Baby Bells," illegally conspired to prevent competition by excluding new local phone companies from their territories and agreeing not to compete against each other in each other's markets.

As part of the original court-ordered breakup of AT&T in 1982, seven regional telephone companies were created to provide local service. The 1996 Telecommunications Act allowed those "Baby Bells" to offer long-distance calling, in addition to local service, in exchange for allowing competitors access to their networks.

The original seven incumbent local phone companies have been reduced to four through mergers and acquisitions: Verizon Communications Inc., which was formed by the merger of Bell Atlantic and GTE in 2000; BellSouth Corp.; Qwest Communications International Inc., which bought Pacific Bell; and AT&T, which was bought by local phone provider SBC Communications.

A federal district court dismissed Twombly's case, finding that Twombly did not allege sufficient facts to indicate that a conspiracy would likely be proven during a trial. But Twombly argued that a conspiracy could be inferred from the so-called "parallel conduct" or behavior of the defendants.

The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court, however, finding in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a "short and plain statement of the claim" and not a detailed set of facts in order to survive a motion to dismiss.

The Baby Bells appealed to the Supreme Court. A low standard, corporations say, would enable "meritless" and "abusive" cases to go forward, forcing many businesses to settle those cases rather than endure the expense of litigation, including the discovery process in which defendants must produce documentation of certain facts for the plaintiff.

Under the standard upheld by the appeals court, "you can go sue half the firms in the economy," Justice Stephen Breyer said Monday.

A higher standard, however, could make it too difficult for individuals to bring valid antitrust cases, Twombly argued, because the only way a plaintiff can get evidence of an agreement among companies to restrict competition is through the discovery process.

If antitrust cases are dismissed too quickly, evidence of such agreements will rarely end up in the hands of plaintiffs, Twombly argued.

Twombly's attorney also said that the telephone companies' refusal to compete against each in each other's territories went against their economic self-interest, which could imply a conspiracy.

Justice John Paul Stevens pressed Michael Kellogg, the attorney arguing the case for the phone companies, on why such allegations were not sufficient for the case to continue.

"How you can say this is not a statement of fact I find mind-boggling," Stevens said.

Shares of the telecommunications companies were mixed in afternoon trading. Verizon Communications dropped 51 cents, or 1.47 percent, to close at $34.24 on the New York Stock Exchange and Qwest fell 19 cents to finish at $7.56 on the NYSE. Meanwhile, AT&T rose a penny to end at $32.68 on the New York Stock Exchange on the NYSE while BellSouth closed down 19 cents at $42.50 on the NYSE.

The case is Bell Atlantic Corporation v. Twombly (05-1126).

Business Set For Antitrust Legal Victory (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington
Financial Times, November 28, 2006

Big business appears likely to score a significant legal victory in the US Supreme Court, after a majority of the justices yesterday seemed unwilling to tip the balance of power toward plaintiffs' lawyers in antitrust lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0099033

The court yesterday heard oral arguments in a case where US consumers are trying to force greater competition in local telephone markets. The plaintiffs in the case, Bell Atlantic v Twombly, have brought a lawsuit alleging that some of America's biggest telephone companies conspired to prevent competition in local telephone services, but they provided almost no detailed evidence of a conspiracy.

Yesterday a majority of the justices appeared unwilling to let the case proceed. Some said it would make it too easy for plaintiffs to allege conspiracy in antitrust cases.

The case could be the most important antitrust case before the court in 20 years, legal sources say. Big business has won all 11 of the court's recent decisions in antitrust cases. A decision in yesterday's case is expected by June.

The case turns on the question: how high a hurdle must private plaintiffs clear to force big companies to reveal private documents that might prove they conspired with others to commit an antitrust violation?

Ruling in the case, a federal appeals court set a fairly low hurdle, arguing that federal law makes no attempt to discourage such lawsuits. But the telephone companies who are the defendants in the suit argued that such a low standard would give plaintiffs' lawyers a powerful new weapon to force big companies to settle even frivolous lawsuits, since the high cost of "discovery" - the production of documents - makes it very costly to fight such suits.

A group of eminent economists urged the justices to reject a low standard for alleging conspiracy in such cases, saying that would impose a litigation "tax" on the US economy.

* The Supreme Court declined to consider restoring a $10.1bn award against Altria Group's Philip Morris USA, in a lawsuit that alleged consumers were misled about the health risks of smoking "light" cigarettes, Lauren Foster writes from New York.

In December the Illinois Supreme Court threw out the case against the nation's largest cigarette maker. Its ruling focused on the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, the federal consumer protection watchdog, had authorised tobacco companies to describe their products as "light" or "low tar". The court found that Illinois state law precludes such suits when a federal agency has acted in this way.

Phone Companies Get Support From Supreme Court In Antitrust Case (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court signaled that it may put new limits on antitrust suits, as justices questioned the basis for claims that Verizon Communications and other local-telephone companies agreed not to compete against each other.

Verizon, AT&T, BellSouth Corp. and Qwest Communications International contend that the lawyers pressing the complaint have offered no evidence of collusion. A federal appeals court ruled against them, letting the case go forward.

In arguments Monday in Washington, members of the nation's highest court faulted the lawsuit for making only a general allegation about an illegal agreement not to compete. Several justices said the companies might have made independent decisions not to venture into each other's home territory.

"Maybe they want to get into the wireless business and think that's a better way to spend their money," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

Business groups are backing the appeal. DuPont Co., MasterCard International, Visa USA, Northwest Airlines Corp., UAL Corp., Louisiana-Pacific Corp. and several industry trade groups all signed briefs siding with the phone companies.

It's one of two antitrust cases the high court will hear this week.

On Monday, the court also is considering an employment-law dispute involving Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., the largest U.S. tiremaker.

Although a 1996 law sought to encourage new competition in the local-phone business, the largest companies have proven reluctant to challenge each other directly.

The lawsuit, being pressed as a consumer class action by lawyers at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman in New York, says the likely explanation is an illegal agreement. The suit also says the phone companies worked together to keep smaller rivals from making inroads.

DOJ_NMG_0099034

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said the suit could proceed to the "discovery" stage. That means the companies would have to answer questions about their business practices and turn over documents.

Douglas Richards, one of the lawyers pressing the suit, said the 2nd Circuit approach was a fair one because would-be antitrust plaintiffs rarely have direct evidence of an illegal agreement before filing suit.

"People don't conspire in public parks," Richards said.

Richards drew skepticism from Justice Antonin Scalia, who questioned the wisdom of subjecting the telephone companies to the expense of having to defend against the suit.

"How many buildings will have to be rented to store those documents?" Scalia asked.

Justice Stephen Breyer joined Ginsburg in asking whether parallel conduct by the telephone companies was enough to warrant letting the lawsuit go forward.

Breyer voiced surprise when Richards said consumers, without any additional evidence, could sue four neighboring gas stations that declined to lower pump prices when the cost of oil was falling.

"If you're right, I guess we can engage in this major restructuring of the economy," Breyer said.

The lawyer for the phone companies, Michael Kellogg, said the lawsuit failed to give his clients adequate notice of the basis for the claim. He said courts shouldn't accept "legal conclusions in the guise of factual allegations."

Kellogg drew opposition from Justice John Paul Stevens, who said the consumers had alleged an illegal agreement. "How you can say this is not a statement of fact I find mind-boggling," Stevens said.

Still, several members of the court said they were concerned the allegation of an agreement lacked any details, such as a time or place. Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito,

David Souter and Anthony Kennedy all peppered the Milberg Weiss lawyer with skeptical questions.

The case is a follow-up to a 2004 Supreme Court case. That ruling said consumers can't use a separate section of the antitrust laws to accuse phone companies of failing to open up their networks to competition, as the 1996 law requires. Under U.S. antitrust law, successful damage claims are automatically tripled.

San Antonio-based AT&T is the nation's largest phone company, followed by New York-based Verizon, Atlanta-based BellSouth and Denver-based Qwest. The lawsuit says those four companies control more than 90 percent of the U.S. local-phone business.

The justices will rule by July in the case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 05-1126.

Steelworkers Await Word On New Owner (PTR)

By Joe Napsha, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 28, 2006

Steelworkers at the former Weirton Steel plant are anticipating that a new owner will be announced this week, one that might restart its steelmaking facilities and add 400 jobs, a union official said Monday.

Russia's largest steelmaker, OAO Severstal, is the latest to surface as a potential buyer and is said to be in negotiations to acquire the mill, according to published reports in a Moscow newspaper.

Both Severstal and Arcelor Mittal, the current owner at Weirton, declined to comment on the report, which was in the same Moscow newspaper that recently said Severstal wanted to buy Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp.

"There have been numerous interested parties ... and hopefully we'll have an announcement in the next few days," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at Weirton. Glyptis said he had no firsthand knowledge of the Russian steelmaker's interest in acquiring the former Weirton Steel plant.

The union is expecting a deal to surface because an agreement expires today between Arcelor Mittal and the U.S. Justice Department for Arcelor Mittal to divest itself of the tinmaking plant at Weirton, or one at Sparrows Point, Md., Glyptis said.

The Justice Department reached the deal because of Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor S.A., would give it a corner on tinmaking production in the eastern region of North America. Arcelor Mittal was unable to sell Dofasco Steel of Canada, which also has a tinmaking plant.

If a deal is not reached today, Arcelor Mittal could request a 60-day extension, Glyptis said.

While the antitrust investigation into the Arcelor Mittal merger remains open, the Justice Department will not comment on the agreement, Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said yesterday. Talamona said she could not comment on whether Arcelor Mittal requested an extension.

Among the others interested in buying the Weirton plant is Esmark, a Chicago-based firm that recently purchased Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., Glyptis said. Another potential buyer is former International Steel Group executive Mitch Hecht.

"There is interest among the other parties in restarting the hot end," which would return about 400 jobs to the plant, Glyptis said. The plant employs about 1,300 steelworkers.

DOJ_NMG_0099035

Mittal Steel Co., based in the Netherlands, shut down steelmaking facilities at Weirton in November 2005, citing the high cost of raw materials, production and shipping. From that point, steel slabs from Cleveland and Sparrows Point were shipped to Weirton for tin coating.

Steel analyst Charles Bradford, of New York, questioned the validity of reports linking Severstal to the Weirton plant, noting that the company owns a Rouge Steel Co. plant near Detroit, and is building a mini-mill in Mississippi.

Instead, the Russians may be digging for information they can get from the competition, he said.

"Everybody is looking at everybody else," in this time of consolidation in the steel industry, Bradford said.

The possible restart of the steelmaking facilities at Weirton doesn't make much sense because it produces narrow slabs that make for inefficient production, Bradford said.

"I don't know why anybody would want that mill," Bradford said. "I don't think it is how much Mittal wants to sell it for. I think it's how much Mittal has to pay to sell it."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Swift Rejects Ex-CEO's Buyout (WSJ)

By Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Swift Transportation Co. rejected a $2.2 billion bid from its largest shareholder, former Chief Executive Officer Jerry Moyes, and said it will try to negotiate a higher offer from him or other parties.

Mr. Moyes is offering $29 a share for the Phoenix truckload carrier, which represented a 21% premium at the time it was made. A special committee of independent board members said the offer was inadequate.

As of 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, Swift was at $28.36, up 75 cents.

The board committee, which is being advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said it will negotiate with Mr. Moyes for a higher offer. The committee also said it has begun talks with "other potential financial and strategic buyers." The term financial buyers typically refers to private-equity firms. The term strategic buyers usually refers to corporations.

Mr. Moyes's 27.1% stake in Swift could pose an obstacle to a competing bid. In addition, Mr. Moyes, who remains a Swift director, said in a Nov. 3 letter to Chairman Jock Patton that he could be willing to pay more after going through the company's books. A Morgan Stanley unit has offered him as much as $2.74 billion in financing.

The Teamsters union, which was critical of Mr. Moyes when he ran the company, has cited analyst reports valuing Swift at $37 a share and had urged the board to reject the $29-a-share offer.

Google Prepares To Fight Antitrust Battle Over Its Search Rankings (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 28, 2006

Relegated to electronic Siberia by the Google Inc. search rankings, KinderStart.Com Inc. saw its Web traffic plummet and ad revenue evaporate, so it fought back with an antitrust lawsuit challenging Google's popular ranking system.

The 2006 suit in federal court in San Jose, Calif., has been dismissed once, and some observers say that the new amended version's antitrust and free speech claims may face an uphill battle to survive. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel indicated in an Oct. 27 hearing that he may not issue a written ruling until early next year on Google's motion to toss the case.

But the suit raises larger questions about Google's future susceptibility to antitrust claims as the ubiquitous Internet search engine gains steam.

"Google is so large it runs the risk of slamming into the kind of situation that Microsoft found itself in, in terms of bundling its services together," said Robert B. Reich, former labor secretary in the Clinton administration and now professor at the University of California's Goldman School of Public Policy.

"All this means is Google needs to be ready for litigation, even if ultimately it comes out in Google's favor. As a big dominant company playing the pivotal role it plays, it is a sitting duck for all sorts of potential litigation," Reich said.

As such a big player in the Internet industry, "not only do you become a target of antitrust plaintiffs, you also can easily use your market heft in such a way as to impose burdens, or disadvantages, on other players," said Reich.

CRITICISM MOUNTS

Others who watch the high-tech industry closely don't foresee serious antitrust clouds looming on Google's horizon.

"There is no question Google does have market power in its space," said Eric Goldman, law and technology professor at Santa Clara University School of Law in Silicon Valley. "That is a predicate" in antitrust.

"No question Google is the market leader, has the numbers and is setting the market agenda," Goldman said. "But the reality is, it is an extremely competitive market. Their market base is one click away from going to competitors."

Google's patented rating system called PageRank employs an algorithm to rank searches not just by volume of referrals but also by the value of the referring site, scoring sites in what the company says are "objective" standards.

The most valuable spots are the top 10 sites listed in any Google search results, increasing the likelihood of new visitors and more ad revenue.

Google has faced criticism recently for alleged blacklisting of automaker BMW Germany for practices Google considered spamming, which were designed to improve BMW's place in rankings. For that it was allegedly penalized.

And the company has faced other criticisms for censorship after it agreed to filter out certain Web sites that the Chinese government found objectionable. It also removes some references to Nazi paraphernalia in search results in Germany and France to comply with national laws. So far, the U.S. antitrust regulators have not had any problems with Google. The U.S. Department of Justice signed off on Google's $1.65 billion purchase of video site YouTube earlier this month.

At stake in the KinderStart suit is the claim that Google went beyond its objective standards and blocked KinderStart for anti-competitive reasons.

"KinderStart believes the blockage was intentional because KS is a competitor," said Gregory J. Yu, KinderStart's attorney with Global Law Group in San Mateo, Calif.

KinderStart is a Norwalk, Calif.-based search engine company that caters to new parents, educators and nonprofit groups with access to health, education and other material about infants and toddlers up to age 7, according to pleadings in Kinderstart.com v. Google Inc., No. C06-2057JF.

The company Web site, begun in 2000, saw a steady growth in 2005, reaching roughly 10 million page views a month, according to Yu.

But suddenly the company found itself dropped from a spot in the top 10 of Web search results to near invisibility in 2006, even though it did nothing wrong and could not find out from Google why it was backbenched, Yu said.

The suit alleges that KinderStart saw a 70 percent drop in monthly traffic in March 2006 and an 80 percent drop in AdSense revenue, the Google advertising partnership.

Google spokesman Ricardo Reyes, during three days of attempting to prescreen questions, said the company did not have time to answer specific queries, but provided a prepared statement by Hilary Ware, litigation counsel.

"Google's search results function as a recommended reading list, with Google telling users what sites it believes are most likely to be of interest to them," Ware said. "Kinderstart is suing to force Google to say what Kinderstart wants it to say about Kinderstart's site."

GOOGLE 'SLAPP's BACK

Google responded to the lawsuit with what's known as an anti-"SLAPP" motion, stating that the KinderStart claims amounted to strategic litigation against public participation. Anti-SLAPP motions seek to toss out suits that are shown to be efforts to intimidate or silence criticism of the powerful.

Google filed its anti-SLAPP motion arguing that KinderStart improperly sued Google over Google's exercise of its free speech rights, Ware said.

But in an initial June 30 court hearing, Fogel, the San Jose federal judge, put little stock in the anti-SLAPP claim. "Clearly the origins of that statute were to protect citizens who were petitioning the government for redress of grievances," he said. "I think there's a point at which commercial speech is not what the legislature had in mind," he said.

In its most recent motion to dismiss KinderStart's suit, Google's outside counsel, David Kramer of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati in Palo Alto, Calif., wrote, "Google is shielded from all liability both by the First Amendment and federal statutory immunity granted online service providers.

"Recommendations and ratings such as Google's are plainly opinions, entitled to the protections of both the First Amendment and the California Constitution."

Goldman called KinderStart's claim "laughable that they are a competitor of Google." He likened it to an indirect competitor serving a niche market, not the mass-market design at the core of Google.

The suit, fashioned as a class action, alleges Sherman Act, monopolization and antitrust violations, as well as Lanham Act false representation claims, free speech violation, defamation and unfair competition under California state law.

Yu points out Google is used in 60 percent of all U.S. search queries. In 2004, Google attained a market share based on revenues alone that exceeded 80 percent of search-related advertising revenue, according to the complaint.

Yu alleged Google's top two competitors, Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp., are losing market share in relevant markets.

But being popular and widely used isn't the same as being monopolistic.

"If you make a better mousetrap you are entitled to take over as much of the market as you want," said Robert Doyle, antitrust specialist with Doyle, Barlow & Mazard in Washington, D.C. "Google has grown and expanded because it has built a better mousetrap. It only remains questionable when a company the size of Google engages in questionable practices to maintain that position."

Reich sees the warning signs of that in Europe. He has criticized Google in the past for going to European antitrust regulators to complain about Microsoft's new Vista software containing a search button for Microsoft's MSN search engine. Reich has said Google should take care that it doesn't find itself facing similar antitrust complaints for bundled free tools such as Gmail or new small-business applications, traditionally a Microsoft mainstay.

But for purposes of the KinderStart lawsuit, Google's actions in China, France or Germany do not make the company a state actor for purposes of KinderStart's First Amendment claim. Yu's argument would be akin to considering Google a public forum, like a shopping mall, that would have to give KinderStart the access to rankings that it seeks.

"That argument is a dead loser," said Goldman. "It has been made repeatedly against online actors and has never gotten any traction in the courts," he said.

"In reality Google is a media business. They should be protected. Google does what a newspaper editor does; they decide what makes the cut for a newspaper and where to put it." He said that may give them the power to make or break companies, but that's the issue with editors in single-newspaper towns.

By contrast, Reich likened high-technology companies such as Google to telephone companies, which are common carriers. It is representing many businesses -- Internet search engines and browsers are essentially gateways to millions of businesses, he said.

But applying the common-carrier argument to Internet companies may be too radical for judges. "Antitrust hasn't clarified what common-carrier responsibility means, apart from regulated monopolies," as phone companies once were, Reich said.

Google is the economy standard for search engines and "if you can't rely on it to be absolutely neutral in terms of [search result] placement, there might very well be an argument for predatory behavior," he said.

Reich suggested such claims might be more likely to arise as Federal Trade Commission, rather than Sherman or Clayton Antitrust Act, claims.

The FTC legislation is much broader and courts in this era have been particularly reluctant to blaze new trails in antitrust, Reich said.

Goldman also warned that Google must be careful. If it is a runaway success "they may run into antitrust supervision even if it is done cleanly. It could be a victim of its own success." But he found that possibility remote.

Goldman said Google has been disingenuous about the way it markets itself as a neutral provider of technology. "It is doing more than that," he said, again comparing it to a media company. He did acknowledge the company has a "significant issue about transparency." KinderStart and others have said they don't know why their rankings tanked or how to improve their sites to get back in Google's good graces. "You don't know what's going on under the hood," Goldman said of Google's blocking practices.

High Court Case Could Imperil Pending Patents (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 28, 2006

When Kenneth Bass III clerked at the Supreme Court in 1969, his justice, the late Hugo Black, told him confidentially what he thought of patents.

"He told me that in his lifetime, he had seen only one real invention -- the airplane -- and he wasn't even certain about that one," says Bass. "He just didn't like patents."

Bass has to hope the current justices don't share that view today, when the Court takes up what he thinks could be the most important patent decision in 40 years.

Now a partner in the D.C. firm Sterne, Kessler, Goldstein & Fox, Bass is part of the legal team that will be defending a disputed patent in the case of KSR International v. Teleflex, which will be heard today. And Black would probably not like the side Bass is on.

Bass represents Pennsylvania auto-parts manufacturer Teleflex, the owner of a patent on an adjustable automobile gas pedal. Teleflex argues in favor of a controversial standard, used by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit to varying degrees for decades, that enabled Teleflex to get and keep the patent. By requiring patent challengers to produce hard evidence, the standard makes it harder to topple a patent based on the assertion that the new product was an obvious extension of prior ideas.

Critics say the standard protects even the most thinly documented patents, opening the floodgates to junk patents for minor innovations and dubious inventions. KSR lawyer James Dabney, a partner in New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver &

Jacobson, cites statistics indicating that the number of patents upheld after litigation nearly doubled, increasing from 35 percent to 67 percent, after the Federal Circuit and its standard were created.

Too many easily won patents, critics say, slow creativity and the exchange of ideas, putting "glue, not grease, into the gears of innovation," in the words of a brief by the Progress & Freedom Foundation.

But if Teleflex loses and the Supreme Court devises a less-patent-protecting standard, says Bass' co-counsel Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, it will open a very different floodgate. Because "many millions" of patents were granted under the disputed standard and patents can be challenged at any time, Goldstein says, "If the Supreme Court does decide to make a substantial change, it will call into question innumerable patents." [Goldstein is a contributor to Legal Times.]

That nightmare scenario might ordinarily make the outcome easy to predict. The Supreme Court can't possibly want to throw open millions of patents to costly and complex litigation before juries, right?

TABULA RASA

Maybe, maybe not. In part because of the Court's historic love-hate relationship with patents, as evidenced by Hugo Black's remark, the outcome is hard to predict. Some patent experts think the Court is so unhappy with the proliferation of junk patents -- and with the Federal Circuit for adopting the standard that allowed them to multiply -- that it is willing to blow up the system to fix it. Others think the justices will leave well enough alone, perhaps only fine-tuning the Federal Circuit's standard.

What makes speculating on the outcome of the case doubly difficult is that labels are hard to pin on the justices when patents are involved.

"The personality aspect is an unknown. Unlike with constitutional cases, I don't really have a clue of where the justices will come out," says Bass. "There are no schools of jurisprudential thought among the justices on this, no perception of who is pro- or anti-patent."

Perhaps because of the uncertain outcome, patent attorneys have lined up by the dozens to file amicus briefs. But because business giants can be found on both sides of the issue, some firms were conflicted out, say lawyers involved in the case. Last month, in a rare move, the Court allowed Michigan lawyer Harold Milton Jr. of Dickinson Wright to withdraw a brief he had filed with the court on behalf of Teleflex, after realizing his firm had a conflict.

In another sign of the legal community's ambivalence about the case, Stanford Law School professor and leading patent scholar Mark Lemley, in effect, switched sides. At first he joined petitioner KSR in urging the Court to review the Federal Circuit's standard. But after seeing signs of flexibility in some recent Federal Circuit rulings, Lemley changed his mind and joined a brief siding with Teleflex. He now defends the standard as "the best we've got right now."

That same sentiment, plus a desire for stability in the field, contributed to a lineup in the case that the Teleflex team points to with pride. All of the bar groups that filed briefs -- including the American Bar Association, the American Intellectual Property Law Association, and the Federal Circuit Bar Association -- sided with Teleflex in support of the existing standard.

On the other side, KSR's Dabney sniffs that "you should examine with care the professional interests" of the leaders of the bar groups, adding that "the briefs don't reflect the views of all the members." In an acidic footnote in one of his briefs to the Court, Dabney also expresses wonderment about the bar's interest in stability "in view of the enormous fees that litigation of invalid patent claims can generate."

BURDENS OF PROOF

The briefs are full of ominous predictions about the impact of the case on innovation and the overwhelmed patent system. Solicitor General Paul Clement, joining KSR in the case, says the Federal Circuit standard "imposes significant burdens" on the patent system by forcing examiners to hunt for evidence of obviousness instead of allowing them to quickly dismiss plainly weak patent applications.

But part of the background music in the case is the Court's pendulum swings throughout history on the merits and value of patents.

For most of the 19th century, says Joshua Sarnoff, head of the intellectual property law clinic at American University's Washington College of Law, "patents were a very big deal" for the Supreme Court, with the justices playing their part to foster economic expansion. In a law review article, George Washington University Law School professor John Duffy, part of KSR's legal team, noted that in 1888 the Court heard 12 days of argument, then produced an opinion upholding Alexander Graham Bell's patents on the telephone that filled an entire volume of the U.S. Reports.

In the 20th century, patent litigation went in and out of favor with the Court, in part because of the highly specialized nature of the law, and also because of the occasional anti-monopolist impulses of justices such as Black.

In the 1979 book "The Brethren," an inside-the-Court expose written by Bob Woodward and Scott Armstrong, the Court's disdain for patent cases was documented. According to the book, a 1975 patent case named Sakraida v. Ag Pro was labeled the "cow shit case" among justices and clerks, only partly because it involved the patentability of a system used to clean the floors of dairy barns.

Chief Justice Warren Burger assigned the case to his liberal nemesis, Justice William Brennan Jr., instead of John Paul Stevens, then the Court's junior justice. Brennan was insulted, according to the book, and he wrote the decision himself to spare his law clerks from the humiliation of getting involved. The ruling, which struck down the patent because of obviousness, is cited in numerous briefs in the case now before the justices.

The Court may have thought that it could wash its hands (so to speak) of patent cases entirely when Congress created the Federal Circuit in 1982 to handle appeals in patent cases and a number of other specific areas of law. In fact, until recently, it was rare for the Court to grant review in a patent case, a possible sign that it felt the circuit was handling the jurisprudence well. And when its rulings were reviewed, they were often affirmed.

But in the past four years, the Supreme Court has granted review in nine Federal Circuit cases, including two this term, and none have been affirmed so far.

Critics have hoped for years that the obviousness standard -- a threshold issue for every patent -- would get a fresh look from the high court.

The case in which the Court finally agreed to review it was an unpublished opinion issued in January 2005. At issue is a Teleflex patent issued in 2000 for an adjustable gas pedal for cars, designed to accommodate what KSR's Dabney describes as "the five percent female" -- petite-sized women who need to reach the pedal without getting too close to the steering wheel's airbag. Teleflex sued competitor KSR in the Eastern District of Michigan for patent infringement. KSR countered by challenging the validity of the patent as a too-obvious combination of existing elements. The district court agreed that at least one part of the patent was invalid because it was obvious.

But the Federal Circuit reversed, finding that KSR had not shown enough evidence that because of prior "teaching, suggestion or motivation," the patented product was an obvious development that made it undeserving of a patent.

As Patents Grow More Contentious, Battleground Shifts To High Court (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With the economy increasingly dependent on technological innovation, the Supreme Court is scrutinizing more patent rulings made by a special court that critics say has tilted too far in favor of intellectual-property rights and could be stifling competition.

The high court, which today hears arguments in one of three patent cases on this term's docket, has ruled in recent cases on the side of more flexibility in enforcing such rights. If that trend continues, it could translate into weaker protections for patent holders and promote greater access to inventions.

The Supreme Court's newfound assertiveness on core issues of patent law -- after hearing only a handful of cases in the field over 20-plus years -- comes amid a sharp debate over how to maintain American industry's competitive edge while upholding the protections that reward the risk-taking behind cutting-edge inventions.

In today's economy, for instance, many innovations -- such as software programs, drugs or advanced electronics -- are built on myriad smaller inventions. That has led to disputes between owners of component patents and those who incorporate those pieces into more complex products, leaving federal courts to delineate who owns what.

Mark Lemley, a professor at Stanford Law School and an intellectual-property litigator, says the justices are indicating "that the patent system is out of whack, and needs to be reined in."

Others see the shift as a more neutral response to changes in the marketplace. Kevin Casey, president of the Federal Circuit Bar Association, says the high court's attention reflects the increasing complexity of patent law and the importance of intellectual property to the economy. "I don't by any means think the court has an agenda," says Mr. Casey, a partner at Stradley Ronon Stevens & Young in Malvern, Pa.

To encourage innovation, patents offer the promise of monopoly on an invention's use, ensuring that patent holders reap the rewards of a useful discovery. But that is balanced against the public interest in access to worthwhile discoveries, both for their inherent utility and because today's research underpins tomorrow's inventions. For this reason, only inventions that are deemed useful, novel and nonobvious can be patented -- and patents expire after a set period, currently 20 years.

In the latest of a series of intellectual-property cases, the Supreme Court today will re-examine one of the bedrock doctrines of patent law: "obviousness." At issue is whether the design of an adjustable gas pedal was so obvious as to invalidate a patent at the heart of a dispute between two auto-parts suppliers.

More broadly, the question is whether the federal court that hears patent appeals, which was established by Congress in 1982, has set the right balance in intellectual-property rights. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit was designed to promote uniformity in several areas of specialized federal law, now including patents, trademarks, veterans' benefits, government contracts and federal civil-service claims.

Critics -- including the Bush administration in today's case -- assert that the Federal Circuit has shifted too far toward patent holders, expanding the types of inventions that can be patented and broadening the scope of monopoly a patent affords its holder. The court's defenders say the Federal Circuit was created in part to strengthen patent protections, and that it has succeeded in clarifying the law.

Any federal district court can hear a patent case, but appeals go to the Federal Circuit, located across the street from the White House in a building named for the court's first chief judge, Howard T. Markey. With the Supreme Court rarely reviewing its decisions, the Federal Circuit long had the final word in patent law.

After the Federal Circuit's creation, "the Supreme Court basically got out of patent law," Mr. Lemley says.

That has changed in recent years. The justices heard five appeals from the Federal Circuit in the past three terms -- and didn't affirm it once.

In May, the high court unanimously reversed a Federal Circuit decision that had virtually guaranteed patent holders could bar imitators from continuing to use their invention. Instead, the Supreme Court ruled that judges should consider the same factors used in other types of cases where injunctions are sought, and weigh such issues as whether royalty payments would be sufficient redress and whether the public interest would be served.

In that case, online auctioneer eBay Inc.'s "buy it now" feature had been found to infringe a business-method patent held by MercExchange LLC of Great Falls, Va.

The eBay ruling followed a June 2005 opinion in which the high court decided, again unanimously, that in some cases pharmaceutical researchers could use compounds patented by others if doing so could help develop new drugs. The justices overturned the victory a small patent holder, Integra Lifesciences I, Ltd., had won at the Federal Circuit over Merck KGaA of Germany.

Last month, the justices heard a challenge to a Federal Circuit ruling holding that if a company pays royalties to use an invention, it can't subsequently sue to invalidate the patent. At issue is whether biotechnology company MedImmune Inc. of Gaithersburg, Md., lost the right to contest a patent by agreeing to pay a royalty to Genentech Inc. of South San Francisco, Calif.

In the current term, which began last month, the justices have three patent cases from the Federal Circuit on the docket.

Critics say the Federal Circuit has fostered an expansion of patent rights that has made them both more potent and easier to obtain. The Federal Circuit's rulings have "converted patents from handguns to bazookas, and at the same time stopped requiring permits to get them," says economist Adam Jaffe, dean of arts and sciences at Brandeis University.

The Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, declined to discuss such critiques. "I'm not in the business of responding to what a few professors say," he said in an interview. But, he added, in its history the court has "added considerably greater clarity to the patent law, and a great deal more consistency and maturation to many patent doctrines."

In today's case, the high court turns to the issue of obviousness. KSR International Co., of Ridgetown, Ontario, won a contract to supply General Motors Corp. trucks with gas pedals that could be raised to meet the foot of a driver with shorter legs. Depressing the pedal activates an electronic throttle control that sends gas to the engine. The electronic sensor is attached to the pedal's support assembly and thus moved with it, unlike previous designs, which had the sensor fixed in the housing.

But rival Teleflex Corp. of Limerick, Pa., already made a similar device for trucks produced by Ford Motor Co. Teleflex claimed KSR had infringed its 2001 patent. When KSR refused to pay a royalty, Teleflex sued.

The Constitution authorizes Congress to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Patent law aims to strike a balance that provides an incentive to inventors by guaranteeing a limited-time monopoly on an invention's use, while ensuring that intellectual-property rights are flexible enough to allow research and innovation based on prior discoveries.

As a result, not everything is patentable, including discoveries that are deemed "obvious."

The Supreme Court laid out the obviousness doctrine in 1851. A patent requires more "skill and ingenuity" than that of "an ordinary mechanic acquainted with the business," the court said. The 1952 Patent Act subsequently denied patents to inventions that, in light of "prior art" in the field, "would have been obvious...to a person having ordinary skill in the art to which the subject matter pertains."

After examining other patented pedal-assembly designs, U.S. District Judge Lawrence Zatkoff ruled for KSR. "A hypothetical person with an undergraduate degree in mechanical engineering or an equivalent amount of industry experience" who was familiar with pedal systems "would have found it obvious to attach a modular pedal position sensor" to the support member, the judge wrote. Thus, the Teleflex patent "is invalid for obviousness."

On appeal, however, the Federal Circuit said Judge Zatkoff hadn't properly followed the stricter test it fashioned when an obviousness claim is based on combining prior inventions. Citing prior Federal Circuit decisions, Circuit Judge Alvin Schall wrote that the test was needed to protect patents from "hindsight," saying that is why the court required that "a person of ordinary skill in the art" not only have a motivation to combine the prior-art teachings, but some motivation to combine them in the particular manner claimed.

Many big patent holders, including General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co. and 3M Co., have sided with Teleflex. But other companies, particularly in software and other industries where combinations of prior designs are common, argue against the Federal Circuit's test. Cisco Systems Inc., Hallmark Cards Inc. and Microsoft Corp. have sided with KSR, as has the Bush administration.

The Supreme Court has yet to schedule argument on the third patent case accepted this term, which examines when domestically patented parts assembled abroad fall under U.S. patent protection. Decisions in all three cases are expected by the term's end in June.

ENVIRONMENT:

As Globe Warms, Can States Force The EPA To Act? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

Arctic sea ice is melting. Glaciers are in retreat. Sea levels are rising. So what is the Environmental Protection Agency doing about it?

That's what a group of state officials and environmentalists want to know.

Seven years ago, they asked the EPA to get involved - to take an initial step in response to scientific evidence that suggests greenhouse gases are causing global warming.

The agency refused, saying there were too many unresolved questions about the causes and effects of global warming. The state officials took their case to court, charging that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to take immediate action.

On Wednesday, the dispute arrives at the US Supreme Court, where the justices must decide whether the EPA is required to take action or whether the agency retains the discretion to decide for itself how best to respond to world-wide environmental threats.

The case will test the authority of special interest groups and state governments to sue federal agencies and force them to adopt certain regulatory policies that they favor. The case could also establish important legal precedents that might help or hinder state efforts to regulate greenhouses gases on their own in the absence of federal action.

On a broader level, the case raises questions about the role of the judiciary in resolving litigation over regulatory policy arguments. Should judges defer to controversial decisions made by administrative agencies on whether or when to pass regulations? Or should judges aggressively enforce what they see as the underlying purpose of statutes that govern agencies?

At issue in Massachusetts v. US Environmental Protection Agency is whether EPA officials acted properly when they declined to issue national regulations limiting the release of four greenhouse gases from new automobile models. The gases are carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxide, and hydrofluorocarbons.

EPA officials say the agency lacks the power to regulate greenhouse gases. The Clean Air Act authorizes the EPA to take action to reduce and control agents that cause "air pollution." But agency officials have concluded that greenhouse gases are not agents of air pollution. They say the Clean Air Act does not address global climate change.

As a fallback position, EPA officials say that even if they do have authority to regulate greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act they also have discretion under the act to decide when to initiate such measures. The officials have said there was scientific uncertainty about global warming and that they wanted to wait for more research and additional action by Congress before crafting an appropriate response.

Massachusetts along with 11 other states, three cities, a US territory, and numerous environmental groups are urging the Supreme Court to order the EPA to faithfully enforce the law as passed by Congress.

"A straightforward reading of the language of the Clean Air Act shows that carbon dioxide and other air pollutants associated with climate change are 'air pollutants' potentially subject to regulation [under the Clean Air Act]," writes Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey, in his brief. "When Congress has spoken as plainly as it has here, an administrative agency is bound to obey that legislative command."

In his brief, US Solicitor General Paul Clement defends the EPA's earlier legal positions. He also argues that Massachusetts lacks the legal standing to bring the lawsuit in the first place. Mr. Clement says Massachusetts officials are unable to draw a direct link between harm to the state and the EPA's decision not to pass the requested regulations.

DOJ_NMG_0099042

Massachusetts and other petitioners in the case complain of "profound harms" caused by climate change including the inundation of coastal property, damage to seaside facilities, and additional emergency response costs from more frequent and intense storms. Clement argues that the state's generalized concerns are not enough to demonstrate that such cataclysmic harms are a direct result of the EPA's decision not to regulate.

The specific request was for the EPA to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions from new cars. Such emissions make up only a fraction of greenhouse gases released worldwide.

Clement says that 80 percent of all greenhouse gases are from countries other than the US and that, of US emissions, 70 percent are from nontransportation sources. The solicitor general adds that of the remaining 30 percent, the requested regulation would only affect new vehicles models - leaving the vast majority of emissions in the US and throughout the world not covered by the new regulations.

In effect, Clement says, the threat of global warming is an international threat that requires an international solution. Since the EPA acting alone cannot solve the problem, lawyers from Massachusetts don't have legal standing to try to hold the EPA responsible for a problem it can't solve without international cooperation.

Mr. Milkey says the primary concern of Congress in the Clean Air Act was for the agency to determine whether certain pollutants can reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare. Where they pose such a threat, Milkey says, the agency must act to protect the public.

Pivotal Case On Global Warming Case Confronts U.S. High Court (FINDLAW/AP)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court hears arguments this week in a case that could determine whether the Bush administration must change course in how it deals with the threat of global warming.

A dozen U.S. states as well as environmental groups and large cities are trying to convince the court that the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate, as a matter of public health, the amount of carbon dioxide that comes from vehicles.

Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. It is the principal "greenhouse" gas that many scientists believe is flowing into the atmosphere at an unprecedented rate, leading to a warming of the earth and widespread ecological changes. One way to reduce those emissions is to have cleaner-burning cars.

The Bush administration intends to argue before the court on Wednesday that the EPA lacks the power under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The agency contends that even if it did have such authority, it would have discretion under the law on how to address the problem without imposing emissions controls.

The states, led by Massachusetts, and more than a dozen environmental groups insist the 1970 law makes clear that carbon dioxide is a pollutant - much like lead and smog-causing chemicals - that is subject to regulation because its poses a threat to public health.

A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled in favor of the government in 2005. But last June, the Supreme Court decided to take up the case, plunging for the first time into the politically charged debate over global warming. The ruling next year is expected to be one of the court's most important ever involving the environment.

At issue for now is pollution from automobiles. But the ruling indirectly may affect how the agency deals with carbon dioxide that comes from electric power plants.

In a separate lawsuit, the EPA says the Clean Air Act also prevents it from regulating such emissions from those plants. That claim would be undercut, Bookbinder says, if the high court rules in the states' favor in the auto emissions case.

President George W. Bush has rejected calls to regulate carbon dioxide. He favors voluntary steps by industry and development of new technologies to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases released into the atmosphere.

The United States accounts for about one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions. The amount of carbon dioxide from U.S. motor vehicles, power plants and other industry has increased on average by about 1 percent a year since 1990.

Now that Democrats will control the House and Senate in January after their election victories this month, there is expected to be increased pressure in Congress for mandatory limits on carbon emissions.

Global Warming Goes To Court (NYT)

New York Times, November 28, 2006

The Bush administration has been on a six-year campaign to expand its powers, often beyond what the Constitution allows. So it is odd to hear it claim that it lacks the power to slow global warming by limiting the emission of harmful gases. But that is just what it will argue to the Supreme Court tomorrow, in what may be the most important environmental case in many years.

A group of 12 states, including New York and Massachusetts, is suing the Environmental Protection Agency for failing to properly do its job. These states, backed by environmental groups and scientists, say that the Clean Air Act requires the E.P.A. to impose limits on carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases emitted by new cars. These gases are a major contributor to the "greenhouse effect" that is dangerously heating up the planet.

The Bush administration insists that the E.P.A. does not have the power to limit these gases. It argues that they are not "air pollutants" under the Clean Air Act. Alternatively, it contends that the court should dismiss the case because the states do not have "standing," since they cannot show that they will be specifically harmed by the agency's failure to regulate greenhouse gases.

A plain reading of the Clean Air Act shows that the states are right. The act says that the E.P.A. "shall" set standards for "any air pollutant" that in its judgment causes or contributes to air pollution that "may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The word "welfare," the law says, includes "climate" and "weather." The E.P.A. makes an array of specious arguments about why the act does not mean what it expressly says. But it has no right to refuse to do what Congress said it "shall" do.

Beneath the statutory and standing questions, this is a case about how seriously the government takes global warming. The E.P.A.'s decision was based in part on its poorly reasoned conclusion that there was too much "scientific uncertainty" about global warming to worry about it. The government's claim that the states lack standing also scoffs at global warming, by failing to acknowledge that the states have a strong interest in protecting their land and citizens against coastal flooding and the other kinds of damage that are being projected.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, climate scientists from the NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies, Stanford University and other respected institutions warn that "the scientific evidence of the risks, long time lags and irreversibility of climate change argue persuasively for prompt regulatory action." The Supreme Court can strike an important blow in defense of the planet simply by ruling that the E.P.A. must start following the law.

An Environmental Warning System (WP/AP)

By Vicki Smith

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. -- The Appalachian Trail gives hikers a nearly 2,200-mile trek through mountains, meadows and forests stretching from Georgia to Maine. But to scientists and land managers, it is also a living laboratory that could provide warnings of environmental problems while there is still time to fix them.

A diverse collection of organizations have launched a project to begin long-term monitoring of the trail's environmental health, with plans to tap into an army of volunteer "citizen scientists" and professionals.

Together, they will collect information about air and water quality, the health of plants, and animal migration patterns to build an early environmental warning system for the 120 million people along the Eastern Seaboard.

"It's somewhat like the canary in the coal mine in the sense of using it as a barometer for environmental and human health conditions," said Gregory Miller, president of the Silver Spring-based American Hiking Society.

The Appalachian Mountains are ideal for the project because they are home to one of the richest collections of temperate-zone species in the world. They also have a variety of ecosystems that blend into one another -- hardwood forests next to softwood forests next to alpine forests. The trail along the mountain chain passes through 14 states and eight national forests.

The idea for the project, the Appalachian Trail Mega-Transect, is in its infancy, but it has support from the National Park Service, the U.S. Forest Service, Cornell University, the National Geographic Society and Aveda Corp., an environmentally conscious beauty-products company.

"We're really after two things," said Brian Mitchell, a coordinator with the Park Service's Northeast Temperate Network in Woodstock, Vt. "We want to get a better understanding of what's happening on the trail so we can better manage it. The other side is we want to take the lessons we learn from the trail and show people that what's happening on the trail does actually affect us."

High ozone levels, for example, can reduce plant photosynthesis and growth and speed up aging and leaf loss. In humans, they can affect the lungs, respiratory tract and eyes, and increase susceptibility to allergens. Atmospheric deposition -- airborne sulfur and nitrogen deposited in the soil by rain and snow -- can affect farming and crop growth.

An example of the environmental changes along the trail is smog in the Great Smoky Mountains in Tennessee and North Carolina, said David Startzell, executive director of the Appalachian Trail Conservancy in Harpers Ferry, W.Va.

"People will read that on 25 or 30 days in a given year, it's considered unhealthy to walk on the Appalachian Trail, and we think that's going to grab people's attention more than if they just read about air-quality trends in general," he said.

That is also why volunteers will be critical to the project's success. It's one thing for people to read about technical reports on bird migration, acid rain or air quality, Startzell says. "We think it's another thing when people learn about that firsthand by actually helping to collect that information," he said.

Mitchell hopes that within the next year, the project will have at least two flagship programs for volunteers. He says volunteers could help with such tasks as measuring tree diameters, taking photographs to illustrate visibility, tracking the arrival times of migratory birds and dating the blooming and leaf loss of trees.

Advocates hope the project will help drive changes in public policy and personal behavior.

"Part of our hope is that as people become more aware of trends affecting those lands, they'll be motivated to take action," Startzell said, "whether that means switching to a hybrid car or just conducting their own way of life in a little more energy-efficient manner, or going to a town hall meeting and advocating for more open space."

Killing The Dead Zones (WP)

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

LAST YEAR was particularly bad for the Chesapeake Bay. Among its many problems, 4.5 percent of the bay's water had extremely low levels of oxygen saturation during the summer, creating anoxic "dead zones" that killed off valuable ecosystems. But according to a study issued recently, only 1.8 percent of the bay was anoxic this summer, encouraging the reestablishment of vital food chains. A separate evaluation released last week also highlighted a modest increase in the bay's overall health.

What made the difference? Diligence on land may have prevented more nitrogen and phosphorus from feeding into the bay than in past years. But Beth McGee, a scientist at the private Chesapeake Bay Foundation, says human efforts should get only a small fraction of the credit. Anoxic water, a summer phenomenon, is caused by polluted runoff that flows into the bay during the spring. A dry spring, such as the one the region experienced this year, means less runoff and, therefore, fewer dead zones -- even if the region is inundated later on, as it was in June. The foundation, which still gives the bay's health a grade of D, also claims that even if all the projects to which states around the bay have committed are carried to completion, they will reduce annual pollution in the bay by only about 40 percent of their stated goal by 2010.

Still, bay states are improving their record on protecting the estuary, if too slowly, and they have time to expand their programs. Maryland encourages its farmers to plant cover crops to absorb nitrates and reduce runoff, a program paid for in part by the state's useful Bay Restoration Fund. The Maryland Department of Agriculture has approved the subsidized planting of about 290,000 acres of cover crops for this fall -- a number that should rise in future years. Virginia, which lags behind Maryland in its bay cleanup efforts, should guarantee revenue to do the same -- so that farmers will be able to rely on timely support over many harvests. Both states should also expand programs that help farmers pay for other agricultural improvements, such as the construction and maintenance of riparian buffers, which are effective and natural pollution trappers.

Maryland's incoming attorney general, Douglas F. Gansler, ran on a platform of improving the bay by using the federal Clean Water Act to go after large agricultural polluters -- even those out of state. That may also help Maryland meet its pollution reduction goals.

Gun Background Check System Crashes (AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - An FBI computer system that quickly screens gun buyers' backgrounds for criminal activity crashed several times over the past two days, officials said Monday.

At times, the National Instant Criminal Background Check System was on the blink for up to a half-hour on Sunday and Monday - potentially allowing buyers to purchase firearms without being screened if sellers gave up on making the required check.

The computer crash was blamed on a technical glitch that was being worked on Monday evening, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. "It's a performance issue that we've never encountered before," he said

It was unclear when the glitch would be fixed.

The system, located in Clarksburg, W.Va., generally receives between 30,000 and 50,000 requests for background checks on a daily basis, peaking on the weekends, Bresson said. It usually processes the requests within 30 minutes.

U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Consider Case Involving Professor And His FBI File (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of a Nobel Peace Prize-nominated law professor who wants the U.S. government to expunge his FBI file.

A federal appeals court found that information the government gathered on Cherif Bassiouni is pertinent to authorized law enforcement activity as part of President George W. Bush's campaign against terror. The records are important for evaluating the reliability of FBI intelligence sources, the appeals court found.

The government argued in the lower courts that even though Bassiouni is not a member of any terror organization, agents probably will continue to receive information about him because of his travels in the Middle East.

Bassiouni, an Egyptian who teaches in the United States, is serving the United Nations as an independent expert on human rights in Afghanistan and was chairman of the U.N. Security Council's commission to investigate war crimes in the former Yugoslavia.

In 1999, Bassiouni was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize for work on international criminal justice and for his contribution to the creation of the International Criminal Court.

Bassiouni was among the U.N. human rights experts expressing concern about possible irreversible psychiatric symptoms in some terrorism suspects from virtual solitary confinement at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Former Sheriff Pleads Not Guilty To Involvement In Drug-selling Scheme (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

(AP) - ROANOKE, Virginia-A former sheriff pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges that he took part in a scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals with a dozen former and current officers.

H. Franklin Cassell, 68, and two Henry County sheriff's deputies and a captain in the economically distressed county pleaded not guilty. The other defendants will be in court Wednesday.

The indictment returned Oct. 31 said Cassell looked the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations, stole guns and other evidence and then resold cocaine, steroids, marijuana and other drugs to the public.

Cassell is charged with impeding a federal investigation and money laundering. If convicted, he faces up to 53 years in prison and a $1.25 million (â,¬950,000) fine.

Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, drug distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury.

A former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, agreed to cooperate with investigators. His planned guilty plea Monday was delayed because his lawyer was ill, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant.

A civilian, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty Monday to racketeering conspiracy under an agreement with prosecutors and may testify for the government, Bondurant said.

Prosecutors said the scheme began in 1998.

Cassell announced his retirement two weeks ago.

Former Henry Sheriff Enters Not-guilty Plea (RTD)

Richmond Times Dispatch, November 28, 2006

ROANOKE -- Former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell pleaded not guilty yesterday to trying to thwart a federal investigation into a drug-dealing ring allegedly run by some of his deputies.

Later, in the same federal courtroom where Cassell pleaded not guilty, the Henry man whose arrest prompted the indictment of Cassell, along with 12 of his employees, pleaded guilty to a single count of participating in a racketeering conspiracy. William R. Reed, 35, is to be sentenced in U.S. District Court at a later date and could testify at Cassell's trial.

On Nov. 2, federal and state authorities arrested 20 people in Martinsville and across the county, charging them with taking part in a racketeering scheme in which members of the sheriff's department resold drugs they had seized from dealers, stole drugs and weapons held in the custody of the sheriff's department and then lied to federal investigators to hide their activity.

Among the 20 were Cassell and 12 current or former employees in the sheriff's department. Cassell, Henry's sheriff since 1992, retired Nov. 13.

Yesterday, after Cassell's plea, his attorney John Lichtenstein said he is glad the plea is out of the way so he can begin the fight to clear Cassell's name. "Now the process can begin," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099046

Federal agents began their investigation of Cassell's department in March 2005, when U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Philadelphia tipped off their counterparts in Roanoke that a package containing 2 kilograms of ketamine, a sedative used as a date-rape drug, was in the mail and on its way to a Martinsville house.

The agents arrested the package's recipient, Reed, who told them the house was owned by Henry Sgt. James Alden Vaught. Reed said he paid Vaught in cash and ketamine to use the residence as a drug drop, and that he had helped the officer sell 2 kilograms of cocaine that had been seized from drug dealers, according to the federal indictment handed up Oct. 31.

When agents confronted Vaught, he confirmed Reed's story and implicated other officers, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant Jr. said in court yesterday. Vaught, who resigned shortly after Reed's arrest, agreed to wear a wire and captured more than 100 hours of conversation with 25 people. Among those secretly recorded was Cassell, who allegedly was taped offering to co-sign a loan for Vaught to help him launder $10,000 in drug money.

Cassell, 68, is charged with two counts of obstructing justice, money laundering, making a false statement and misprision, or unprofessional conduct.

Bondurant said Cassell knew of drug dealing within his department, and "he chose not to act."

Also yesterday, three of the indicted officers pleaded not guilty to taking part in the alleged racketeering scheme. Vaught, appearing without an attorney, told U.S. District Judge James C. Turk that he plans to plead guilty.

Henry Co. Civilian Pleads Guilty The Man Had Accepted A Drug Delivery That Prompted Agents To Investigate The Sheriff's Office. (RT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, November 28, 2006

A civilian who helped the feds build a case against members of the Henry County Sheriff's Office pleaded guilty to reduced charges on Monday, and a former sergeant who also cooperated is expected to follow suit.

William Randall Reed, 35, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering in exchange for dismissal of five other charges.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents conducted an undercover delivery of ketamine, a date rape drug, at a Henry County residence in March 2005.

According to court records, Reed's acceptance of the package served as the springboard for the investigation, which eventually resulted in the indictment of former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell, 12 current and former deputies and seven civilians.

Reed directed agents to James Alden Vaught, then a sergeant with the sheriff's office and the owner of the house where the ketamine was delivered. Reed had paid Vaught in cash and ketamine to use the house as a drop, officials say.

Reed also told investigators he had helped Vaught get rid of two kilograms of cocaine the sergeant had seized in a raid in 2001.

Vaught resigned from the department and agreed to wear a wire, eventually helping to record at least 100 tapes worth of conversations with two dozen people, according to prosecutor Tom Bondurant.

Bondurant said officials eventually learned that deputies were falsifying destruction orders for drugs, then selling them in the community. Other deputies are accused of buying steroids and distributing them, and Cassell is accused of obstructing the federal investigation, officials say.

Bondurant said Vaught has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering, but Vaught's attorney was ill and could not be there for a guilty plea hearing.

However, Vaught has already signed the agreement, which indicates that a second conspiracy charge against him will be dropped.

Vaught and Reed each face up to 20 years in prison, but the U.S. Attorney's Office will request reduced sentences for both men if they continue to cooperate, records show.

That means if co-defendants go to trial, Reed and Vaught may be expected to testify against them, Bondurant said.

Reed also is in trouble in Pennsylvania, where he already pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy charge in Philadelphia that is also related to shipments of ketamine. None of the 16 other defendants in that case is linked to the Henry County case, Bondurant said.

Attorney Mark Cedrone, who is representing Reed in Pennsylvania, said his client may be sentenced at once for both cases, but that "requires a lot of hoops to jump through."

Both men are free on bond pending their sentencings.

Also on Monday, Cassell and nine other defendants, including his second in command, Maj. James Keaton, were arraigned on their charges and pleaded not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0099047

Bondurant said he expected the remaining defendants to be arraigned this week and plead not guilty to their charges.

No trial date has been set in the case.

Cassell, Others, Plead Not Guilty (MB)

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, November 27, 2006

Former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell pleaded not guilty today in Roanoke to allegations that he looked the other way while officers in his department engaged in alleged illegal activities.

Cassell, along with 12 former and current members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a 50-page, 48-count federal indictment that includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges.

Cassell faces five counts alleging his participation in a money laundering scheme, obstruction of justice, false statement to a federal agency and misprison (failing to tell law enforcement of a felony).

Attending the hearing with his wife, Margaret, and defense attorneys, the former sheriff spoke briefly, stating his full name, address and birth date during the arraignment hearing.

"Not guilty," Cassell replied when asked for his plea.

Former major James Keaton and deputies Steven Preston and Walter Hairston also entered pleas of not guilty for their alleged involvement.

James Vaught, a former sergeant with the sheriff' office, has filed a plea agreement in which he will plead guilty to racketeering conspiracy, but on Monday, he entered a not guilty plea because his attorney is hospitalized and unable to attend the hearing.

William Randall "Randy" Reed, one of seven individuals charged in the indictment, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy in a plea agreement which calls for the dismissal of other charges.

The matter is continued until late-January or early February, when the court will consider motions related to the case.

If convicted, Cassell could face 53 years in jail and/or a $1.25 million fine.

Court Expands Protections For Medical Marijuana Users (LAT)

By Maura Dolan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — People charged with transporting marijuana may avoid conviction if they can show that the drug was for their personal medical use, the California Supreme Court ruled Monday.

In a 6-1 decision, the state high court said California's medical marijuana law protects patients who transport even relatively large quantities of the drug if they can show that the amount was consistent with their medical needs and recommended by a licensed physician.

The court interpreted a 2004 law passed by the Legislature to address uncertainties that followed voter passage of the Compassionate Use Act of 1996. The attorney general's office said the ruling would affect a handful of cases.

Monday's decision "expands the defenses that can be used for medical marijuana," including transportation and possession for sale, said Maureen J. Shanahan, who represented the defendant in the case.

Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, said prosecutors had hoped the court would make it more difficult for marijuana sellers to use a medical defense but said the court's clarification of the law was helpful.

The court reached its decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, who was arrested in Huntington Beach in 2001 while carrying more than a pound of marijuana in his truck. The stash included several small baggies, two large bags and an electronic scale.

Wright was charged with possessing marijuana for sale and with transporting it.

Wright had asked that jurors be instructed that he did not commit a crime if they determined the marijuana was recommended by a doctor. A physician testified that he had recommended Wright use marijuana to alleviate pain, abdominal problems and emotional stress.

The doctor said Wright preferred eating marijuana, which requires a larger amount to get the same effect as smoking it. The doctor said Wright needed a pound of marijuana every two to three months.

The trial judge ruled that the medical marijuana law passed by voters did not apply because the amount was too large and Wright was transporting it. But the judge permitted Wright to present evidence of medical use to rebut the possession for sale charge.

Wright was convicted of transportation and possession for sale. An appeals court overturned the conviction on the grounds that the jury should have been given a medical marijuana instruction.

DOJ_NMG_0099048

The California Supreme Court agreed that Wright was entitled to such an instruction but refused to overturn the conviction. The court said the judge's error was "harmless" because the jury had the option of convicting Wright only of possession, a misdemeanor. Instead, the jury "found beyond a reasonable doubt that he possessed the drug with the specific intent to sell it," wrote Justice Carlos Moreno for the majority.

Justice Marvin Baxter wrote separately, saying he agreed that Wright's conviction should stand but disagreed that Wright was entitled to a medical marijuana defense.

"The overwhelming evidence that defendant possessed the marijuana with the intent of selling it precluded a reasonable doubt as to its personal medical purpose," Baxter wrote. "This evidence prominently included the electronic scale, the presence of which the defendant never explained."

COURT ALLOWS PROTECTIONS FOR PATIENTS TRANSPORTING POT (BCN)

Bay City News Wire, November 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (BCN) -- The California Supreme Court ruled today that legal protections for patients who transport medical marijuana apply retroactively to cases that were underway by 2003.

The ruling, issued in San Francisco, concerns a 2003 state law that clarified California's medical marijuana law, which was passed by state voters in 1996 as the Compassionate Use Act.

The Compassionate Use Act protects seriously ill patients from being prosecuted in state court for using marijuana when they have a doctor's approval.

The protections apply only to state court prosecutions and not to criminal prosecutions in federal court. Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law.

The later law, passed by the California Legislature in 2003 and entitled the Medical Marijuana Program, was intended to clarify the Compassionate Use Act and address some additional issues.

Among other provisions, it extended similar legal protections to medical marijuana patients who transport the drug. It also established a program for issuing identification cards to qualified patients.

The case before the state high court was an appeal by Shaun Wright, a Huntington Beach man who was convicted in Orange County Superior Court of transporting marijuana and possessing it for sale. Wright was sentenced to a year in jail and released on probation after six months.

He was arrested in 2001 after police received a tip that his pickup truck at a car wash "reeked of marijuana." Police found one pound and three ounces of marijuana along with a scale.

Wright said he needed the marijuana to alleviate chronic pain from a bicycle accident and stomach problems from a parasite.

He argued in his appeal that the jury should have been instructed that transporting marijuana for his personal medical use could be a defense against a criminal charge of transporting marijuana.

The state high court agreed that the 2003 law applied to his case because his appeal was pending at when the law was passed.

Justice Carlos Moreno wrote, "We agree that the Medical Marijuana Program applies retroactively to cases pending at the time of its enactment and, therefore, to the present case."

But the court said Wright's conviction didn't need to be automatically overturned. It said the jury's finding that he possessed marijuana with the intent to sell had by implication rejected his claim that he was transporting the marijuana for his personal medical use.

The panel sent the case back to Orange County Superior Court for further proceedings on Wright's claims that there were also other errors in jury instructions.

Man's Conviction Upheld In Medical Marijuana Case (CBS2)

CBS 2, November 28, 2006

(CBS) SANTA ANA An Orange County man's felony conviction for transporting marijuana was upheld Monday by the California Supreme Court despite its ruling that later law allowing a medical marijuana defense for transportation applies retroactively.

The decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, 43, resolves an important question regarding the Medical Marijuana Program, legislation adopted in 2004 to promote the implementation of Proposition 215 that in 1996 legalized marijuana for medicinal use, Nathan Barankin of the state Attorney General's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0099049

That question, Barankin said, is whether the law applies retroactively "and it does resolve that issue for state law purposes."

However, it only affects a handful of cases that were brought before the 2004 law took affect and are still "open," or under appeal, Barankin said.

Wright, who was found with more than a pound of marijuana in his truck during a search by Huntington Beach police on Sept. 20, 2001, was not allowed to raise a medical marijuana defense.

A doctor testified that he had prescribed the drug for Wright, and Wright testified that he took the drug for a shoulder injury that prevented him from working as a carpenter, and abdominal pain from a stomach parasite.

Wright testified that he began using marijuana for his medical condition in 1991.

The prosecution argued that the amount of marijuana recovered in the truck indicated more than enough for personal use, that it was broken up into separate packages and that Wright had an electronic scale, which he never explained.

The defense argued that Wright needed higher amounts of marijuana because he ate it rather than smoked it and that it was broken up into packages by potency for different uses.

The Supreme Court found that the jury deciding Wright's case should have been allowed to consider a medical marijuana defense, but that the error was "harmless," meaning it would not have affected the jury's decision.

The court found that the jury had been given the option of convicting Wright of the lesser crime of simple marijuana possession, but convicted him of possessing marijuana for sale and transporting marijuana.

"In such cases the issue should not be deemed to have been removed from the jury's consideration since it has been resolved in another context, and there can be no prejudice to the defendant since the evidence that would support a finding that only the lesser offense was committed has been rejected by the jury," the decision stated.

Barankin said that the justices "said that even if he was given the opportunity to assert (the medical marijuana) defense, the jury's conviction would not have changed."

The decision sends the case back to the Court of Appeal, where other issues raised by Wright could result in the conviction being overturned, his attorney Maureen Shanahan said.

Wright was sentenced to a year in county jail and placed on three years formal probation, Shanahan said.

Barankin said he did not anticipate the conviction would be overturned. "In our view, this was the strongest legal argument he had to make," Barankin said.

Shanahan said the appellate court decision in the Wright decision also found that the 2004 legislation was retroactive, but a different circuit found the opposite.

"That was the reason the court took our case," she said. Barankin said the state Supreme Court "saw the case as an opportunity to clarify the law on the application of medical marijuana defenses."

Medical Marijuana: Dopey Decision (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 28, 2006

The Washington Supreme Court, for hardly the first time in judicial history, has rendered a ruling that is at the same time legally correct and morally wrong.

Yes, as the court ruled Thursday, state law enacted by the 1998 passage of Initiative 692 does require that anyone mounting a "compassionate use" defense in a marijuana-related crime must meet specific criteria.

And, yes, Sharon Lee Tracy failed that test. The California doctor who approved her use of medical marijuana was not licensed in Washington and thus doesn't meet the I-692 standard.

The 6-3 majority also rejected Tracy's attempt at a Constitution-based defense, in part because she failed to produce a copy of her California medical marijuana card. "It appears," the court says, "that the card was never returned to her after the police seized it at the time of the original search." She couldn't make her case because the cops never gave her property back?

"While we are not without sympathy," Justice Tom Chambers intoned for the majority, "it is Tracy's responsibility as a petitioner to provide an adequate record for appellate review. ..."

Tracy "suffers from a hip deformity, migraine headaches, a series of eight corrective surgeries following a ruptured colon and bowel condition and has been disabled since 1998." But Skamania County insisted on prosecuting her for marijuana?

Where the cops and courts failed, lawmakers can succeed, by rewriting the law to recognize medical marijuana prescriptions from any licensed physician.

Warning Issued On Dangers Of Methadone (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0099050

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Filed at 10:44 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- People starting treatment with methadone have died and suffered life-threatening side effects, health officials said Monday in warning of the dangers of overdosing on the painkiller.

Overdoses of the increasingly popular narcotic can cause slow or shallow breathing and dangerous changes in heart beat that patients might not feel, the Food and Drug Administration said.

Those side effects, including reports of deaths, have been seen in patients starting methadone treatment for severe pain or who switched to the drug after using other strong narcotic pain relievers, the FDA said in a public health advisory.

The FDA warned that methadone only provides pain relief for four to eight hours, but can linger in the body for eight to 59 hours. That can lead patients to take more of the drug before it has been eliminated by the body, causing the drug to build up in the body to toxic levels, the FDA said.

Doctors should prescribe methadone carefully and closely monitor patients on the drug, the FDA said. Doctors also should thoroughly instruct patients how to take the painkiller, warning them not to take more than prescribed without first checking with the doctor, the agency added.

Methadone use is rising, especially for the treatment of pain, with more than 2 million prescription dispensed in 2003, according to the FDA. Increased reports of deaths and serious injuries have accompanied that greater use.

In 2003, methadone was listed as a cause of 2,452 unintentional poisoning deaths in the U.S., up from 623 in 1999, according to the National Center for Health Statistics.

The FDA also said it updated the label for the methadone product Dolophine to include new dosing and other information.

A spokesman for Boehringer Ingelheim Pharmaceuticals Inc., whose Roxane Laboratories subsidiary makes Dolophine, did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Methadone is similar to morphine and is most widely used to treat severe pain. The drug also is used in the treatment of heroin addiction.

FDA Warns Methadone Users Of Serious Side Effects,Overdose (DOW)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has issued a health advisory for methadone after it reviewed reports of death and life-threatening side effects in patients taking the pain drug, the agency said Monday.

Methadone, marketed as Dolophine, is a narcotic pain medicine similar to morphine. Often, the drug is given to addicts who are trying to break their heroin habit.

According to the advisory, posted on the FDA's Web site, methadone can cause slow or shallow breathing and "dangerous changes in heart beat that may not be felt by the patient." In addition, accidental overdose could happen because the substance stays in the body for more than eight hours, when pain relief from a dose lasts about four to eight hours.

For those reasons, patients should take methadone exactly as prescribed, shouldn't start other medicines or dietary supplements without supervision and should be aware of overdose signs, the agency said.

Dolophine is marketed by Boehringer Ingelheim Corp.'s subsidiary Roxane Laboratories Inc.

A company representative wasn't immediately available to comment.

War On Drugs Strengthens Afghan Mafia (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

Afghanistan's war on drugs has been marred by corruption that has strengthened the grip of an increasingly powerful mafia on the country's narcotics trade, a report by the World Bank and United Nations said.

Over the past five years, the British-led counter-narcotics strategy had penalised the country's poorest farmers and strengthened networks of organised crime, consolidating the trade among a tiny elite of traffickers, the damning report said.

"Around 25 to 30 key traffickers, the majority of them based in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

Afghanistan's interior ministry, which oversees the police, had been "captured" by powerful traffickers and was used to facilitate the drugs trade.

DOJ_NMG_0099051

"Those driving the drug industry must be brought to justice and officials who support it sacked," said Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the UN Office of Drugs and Crime.

"Interdiction efforts especially need to target high-level profiteers whose wealth magnifies their potential for corrupting the state," the report said.

Strategies aimed at short-term reductions in opium production in the worst affected areas could do more harm than good, fuelling "discontent and strengthening the insurgency in the volatile south of the country".

Far from leading to sustained declines in total national cultivation, a successful reduction in one province often led to increases elsewhere, or cultivation in the province itself rebounded the following year, such as in Helmand province after 2003.

To achieve long-term success in the battle against drugs eradication, the report found that efforts should be concentrated in the six Afghan provinces where there was relatively little opium cultivation to build up a line of defence against the spread of the trade. "Rural development programmes are needed throughout the country and should not be focused primarily on opium areas, to help prevent cultivation from further spreading," said Alastair McKechnie, World Bank country director for Afghanistan.

Efforts to eradicate opium crops had strengthened corruption by giving police an opportunity to collect bribes, which hit hardest the poor farmers and labourers who could not afford to pay off authorities.

"Wealthier opium producers pay bribes to avoid having their crops eradicated, greatly reducing the effectiveness of counter-narcotics measures and gravely undermining the credibility of the government and its local representatives," the report said.

Afghanistan produced a record opium harvest in 2006, with total cultivation increasing by 59 per cent and production by 49 per cent. The bulk of opium growth this year was concentrated in Helmand and a few other highly insecure and insurgency-ridden provinces in the south.

Even in this record year, opium took up less than 4 per cent of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, with only an estimated 13 per cent of the population involved in poppy cultivation, which the report said was cause for hope.

UK Troops At Risk Over Plan To Stop Afghan Opium Crop (FT)

By Jimmy Burns In London And Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

Afghan government plans to eradicate poppy farming in southern Afghanistan risk drawing British troops into fierce fighting with an already embittered localpopulation, military officials and diplomats in the country have warned.

The governor of Helmand has promised to push ahead with a drug eradication programme early in the new year in the southern province where British troops faced unexpectedly fierce battles during the summer.

Local farmers have this month begun to plant for a new opium harvest as fears grow that the Taliban may exploit tensions developing between Nato and the local drugs barons and the farmers who work for them.

Brigadier Jerry Thomas, the UK's Camp Bastion commander, told the Financial Times that while he had the troops he needed in the Task Force's southern base, the drug eradication programme risked putting new strains on security.

"It is important that the programme is carefully targeted at the needy not the greedy . . . it will be a challenge to our hearts and minds campaign," he said.

Helmand province, where the bulk of Britain's 5,200 troops are based, saw a 162 per cent increase in the area used to cultivate opium poppy last year as a result of local officials profiting from the trade and efforts by insurgents to encourage opium cultivation.

A US official said this year's opium harvest inHelmand could be almost as large as last year and, without successful eradicationof the crop, international funding for future counter-narcotics efforts could be in doubt.

"The military is very focused on stability, but we have to look at the benefits of having some eradication when up to one-third of the UK's heroin comes fromHelmand province," said a western official in Kabul.

"Could anyone justify going to the Afghan government and asking to have no eradication In Helmand? It would look very suspicious."

Helmand has been relatively quiet since British troops withdrew from Musa Qala, a district in the north of the province, in late September, but eradication of the crop that many Afghan farmers depend on for their livelihood could reignite tensions.

The onset of colder weather has failed to reduce the violence in the country's restive south. A suicide bomber blew himself up at a crowded restaurant in south-eastern Patika province, killing 15 people and injuring24 yesterday. Separately, one Nato soldier and an estimated 57 insurgents were killed in fighting in four areas of southern Afghanistan at the weekend.

The destruction of poppy crops would centre on the districts of Nad Ali, Nawa and Nari Seraj, along the Helmand River and not far from the provincial capital of Lashkar Gah, whichBritish troops are hopingto use as a showcase forreconstruction and development.

DOJ_NMG_0099052

Major Luke Knittig, a Nato spokesman, said that troops from the Nato-led Inter-national Security Assistance Force would assist the government with the eradication programme. But he cautioned: "You will not see Isaf troops in the fields lopping off the tops of poppies."

Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, November 28, 2006

U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank.

The report, released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades.

The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops.

Opium has remained the nation's most lucrative crop by far, and drug traffickers — through incentives and intimidation — have kept farmers in the opium business across Afghanistan, which the United Nations says produces about 87% of the world's opium. Last year, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, Afghanistan produced 4,100 metric tons of opium, nearly as much as the biggest harvest in 1999. The United Nations predicts a record harvest in 2007.

Today's report describes how opium farmers' flexibility has helped harvests increase. When government officials end the opium trade in one province, opium brokers typically move cultivation and trade elsewhere, the report says.

Counter-narcotics efforts also have fueled corruption, the report says. Farmers who can afford it have bribed local officials to preserve opium crops, while the poorest farmers have been driven deeper into debt when their crops are destroyed, the report says. Investigators found several instances in which farmers planned to replant opium to pay their debts.

The report also says local government officials sometimes help drug lords drive competitors out of the market in exchange for a cut of the profits or protection payments.

Antonio Maria Costa of the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime has recommended focusing agents on areas with less opium cultivation to keep such farming from spreading and help establish an alternative economy. The U.S. State Department's Anne Patterson, acknowledging "there is no silver bullet" to the opium problem, has said much of the growth in production is in areas with weak local governments.

Mo. Group Home Fire Kills 10, Injures 24 (AP)

By Marcus Kabel, The Associated Press

AP, November 28, 2006

ANDERSON, Mo. -- An early morning fire broke out in a group home for the elderly and mentally ill Monday, killing 10 people and injuring two dozen others in a blaze that the governor said was being treated as a crime.

The blaze reduced the privately run Anderson Guest House to a skeleton of cinder blocks and stunned this rural community of about 1,800 people tucked in the Ozark hills of southwest Missouri.

Gov. Matt Blunt said investigators were treating the fire as suspicious.

"We're not saying it is definitely a crime scene, but we are treating it as if it is and trying to determine if the fire was set by somebody who had a nefarious motive," Blunt said.

The home had 32 residents and two employees inside when the fire was reported around 1 a.m. The dead ranged in age from early 20s to elderly. Another 18 people were taken to hospitals, and six were treated at the scene, authorities said.

One of the dead was a worker in the home, and the other nine were residents, Blunt said. Authorities did not plan to release names until Tuesday because relatives of two victims haven't yet been notified.

Officials refused to say how the victims died or whether they had any warning. The home had fire alarms but no sprinklers.

One person was in serious condition at Joplin Hospital. All the other survivors who went to area hospitals were either in good or fair condition, or had been treated and released.

The home is a residential care center licensed by the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services. The facility also has a license from the state Department of Mental Health that allowed mentally ill residents to live at the home and receive treatment elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0099053

Asked whether two staff members were enough to look after 32 residents, Blunt said that was up to state health officials.

"Again, it was late at night," the governor said. "That would impact to some degree the amount of care that is necessary."

Neighbor Steven Spears, 47, saw the blaze erupt through security cameras posted outside his home.

"I saw the front door blow open with fire," Spears said. "I know most of them (the residents). I've talked to all of them at one time or another. It still hasn't hit me."

The home is operated by Joplin River of Life Ministries Inc. Robert Dupont, its executive director, issued a statement expressing sadness and saying all displaced residents were being cared for with the help of local agencies.

"This is a very tragic situation that has saddened all of us at Joplin River of Life Ministries," he said.

At the company's offices in Joplin, investigators interviewed Dupont and group home residents, including some survivors.

Dupont, 61, was convicted of conspiracy to commit fraud in 2003 and sentenced to 21 months in prison for taking part in a scheme to bilk the federal Medicare program by steering patients from group homes he owned _ including the one in Anderson _ to hand-picked doctors, according to federal records. Those doctors, in exchange, falsely certified that the patients needed home health services from two companies Dupont owned or co-owned.

Repeated attempts seeking comment from Dupont on Monday, including a visit to his home, were unsuccessful.

Authorities were trying to determine whether the blaze was linked to a smaller fire at the facility Saturday morning, said Assistant Fire Marshal Greg Carrell. No one was injured in that fire, which was still under investigation when the second blaze began.

Inspectors from the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services, which licenses the facility, cited it in March for several health code violations pertaining to food storage and preparation, as well as for allowing a resident to take more than the prescribed dose of an inhaler and not requesting criminal background checks for new employees as quickly as required by law. But none were related to fire safety.

But two other group homes the company operates were cited for fire-code violations in 2003. Fire equipment in one Joplin-based home was found to have been intentionally disabled, records show. Another facility in nearby Carthage was cited for failing to undergo an annual fire inspection and to ensure staff members could unlock rooms from the outside in case of emergency, the Joplin Globe reported.

Monday's blaze was one of the worst fires at a health care facility since 2003, when a patient suffering from dementia and multiple sclerosis, set fire to her bed and burned down a care center in Hartford, Conn., killing 16 residents. Six months later, in September 2003, a fire killed 15 patients in Nashville, Tenn.

Recently, the federal agency that oversees the safety of nursing homes asked for comments about a proposal to require all nursing homes to have comprehensive sprinkler systems. The rule would not address group homes like the one in Anderson because such facilities are not subject to the same federal oversight.

U.S. Marshals Service To Help Track Sex Offenders (AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) The federal government will soon get involved in tracking down sex offenders in Maine who avoid registering with police.

The U.S. Marshals Service in Maine is being trained in the new responsibilities as part of a federal sex offender law passed in July, said John Cooper, the chief deputy U.S. marshal for Maine.

The new law creates a national sex offender database to allow law enforcement and communities to know where convicted sex offenders live and work. It gives the Marshals Service the task of tracking down offenders who dodge their obligations.

``We have resources and databases that local agencies don't have," Cooper said.

Maine and other states in recent years have created registries that list people convicted of certain types of sex crimes. The registries are viewed as informational and safety tools for police and the public.

But officials say there are a number of weaknesses in the system.

In Maine, failing to register with local police or the state is a crime, but only a misdemeanor that hasn't been listed on national databases that alert police to people who are wanted in other states.

Police say another weakness in the system is figuring out who should take the lead in searching for a sex offender who fails to register or report to police as required.

The federal law helps by bringing uniformity to what has been a hodgepodge of different state laws and requirements as well as assigning federal agents to track down unregistered offenders.

``One of our biggest concerns is if someone moves from Portland, we don't know where they go," said Portland police Lt. Vern Malloch.

DOJ_NMG_0099054

The new law, the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, is named for Adam Walsh, who was kidnapped in 1981 from a Florida mall when he was 6 years old and whose remains were found 100 miles away two weeks later. His father, John Walsh, has been an advocate for child safety legislation and hosts the TV program ``America's Most Wanted."

Cooper said the Marshals Service is suited to the task of finding sex offenders who don't register because of its ability in finding fugitives. The Marshals Service also has lent its expertise to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children to help find at-risk youths.

IMMIGRATION:

Fence Plan Alarms Landowners (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 28, 2006

EAGLE PASS, Texas — Ranching magnate Bill Moody's vast holdings spread across three Texas counties and include 35 miles of frontage along the Rio Grande, where thousands of illegal immigrants and smugglers have crossed from Mexico into the USA. They have worn paths through Moody's pastures, cut his fences and stolen some of his cattle.

From his perch on the front lines of the battle against illegal immigration, Moody would seem to be the type of person who would embrace the federal government's most provocative effort to stop illegals from entering this country: a plan to build 700 miles of fence along the 2,100-mile Southwest border, including Moody's land. Instead, Moody is a powerful voice in a growing alliance of border landowners and local law enforcement officials who oppose a fence.

“They're not gonna build it,” Moody says flatly. “We darn sure don't need a wall. Everybody knows the Great Wall of China wasn't worth a damn.”

Most everyone here agrees that more border security is needed to curb illegal immigration. Ranchers such as Moody and Dob Cunningham, who has a 700-acre spread north of here with 2 miles of river frontage, say they often give Border Patrol agents access to their land to help the agents track down illegals.

However, the fence plan — the centerpiece of an immigration bill President Bush signed last month — has come to reflect the disconnect between many landowners here and officials in Washington who see the project as a key part of the nation's strategy to slow illegal immigration. Here, where the impact of illegal immigration is greatest, the fence is widely viewed as an economic and environmental threat. In Eagle Pass, a city of 25,000 that is 95% Hispanic, it's also seen as a rejection of the region's tradition of shared cultures and open ranges.

Like many ranchers and local law enforcement officers, Cunningham believes the U.S. government should focus on hiring more and better-trained Border Patrol agents rather than erecting the proposed double-walled barrier. He fears the fence would deny him access to the Rio Grande's waters that are a lifeline for his cattle and for the migrating wildlife sought by hunters who lease parts of his ranch.

Cunningham also isn't happy about the possibility of having to give up a strip of his land along the river to the U.S. government for fence construction. “We'll fight it tooth and nail,” he says, including filing lawsuits to stop the fence, if necessary. “This might work west of El Paso, where there is nothing but sand and hills. Not here.”

Moody, whose land was a backdrop for the film version of the cowboy saga Lonesome Dove, says there are enough fences here, and that the boundary between the USA and Mexico should remain natural: “The River,” as he calls it.

The bill Bush signed does not include money to build the fence, and it's unclear how aggressively Congress will pursue the multibillion-dollar project once Democrats assume leadership of the House and Senate in January.

Supporters of the plan, including Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., say the success of a fence along 10 miles of the border south of San Diego suggests that fences at other heavily traveled crossings would help curb illegal immigration.

Hunter says the government will develop plans to preserve border landowners' access to water. As for the potential condemnation of property, he says the “overwhelming” need for a secure border should outweigh other concerns. Russ Knocke of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) says landowners and law enforcement officials “will be key partners in the effort to secure the border.”

Matt Brockman, executive vice president of the 14,000-member Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers Association, says economic and environmental questions — notably landowners' concerns about access to the Rio Grande — should be enough to stop the project.

“I don't think it's as easy as slapping up a fence,” Brockman says. “It's alarming to us. We could be talking about hundreds of thousands of acres that could be condemned” for construction.

As the fence plan made its way through Congress, law enforcement officials here were dubious.

DOJ_NMG_0099055

Maverick County Sheriff Tomas Herrera and Val Verde County Sheriff D'Wayne Jernigan say they constantly are seeking more money to protect residents from crimes involving illegal immigrants, including burglaries, vandalism and cattle thefts. However, Jernigan says skepticism about the fence planned for parts of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas is such that local officials have not discussed it.

"Trust me, it's not gonna happen," Jernigan says. "There's not gonna be a fence. I have landowners here who put it this way: 'Over my dead body.' "

There are about 12,500 Border Patrol agents in the USA, up from 9,000 before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Bush has vowed to boost the number of agents to 18,000 before he leaves office in January 2009. All but slightly more than 1,000 of the current agents are deployed along the Southwestern border, according to DHS.

As the number of agents patrolling the border has increased, the number of illegal immigrants arrested has declined. The DHS has said that is an indication that the increased security discourages people from trying to enter the USA illegally. DHS reported nearly 1.1 million arrests at U.S. borders in the budget year that ended in September, down from nearly 1.2 million the previous year. About 98% of the arrests occurred along the U.S.-Mexican border.

The use of National Guard troops to beef up border security, along with increased efforts to deport illegal immigrants from nations other than Mexico, have been key factors in reducing border arrests, Knocke says. Even so, the flow of illegals into the USA continues.

Cunningham says that in recent years, thieves cutting through his land have stolen ranch equipment and threatened his neighbors. Some have returned to Mexico with a few of his cows.

"I feel like Sam's Wholesale Club," says the 72-year-old retired Border Patrol agent, flashing a smile under his frayed cowboy hat. "I live with this all the time."

However, it hasn't been enough to make Cunningham support building a fence along the Rio Grande. He says increasingly aggressive patrols and better use of technology — not a fence — are keys to improving security.

Cunningham notes that he has allowed the Border Patrol to place a security camera tower atop a scenic peak on his property that overlooks the Rio Grande. He says the camera gives agents a broad view of what federal authorities have designated as a prime corridor for smuggling illegals and drugs.

Maverick County Sheriff Herrera agrees with Cunningham. He says there is recent evidence indicating that boosting law enforcement officers' presence along the border deters illegal immigration more efficiently than would a costly fence.

Since two state-funded border-crime initiatives were launched last December, Herrera says, Maverick County has seen a 65% decline in burglaries linked to illegal immigrants. The programs, launched with grants of more than $360,000 to each of Texas' 16 border counties, allowed Herrera in Eagle Pass to pay overtime costs to double the number of sheriff's deputies on each shift, from six to 12.

State troopers and agents from the Texas Department of Parks and Wildlife patrolled the region as well. Herrera says the operations provided a "second line of defense" that allowed the Border Patrol to focus directly on the border.

Herrera believes the increased law enforcement presence contributed to a drop in arrests of illegals in the 55 miles between Del Rio, Texas, and Eagle Pass. Arrests there fell from 68,506 in 2005 to 42,636 this year, U.S. Customs and Border Protection reports.

"Boots on the ground will do the work," Herrera says.

Hunter offers his own set of numbers that he says boosts the argument for a fence.

Before construction of a 10-mile stretch of fence between San Diego and Tijuana, Mexico, in 1994, authorities caught more than 500,000 illegals there each year. The number dropped to about 100,000 by 2002 before ticking upward recently, Border Patrol spokeswoman Wendi Lee says. Meanwhile, violent crimes linked to illegals, including murders, robberies and assaults, fell 46% in the San Diego area after the fence was built, she says.

"The fence brought order to an extremely dangerous border," Hunter says. Before the fence, he says, there was "lots of fear." Now, "people don't have to worry about smugglers coming through."

Some smugglers, however, have begun using more isolated crossings in the Southwestern desert, where hundreds of illegals have died in summertime heat, says Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network, an immigrant rights group in Arizona. More than 200 illegals have died crossing the southern Arizona desert since October 2005, the group says.

"The unintended consequence of the border-security buildup has been to strengthen the smuggling groups" that use more desolate and dangerous routes to elude border agents, Allen says.

In the legislation authorizing the new fence, Hunter says he identified "primary smuggling corridors" to be barricaded, including stretches between Del Rio and Eagle Pass and Laredo to Brownsville. Hunter believes that many landowners and other critics of the fence eventually will adopt the view of Ernie Davis, who operates a 30,000-acre ranch 50 miles northwest of Laredo.

DOJ_NMG_0099056

Davis says parts of his land, about 20 miles inland from the Rio Grande, have been plundered by illegal immigrants, drug traffickers and thieves. In the past two years, five vehicles have been stolen from the ranch, Davis says, and burglars often have targeted his home.

"I'm for anything that would limit the illegal border crossings," Davis says. "I would support (Hunter) on this fence, with the idea that it would help control this thing."

However, Davis acknowledges that the issues are different for ranchers with land along the river. "If I had river frontage, I would be concerned. There's not an easy answer to any of this."

The worn fairways of the Eagle Pass Golf Course, about 100 yards across the Rio Grande from Piedras Negras, Mexico, have become a well-traveled gateway to the USA. Night and day, illegals emerge from the river's murky water and dash across the course, sometimes interrupting play.

"You see ladies with kids running right across the fairway," says David Chisum, who manages the nine-hole course. He acknowledges that most people might assume he would want a fence here, if for no other reason than to protect the course's 115 members or speed the pace of golfers' play. However, Chisum reflects many residents' pragmatism when it comes to the thorny issue of illegal immigration.

"We really haven't had any major damage here," he says, except perhaps for the thefts of a few flags that can be seen whipping in the wind from some porches in Piedras Negras. Chisum says most of those who play the course understand the peculiar hazards here.

"I don't think a fence would help us," he says. "I like seeing the river. People here understand that sometimes you just have to wait and allow people to cross before you hit."

Cintas Warned Against Firing Immigrant Force (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

A Mississippi Democrat in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee has warned the nation's largest uniform supplier it faces criminal charges if it follows a White House proposal to recheck workers with mismatched Social Security numbers and fire those who cannot resolve the discrepancy in 60 days.

Rep. Bennie Thompson said in a letter to Cintas Corp. it could be charged with "illegal activities in violation of state and federal law" if any of its 32,000 employees are terminated because they gave incorrect Social Security numbers to be hired.

"I am deeply troubled by Cintas' recent policy change regarding the Social Security Administration's 'no match' letters," Mr. Thompson said in the Nov. 2 letter. "It is my understanding that hundreds of Cintas' immigrant workers have received these letters. I am extremely concerned about any potentially discriminatory actions targeting this community."

In June, President Bush proposed new guidelines concerning "no-match" letters from the Social Security Administration, saying he wanted to make it easier for employers to verify workers' eligibility and continue to hold them accountable for those they hire.

The Department of Homeland Security followed up on that announcement yesterday, formally releasing new regulations to help businesses comply with hiring requirements intended to reduce the hiring of illegal aliens -- including setting guidelines for businesses when handling "no-match" letters from the Social Security Administration.

The proposed regulation is subject to a 60-day public comment period.

"Most businesses want to do the right thing when it comes to employing legal workers," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. "These new regulations will give U.S. businesses the necessary tools to increase the likelihood that they are employing workers consistent with our laws.

"They also help us to identify and prosecute employers who are blatantly abusing our immigration system."

But Mr. Thompson called the "no-match" letters a threat to workers who fail to reverify their information and called Cintas' actions a "rash enactment of a proposed DHS regulation." He said that by implementing "this incomplete regulation," Cintas could be in violation of federal immigration law.

The seven-term congressman also said before the proposal becomes law, it must go through a rule-making process, "which could radically change the regulation or kill it all together."

Cintas has issued letters to 400 employees in five states telling them they will be indefinitely suspended if they cannot resolve their mismatched Social Security number within 60 days.

"Cintas, like all employers, has a legal obligation to ensure all employees are legally authorized to work in the U.S.," the firm said in a statement. "Cintas has not terminated any employees due to the Social Security mismatches and plans to continue its policy of placing these employees on indefinite leave until they produce the required documentation."

DOJ_NMG_0099057

In his letter, Mr. Thompson said his "apprehension" over the proposed policy was echoed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which said the proposal could result in "circumstances in which employers have incentives to take actions that violate ... non-discriminatory provisions."

As Homeland Security Committee chairman, he would set the panel's agenda. Earlier this month, he also said Democrats planned to "revisit" legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan.

Under existing rules, when a Social Security number does not match a name on a tax or employment eligibility document, the government sends a "no-match" letter asking that the discrepancy be resolved. Of 250 million wage reports the government receives each year, as many as 10 percent belong to employees whose names do not match their Social Security numbers.

"Identifying businesses that are habitually flagged for submitting mismatched Social Security numbers would bolster our worksite enforcement efforts," Mr. Chertoff said.

Speed Bump At The Border (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Washington

Democrats preparing to take over Congress appear to have a perfect issue for the party of the left: the rich are getting richer, but sizable productivity gains and rising corporate profits are not paying off for the working and middle classes. All boats are not rising with the tide.

The picture is a paint-by-the-numbers portrait of the greedy picking the pockets of the needy. The villains are C.E.O.s, investment bankers and corporate managers who refuse to pass on profits in the form of higher wages. The victims are workers who struggle to deal with an increasingly unreliable and, for many, unrewarding marketplace — producing more while under the constant threat of job, health care and pension loss.

The success of candidates attacking outsourcing and trade agreements like Nafta, combined with high Democratic margins among economically pessimistic voters, clearly point to middle-class wage stagnation and growing inequality as significant factors in the election this month.

Politically, the result has shifted the balance of power within the Democratic Party in favor of the protectionist wing, and especially in favor of such major unions as the Teamsters, the steelworkers and the autoworkers, all key party supporters with money and manpower.

The strengthening of the Democrats' protectionist wing is virtually certain to force to the surface a second, and closely related, internal conflict between the party's pro- and anti-immigration wings. This conflict among Democrats remained submerged while President Bush and the Republican House and Senate majorities fought without resolution over the same issue.

"Immigration is a difficult issue for the Democrats; it cuts in complicated ways," says Stephen Ansolabehere, an M.I.T. political scientist who helped conduct an Internet survey of 37,000 voters. The Democratic Party made major gains in the Mountain West, he says, and many of these voters are "populist with a lot of nativism," firmly opposed to the more liberal immigration policies of key party leaders.

A solid block of Democrats who won this month — Jon Tester, James Webb, Sherrod Brown and Heath Shuler included — is inclined to put the brakes on all cross-border activity (otherwise known as globalization): trade, outsourcing and the flow of human labor. Nolan McCarty of Princeton, writing with two colleagues, has provided some empirical data supporting the argument that immigration has led "to policies that increase economic inequality." Significant numbers within the Democratic Party agree with this reasoning.

Globalization "needs to be controlled and slowed down because of the brutal destruction and vast imbalances of wealth it causes," Jeff Faux, a stalwart of the protectionist wing on the Democratic left, writes in Dissent magazine. "The nihilistic vision of the world as an accelerating treadmill of constant insecurity, jobs with longer hours and shorter pay ... the triumph of dog-eat-dog competition ... is a vision of hell."

The protectionist wing will likely hold sway at least in the first few months of the 110th Congress. Over time, however, Faux and his allies are likely to fail. The forces of international competition have proved more powerful than any government, and advocates of aggressive policies to constrain them face a porous, borderless and now highly electronic international economy. Legislation can require American companies to distribute profits to workers, but it will be virtually impossible to enforce as competition razes companies playing by those rules. For the moment, Democratic chances of restoring more equal patterns in the growth of wages are bleak.

Barney Frank, representing members of the House who would like to stake out middle ground, has proposed a "grand bargain." If corporate America agrees to equitable wages, Democrats will back free trade and eased regulations. "What we want to do is to look at public policies that'll get some bigger share of the increased wealth into wages, and in return you'll see Democrats as internationalists," he said.

Even if the deal were cut, the odds are strong that the global economy would prevent American business from keeping its promise. The sooner Democrats realize that they — and, more important, their constituents — are up against a wall, the sooner they will seriously focus their attention on how to climb it.

Biden: Blame Immigration Woes On Mexico (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Filed at 1:12 a.m. ET

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) -- Sen. Joe Biden, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's incoming chairman, wants to get tough with Mexico, calling it an "erstwhile democracy" with a "corrupt system" responsible for illegal immigration and drug problems in the U.S.

Biden, D-Del., was in Columbia on Monday in his first postelection trip to this first-in-the-South presidential primary state as he continues to line up support for his presidential bid.

During a question-and-answer session before more than 230 Columbia Rotary Club members, Biden was asked about immigration problems.

Biden, who favors tightening the U.S.-Mexico border with fences, said immigration is driven by money in low-wage Mexico.

"Mexico is a country that is an erstwhile democracy where they have the greatest disparity of wealth," Biden said. "It is one of the wealthiest countries in the hemisphere and because of a corrupt system that exists in Mexico, there is the 1 percent of the population at the top, a very small middle class and the rest is abject poverty."

Unless the political dynamics change in Mexico and U.S. employers who hire illegal immigrants are punished, illegal immigration won't stop. "All the rest is window dressing," he said.

An even bigger problem are illegal drugs "coming up through corrupt Mexico," he said. "People are driving across that border with tons, tons -- hear me -- tons of everything from byproducts for methamphetamines, to cocaine, to heroine."

Covering a variety of topics, Biden kept most of the crowd in their seats for an hour -- twice as long as scheduled.

"I warn all of you, all of you making more than a million bucks -- I hope you all are -- I'm taking away your tax cut," Biden said. "I'm not joking."

The extra revenue would generate $75 billion a year and pay for a backlog in national security and local law enforcement programs, Biden said.

Biden's appeal for bipartisanship captured Bruce Rippeteau, a former Rotary president who says he's in the Genghis Khan wing of the Republican Party.

He "was saying some important things in a nonpolitical way," Rippeteau said.

"I want to compliment him about what he didn't say," Wilson said. "He never one time mentioned weapons of mass destruction."

Biden will lead the Foreign Relations panel because Republicans around the nation lost seats in the Nov. 7 elections. That tide didn't reach Republican-dominated South Carolina, where the GOP maintained its four U.S. House seats and Democrats kept their two.

Gates May Take Pentagon Job In December (AP-Y)

Robert Gates, the former CIA director who is President Bush's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, is likely to assume the Pentagon post before year's end if he is confirmed by the Senate as expected, officials said Monday.

Eric Ruff, the Pentagon press secretary, said Gates will have his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee early next week, with a vote expected by the full Senate by Dec. 12 or 13. In preparation for the hearing, Gates is receiving a series of briefings by senior Pentagon officials, Ruff said.

Even if Gates is confirmed as expected, it is unclear when he would be sworn in to his new duties, Ruff said.

"It's somewhat of a fluid situation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099059

Another administration official, who would discuss the Gates matter only on condition of anonymity, said that if confirmation goes as expected, then Gates would be sworn in well before the end of the year. No date is set.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination on Nov. 8.

Ruff said Gates, who is president of Texas A&M University, may have university business to attend to in the days following his confirmation hearing, but it was unclear whether this would delay his swearing in.

There has been speculation that the Pentagon transition would be put off until the end of December in order to give Rumsfeld the distinction of being the longest-serving secretary of defense since the post was created in 1947.

Rumsfeld is the only person to have held the job twice. The first time, he served for 14 months, from Nov. 20, 1975 to Jan. 20, 1977. His current tenure began Jan. 20, 2001. If he were to stay until Dec. 28, his combined tenures would surpass the longevity record held by Robert S. McNamara, who served from Jan. 21, 1961 to Feb. 29, 1968.

Ruff said, however, that the timing of Gates' takeover has nothing to do with the longevity record.

"I can assure you that is not a factor on the secretary's mind," Ruff said.

Long Haul A Radar Unit's Journey Reflects Hopes, Snafus In Missile Defense (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

PEARL HARBOR NAVAL STATION, Hawaii -- Towering over this historic site is a radar precise enough to track a baseball hurtling through space at 15,000 miles an hour. But the vessel carrying the radar has sprung leaks and blown out electrical circuits.

Such mundane problems have kept this vital part of the nation's defense against missile attacks stuck in the wrong harbor. If all had gone according to plan, the $950 million radar rig, known as SBX, would be operating now off the Aleutian Islands in Alaska and ready to defend against threats from North Korea. Instead, after a three-year odyssey from Norway to Texas and around South America, the 28-story-high converted oil platform is in Hawaii, 2,000 miles and months away from its final destination.

The journey of SBX is a microcosm of the Defense Department's unfinished missile shield, a dream since Ronald Reagan's 1983 plan dubbed Star Wars. Under President Bush the U.S. has poured nearly $50 billion into the program. The Pentagon says it has put the system on alert more than 10 times and the U.S. already has a "limited" ability to shoot down enemy warheads. Yet the program's high-tech breakthroughs are at times undermined by technical snafus, and real missile defense always seems off in the future.

One big step forward came in September, when U.S. military personnel using satellite sensors, radar and long-range interceptor missiles that are part of the real missile shield shot down a test warhead in space over the Pacific. The success went some way toward answering critics in Congress who have demanded tests that resemble real-world situations.

For defense contractors and the Pentagon, which is spending $9.3 billion this year on missile defense, the September test was a vindication. "The last 10 months have been extraordinary in terms of accomplishment," says Patrick Shanahan, a vice president at Boeing Co., principal contractor on the system that includes SBX. "I think the program has reached its stride."

Mr. Shanahan was brought in to fix the system in early 2005 after interceptor missiles failed to leave their silos in two consecutive tests. The problems prompted the Pentagon to dock Boeing $107 million in contract fees.

Critics nowadays generally concede the feasibility of knocking missiles out of the sky. But many believe the idea is either too expensive or too error-prone to make it worth rushing into operation.

North Korea's recent moves have lent urgency to the debate. The Communist state tested a long-range missile in July and exploded a nuclear device in October, although its tests showed it has yet to master the technology.

The original Star Wars concept conjured up images of space-based launchers blasting Soviet nuclear missiles out of the sky. Today, that idea is on hold, partly because of concerns about militarizing space. The Bush administration's main missile-defense system has ground sites in Alaska and California, where 13 interceptor missiles stand ready to be fired.

The Boeing system calls for early-warning radar to get a first glimpse of the enemy missile launch. An interceptor missile is then fired. As it flies, this missile is supposed to receive the exact coordinates of the enemy missile and, if all goes well, the two will collide in space. It's the equivalent of hitting a bullet with a bullet.

The system lives or dies on highly accurate radar to pinpoint the attacking missile's trajectory. That's where SBX, or sea based X-band radar, comes in. It's an advanced form of X-band radar, which emits a concentrated high-frequency beam to collect images.

Officials say SBX can not only produce detailed images of incoming warheads but also distinguish a decoy from the real McCoy. The Pentagon hopes to capitalize on SBX's mobility -- it sits on a self-propelled converted oil rig -- to deploy it closer to perceived threats and shave critical minutes off response time. At a top speed of 10 knots, though, SBX would take a while to reach a faraway global hot spot.

The Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency oversees several other missile-defense systems that complement the program led by Boeing. For defense against shorter-range threats, Lockheed Martin Corp. is directing the Aegis system, which fires interceptor missiles from ships. It has done well in tests. A separate Lockheed project to build improved satellites that detect enemy missile launches is emerging from years of performance problems and cost overruns.

The overall goal is "layered defense" -- getting several shots at the enemy projectile before it hits American soil. The Boeing system that was tested in September is the crucial middle layer. It has the broadest time window to succeed, but still only minutes. A missile could complete its journey from North Korea to the U.S. mainland in 20 minutes.

See a video2 of the SBX vessel's enormous radar.

Shrouded in a 10-story-high dome, the SBX radar sits atop the semisubmersible oil rig like a giant golf ball on a tee. The Teflon-coated, Kevlar-like fabric of the inflated dome is designed to withstand winds up to 150 miles an hour. Inside, the radar soars toward the roof, its octagonal face covering 4,100 square feet. It swivels on a circular track and can tilt skyward.

The radar, built by Raytheon Co., contains 45,000 electronic modules that transmit and receive data. SBX's radar can send multiple beams in different directions, changing their aim in fractions of a second. That lets the radar track several objects at once and compensate for the rig's movement in ocean swells.

The Pentagon originally figured it would put X-band radar on land and picked out a site on Shemya Island, a speck of rock at the western tip of the Aleutians. But the radar program stalled during the Clinton administration, which feared that building elements of a national shield would breach the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

In 2001, President Bush pulled the U.S. out of the treaty, and the Pentagon soon began developing the X-band. The Pentagon, following an idea of Raytheon engineer David Greeley, at first chose to put X-band radar at sea merely to collect test data on missile trajectories from different angles. Officials liked the idea so much that they made sea-based radar a permanent part of the system.

Boeing bought a Russian-built rig in Norway in 2003 and towed it to Brownsville, Texas, to install engines and adapt the vessel for the 2,200-ton radar and a crew of 100. Around that time, the Pentagon announced it would base the radar in Adak, in the middle of the Aleutian chain, and set the end of 2005 as the target date for its arrival. SBX would be moored in a sheltered port that doesn't ice over and would be well-located for tracking Asian missile launches.

Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska, a staunch advocate of missile defense, nevertheless questioned the wisdom of having such a valuable sensor floating in the treacherous North Pacific. "I hope your people are nautical enough to know what you're doing," he told Air Force Lt. Gen. Ronald Kadish, then Missile Defense Agency director, at a Senate hearing. The general replied that he had reviewed a century's worth of local wave patterns and had confidence in SBX's naval architects and Boeing.

SBX progressed through the next two years despite mishaps in other parts of Boeing's program. In December 2004, a flawed line of software shut down the test launch of an interceptor missile. Two months later, a mechanical support arm failed to retract, again stranding the interceptor missile in its silo. "This was not rocket science," says Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, who had recently become director of the Missile Defense Agency. Dismayed by the mishaps, Gen. Obering toughened the testing plan and drove a shake-up in program leadership at the Pentagon and Boeing.

By late 2005, it looked as if SBX might come close to meeting its target for arriving in Alaska. After trials in the Gulf of Mexico, it was hauled 15,000 miles around South America -- the rig is too big for the Panama Canal -- and it arrived in Hawaii in January of this year. The trip to Alaska seemed around the corner, but in March, alarms went off in SBX's engine room. A leaky valve caused water to flood into SBX's pontoon. The rig had to return to Pearl Harbor for repairs to the flaw, which an independent panel later called a "major casualty."

Then in June, an electrical fault tripped circuit breakers, forcing SBX back into port for two more weeks of repairs. Such problems are typical during the initial "shakedown" phase of a new class of ship, says Tom Alexiou, Boeing's SBX program manager. Most important, adds Paul Smith, a Boeing radar manager, there haven't been major issues in the "far more complex" task of integrating the radar with other ship systems.

In fact, the radar was performing well enough that the Pentagon diverted SBX from its tests to free it up to monitor North Korea's missile launch in July. Then it delayed SBX's preparations for Alaska again so the radar could participate in a test on Sept. 1, the most important U.S. missile-shield trial to date. In the test, an "enemy" missile with a real warhead fired from Alaska was destroyed by an interceptor missile launched from California.

Floating off the California coast, SBX successfully tracked both missiles and their warheads as they collided, says Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly, who oversees the ground-based missile-defense program. It was a "watershed event," he says, because it shows SBX could do its job once it's hooked up to the missile shield's command structure.

When SBX returned to Pearl Harbor in Hawaii last month after the test, the Missile Defense Agency and Boeing laid out a feast on board: a whole roast pig, Alaskan king crab and Hawaiian chicken lau lau. Outside, the rig and its white-domed radar dwarf the sunken battleship USS Arizona and the USS Missouri at the Pearl Harbor World War II memorial. Government tour guides there already are weaving SBX into the local heroic folklore, recounting feats of the radar's precision alongside older war tales.

SBX will participate in another test in December. Col. John Fellows, the Pentagon's manager for SBX, says staying near Hawaii makes it easier to iron out kinks and join the tests, although officials are eager for the radar's permanent deployment. "We're pressured on both sides," he says.

In any case, further issues must be sorted out before the trip to Alaska. The independent panel hired by the Pentagon concluded in June that while SBX "is an inherently rugged and suitable platform," the vessel needs 47 modifications before it goes into service. Among them: a better plan for operating in harsh winters and steps to ensure the rig is protected against being rammed by boats. Senior program officials call the modifications minor and say they have agreed to almost all of them.

The panel also noted that maintaining morale poses a challenge. SBX's crew is composed mostly of defense-industry employees and merchant mariners hired by Boeing subcontractors. Only a handful of shipmates are servicemen. Civilian mariners rotate only every 56 days, much longer than work cycles for comparable oil-industry jobs. Leisure consists of a gym, a basketball hoop on the deck and movies under the stars, though plasma TVs and more DVDs are on the way.

Funding for SBX's mooring in the Aleutians, previously cut in another headache for project managers, has been restored, but construction won't be finished until next August, says Col. Fellows. The latest projection for the trip to Alaska is sometime next year.

Democrats To Receive Bush Budget Warning (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

President Bush will try to work out a deal on spending with the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but will be prepared to veto bills that exceed his total budget or that slice away at defense needs, said Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman.

"With the Democrat leadership, we'll try to be transparent and we'll try to be clear in our concerns upfront, and I hope we can work things out without resorting to a veto. But if necessary we will resort to a veto," Mr. Portman told The Washington Times in an interview about the upcoming budget and the Democratic control of Congress.

Democrats took both houses of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections. Mr. Portman, a former six-term congressman from Ohio, has assumed the role of go-between, making use of his relationships with many of the top lawmakers to find areas of cooperation on annual spending and on thorny issues such as Social Security.

He has spoken with incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate budget committees, and Sen. Max Baucus, who will head the Senate Finance Committee. He also has a meeting scheduled with Sen. Robert C. Byrd, the West Virginia Democrat who will head the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Some conservatives have argued that Democratic control of Congress will give Mr. Bush a sense of more freedom to use his veto powers without causing conflict with congressional leaders in his own party.

Mr. Portman said he expects presidential vetoes of spending bills in the last two years of Mr. Bush's administration. The president has vetoed only one bill in his six years in office. The House sustained that veto, against a measure to expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

"The veto, not to pass the buck, but a lot of it depends on the Democratic leadership," Mr. Portman said. "If they choose to try to work things out, we will be in a position to try to do that. We would rather try to make progress. The president is not interested in scoring political points over the next two years; he's interested in getting things done."

Mr. Portman said a center-right coalition could emerge on issues such as spending and extending the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, particularly since the rate of taxes as a percentage of the economy -- at 18.4 percent -- is higher than the 18.2 percent average over the past four decades.

"It's not that we are undertaxed as much as we need to get our spending in line with our revenue. That's the fundamental basis on which we should be able to build a majority on a number of issues," he said.

Annual federal spending has mushroomed during Mr. Bush's presidency, from $1.86 trillion in fiscal 2001 to $2.67 trillion in 2006. The Congressional Budget Office forecast spending to rise to $2.8 trillion by the end of the 2007 fiscal period. Much of the increase has been in federal entitlements for programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, which have ballooned from $1 trillion in 2001 to $1.42 trillion in 2006.

The director, interviewed last week in his office at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, said opportunities could arise to streamline or cut specific programs. The administration has achieved little toward those goals with a Republican-led Congress.

The White House hopes Democrats are willing to eliminate public education programs that aren't showing results and to put the money into those that are more promising.

Mr. Bush has sent budgets to Congress with the understanding that lawmakers would change the distribution of money, but threatened a veto if the total exceeded his limit. He also has threatened to veto defense spending bills if they were altered by Congress too much.

Mr. Portman is deep into the process of receiving 2008 budget requests from agencies and departments and returning them with suggestions and changes.

He has not received a total discretionary spending cap and said it is too early to determine whether discretionary spending can be reduced.

Potential flash points for a spending fight include the fiscal 2008 budget, the first chance Democrats will have to put together a framework for spending. It will give them part ownership of the federal deficit for the first time and force them to take a position on tax increases.

Contractors Face More Scrutiny, Pinched Purses (WP)

By Griff Witte And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

After riding high for five years, government contractors are bracing themselves for increased oversight, tighter budgets and stepped-up regulations as Democrats take over on Capitol Hill and vow to keep a closer eye on how companies spend taxpayer dollars.

Every company that does business with the government could feel the impact, but contractors that benefited most from work in Iraq and Afghanistan, from homeland security initiatives or from Hurricane Katrina are especially likely to be under the microscope. Big-ticket weapons programs are also expected to garner special attention, and it may become more difficult to get a no-bid contract, according to industry observers.

"The pendulum has clearly swung back in a hard way," said David Nadler, an attorney for government contractors with the Dickstein Shapiro law firm. "Everything contractors do is going to be subject to scrutiny. They need to understand that they're in a different environment."

Most incoming chairs of congressional committees have not said specifically which contracting areas they intend to scrutinize. But the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm, gave Hill leaders some ideas earlier this month.

In a 44-page look at areas in need of oversight, GAO investigators focused substantial attention on contractors. The government spent $388 billion on contracts last year, the GAO said, and much of that money is exposed to "potential waste and misuse" because of the way the government buys goods and services.

Meanwhile, congressional workers are getting ready. In September, the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, began holding seminars for Hill workers of both parties on how to conduct investigations, including sessions on the anatomy of a government contract and skits in which oversight hearings were acted out. About 150 people have attended the sessions, said Jennifer Gore, the group's spokeswoman.

"Younger staff members were not quite sure what Congress's role is," she said. "We knew they needed to get a review on what congressional power really is, how it works, and why it's so important."

Richard Moorhouse, a contracting attorney with Greenberg Traurig, said he is advising clients with high-visibility contracts to be ready to testify on Capitol Hill at a moment's notice.

"They should be preparing themselves," Moorhouse said.

Increased oversight is not the only potential change. Analysts say spending priorities are likely to shift, especially at the Pentagon, where growth has already begun to slow.

During the past few years, the defense industry has been shielded from significant cuts by supplemental spending bills Congress passed to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. But now, some of the military's largest weapons programs may be in danger of being scaled back.

"In general, Democrats prefer people to weapons in their military outlays," said Loren Thompson, a defense industry consultant and chief operating officer of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington think tank. "What that means is that when they are going to buy weapons, they think first of the Army. Those are the soldiers, those are the war fighters."

Some contractors have already begun to feel the difference. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, contractors were rewarded for proposing cutting-edge systems that pushed the technological envelope. But after repeated cost overruns and delays with those high-risk ideas, safer solutions are back in vogue. Earlier this month, Boeing won a coveted $15 billion helicopter program using an updated version of its 50-year-old, war-tested Chinook.

"The notion that comprehensive networking and cutting-edge sensors can solve our military problems has been confounded by the experience of Iraq," Thompson said.

Perhaps sensing the changing environment, Lockheed Martin recently began giving presentations on the state of the defense industry, arguing that military spending is a small part of the gross domestic product.

That logic may prove a tough sell with Democrats who campaigned for office this fall on a platform of cleaning up corruption that has been intertwined with contractors. Former Republican representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.) pleaded guilty to taking bribes from contractors, and Halliburton became a favorite target of Democrats who thought Republicans were reluctant to scrutinize the politically connected firm's billions of dollars of work in Iraq.

"One thing you can be assured of is that we will do aggressive oversight," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), who is set to lead the Homeland Security committee.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), a frequent critic of Halliburton, is to become chairman of the Government Reform Committee in January, and he has indicated that he plans to introduce legislation to put contractors on a shorter leash. His Clean Contracting Act is aimed at curbing no-bid deals, limiting the use of subcontractors and closing loopholes that Waxman says open the door to abuse.

Rep. Janice D. Schakowsky (D-Ill.), meanwhile, plans to revive legislation that would require more oversight of military contractors in Iraq. "This Iraq experience has made the case for aggressive monitoring of contractors," Schakowsky said. "This is a foggy area where billions and billions of taxpayer dollars are being spent, and we have no sense of how or what they are spending or doing."

Industry groups are fighting greater regulation, arguing that such proposed laws would hamstring contracting officers and prevent the government from getting goods and services when it needs them.

"Many Democrats have had the impression, and they are feeding the impression, that contracting is a process that is fundamentally broken. But there's not a scintilla of evidence that that is the case," said Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an industry trade group.

Soloway said he welcomes closer scrutiny of the industry but only under certain conditions.

"It could be largely political, or it could be part of a very substantive look at a very complex set of processes," Soloway said. "If it's the latter, it might be beneficial. If it's just about 'gotcha,' it will exacerbate the problems."

Group Wants Hastert Deal Investigated (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A government watchdog group Monday called for an official investigation into whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert broke the law by pushing for federal funding of a highway project near land he owned west of Chicago.

Hastert (R-Ill.) and two partners turned a profit of more than $3 million last year on land they bought and sold near the proposed route of the Prairie Parkway—earnings that the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington say the investors got because of federal funding pushed by Hastert.

The group is asking the Justice Department to investigate Hastert's actions.

"It looks like Hastert may have broken the law," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of CREW. "You are not allowed to use the legislative process purely for your own personal financial benefit, which is what appears to have happened here."

An aide to Hastert declined to comment Monday on the group's call for an investigation. But when the Tribune reported the story this summer, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the speaker simply made a well-timed real estate investment on the land, located between 3 and 5 miles from the highway route.

"For 26 years, the speaker has been a proponent of the Prairie Parkway to address the transportation challenges in northeast Illinois," Bonjean told the Tribune in June. "None of the properties purchased by the speaker are near enough to the Prairie Parkway to be affected by the proposed highway."

Republicans have accused CREW of being a left-leaning organization. Sloan describes it as a non-partisan watchdog group.

Pelosi-Hastings Meeting Could Signal End Of Chairmanship Bid (FN)

FOX News, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099064

WASHINGTON — House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi will meet Tuesday with Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings, and those with knowledge of Pelosi's thinking told FOX News that Hastings will be told he is not going to be the next chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

Though no formal decisions have been announced and Pelosi aides say the situation remains fluid, they suggest that the meeting at Pelosi's Capitol Hill office was requested by Hastings so he could bow out of the race before Pelosi denies him the job.

"He knows he's not going to get it," said one senior House Democratic aide. "The question is why he didn't bow out long ago."

In comments over the weekend, Hastings left the impression he was resigned to not receiving the chairmanship from Pelosi, due in large measure to his impeachment from the federal bench in 1989 for conspiring to accept a bribe from two convicted racketeers, and then, according to the Senate impeachment trial, lying to cover it up.

Pelosi aides have been scrutinizing the House and Senate proceedings in the Hastings impeachment, FOX News has learned, and apparently don't like what they have seen.

"It's ugly," said one Pelosi aide. "It's just really, really bad."

Incoming Chairmen Offer Different Approaches to Bush Administration

Hastings has public support from many quarters, including from Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who will lead the Financial Services Committee next session.

"Alcee Hastings has served in the Congress for a long time, since the events that were the cause of the impeachment. I think he's entitled to be judged" on his performance since then, Frank told "FOX News Sunday."

No schedule has been set for Pelosi to name an Intelligence Committee chairman except that the position must be filled by Jan. 4, 2007, when the 110th Congress convenes.

Texas Rep. Silvestre Reyes is the most-often mentioned candidate for the post. He is next in line after Hastings. Rep. Jane Harman of California, the current ranking member of the panel, has already been told by Pelosi that she won't be given the chairman's gavel.

An Intelligent Choice For A Key Panel (WP)

By Terence J. Anderson

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

No one can reasonably question Alcee Hastings's qualifications to serve as chairman of the House intelligence committee. For seven years he has been one of the committee's hardest-working members. In 1996 he was selected to represent Congress as a member of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and two years ago he became the first American elected president of the assembly. He is highly intelligent, a fact acknowledged by friend and foe alike, and during his seven terms in the House he has been an effective politician and consensus builder.

Ruth Marcus[op-ed, Nov. 1] and others have argued, however, that Hastings should not be appointed chairman because of the Senate's decision 17 years ago to remove him from the federal bench. Such arguments ignore important facts that should be considered before the next speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, decides on the chairmanship.

First, no "jury" that heard and considered all the evidence has been convinced that Hastings was guilty. In 1983 the trial court jury that heard the evidence and arguments on both sides voted to acquit. Six years later, the Senate delegated the task of hearing the evidence to a Senate Impeachment Trial Committee. The 12 senators on that committee were the only members who actually heard all of the evidence, and there was no alleged crime on which the required two-thirds of those senators voted to convict. One year later a Florida Bar committee examined the evidence and decided that it was not enough to justify formal proceedings that would question Hastings's fitness to practice law. Those who now cite isolated events to argue that Hastings was guilty ignore the rest of the facts. Each of the "juries" that considered all of the facts found that he should be acquitted.

Second, in any fair view, perceived political necessity was a significant, perhaps decisive, factor in the decision to remove Hastings from the bench. Most observers thought the 1983 acquittal ended the matter, and the House made no effort to initiate impeachment proceedings at that time. But that acquittal brought passionate reactions from some powerful officials. Hastings's exoneration meant that the FBI and the Justice Department had shot themselves in the foot. It meant that U.S. attorneys would have to prosecute criminal cases based on evidence gathered and presented by FBI agents before the very judge they had unjustly attacked but failed to remove from the bench.

The other federal judges who had served with Hastings in Florida welcomed his return to active service. It was John Godbold, then chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta, who decided that the situation was intolerable and that Hastings had to be removed. He appointed and chaired the committee that prepared the report the Judicial Conference of the United States certified to the House of Representatives in 1987 for "consideration of impeachment." Only then did the House initiate impeachment proceedings.

Third, senators who had not heard the evidence filed statements that make it clear that some voted for removal not because they were convinced Hastings was guilty but because they believed he had not proven his innocence. For example, Robert Dole, the Senate minority leader then, said he had voted to remove Hastings because for him the issue was, "Would the Senate vote to confirm Alcee Hastings if he were nominated by the President today?" Similarly, Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) explained that he had voted for removal because: "Like 'Caesar's wife,' [federal judges] must be, simply, beyond reproach, even suspicion."

In contrast, senators who had heard the evidence thought the House failed to prove Hastings's guilt. For example, Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Impeachment Trial Committee, and Vice Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), both of whom had heard all the evidence, filed separate statements explaining why they had concluded that it was neither clear nor convincing enough to support a vote to convict.

Fourth, no senator suggested that the Senate should impose the additional sanction authorized by the Constitution, that Hastings should be disqualified "to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States." Those who object to his appointment as chairman of the House intelligence committee because of the Senate's decision to remove him from the bench 17 years ago need to explain why we should not also respect the Senate's decision then that he should not be barred from holding an office of honor and trust.

Hastings could have avoided all this by simply resigning after the 1983 acquittal. He would have earned substantially more as a lawyer than as a judge. He could have successfully run for the office he now holds without the baggage his detractors cite. He did not. He endured those burdens and fought to protect the office of federal judge rather than his own interests. That is not the conduct of a guilty man.

Hastings was appointed seven years ago to serve on the intelligence committee, a position requiring the highest trust and honor. No one questioned his fitness then. His work on the committee has vindicated the decision to entrust him with the nation's most important secrets. Such questions arise now, in the context of one party's loss of control of Congress and in an obvious attempt to undermine the nation's confidence in the leadership of the newly elected controlling party. They are the kind of distraction the new leadership should ignore.

Bush Approval Ratings Slip (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

President Bush's approval ratings fell to the second-lowest of his presidency, according to a new Harris Interactive poll.

According to the telephone poll, conducted between Nov. 17 and Nov. 21, 31% of U.S. adults called Mr. Bush's job performance "excellent" or "good" -- down from 34% who gave a positive assessment in a late-October poll; 67% said his performance is only "fair" or "poor," up from 63% in the previous survey2. The president's lowest approval rating in a Harris poll was 29% in May 2006.

Despite recent changes in Congress, Republicans and Democrats continued to receive low marks. Thirty-six percent of respondents said Democrats are doing an "excellent" or "good" job, better than the 29% in September. Democrats' highest positive rating was 68% in October 2001, a month after the 9/11 attacks. Meanwhile, Republicans' approval rating remained unchanged from September at 24%, and also well below their October 2001 high of 67%.

The post-election poll found that 31% of adults now believe things in the U.S. are going in the right direction, compared with 58% who think things have "pretty seriously gotten off on the wrong track." Last month, 27% saw the U.S. going in the right direction, while 63% said things were off track.

Methodology:

The Harris Poll was conducted by telephone within the U.S. between Nov. 17 - 21, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 1,001 adults. Figures for age, sex, race/ethnicity, education, region, number of adults in the household, size of place (urbanicity) and number of phone lines in the household were weighted where necessary to bring them into line with their actual proportions in the population. With pure probability samples, with 100% response rates, it is possible to calculate the probability that the sampling error (but not other sources of error) is not greater than some number. With a pure probability sample of 1,001, one could say with a 95% probability that the overall results would have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points.

The Honorable Gentleman From Orleans And New York (WP)

By David Segal

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

PEEKSKILL, N.Y. -- With any luck, the most embarrassing photograph taken of you in the 1970s is stashed away in a box that nobody will ever find. John Hall, the newly elected Democratic congressman from the 19th District of New York, is not that lucky.

There he is, standing shirtless and smushed against his equally shirtless band, Orleans, for the cover of their fourth album, "Waking and Dreaming." In the pre-gay-awareness days of 1976, the fellas just sort of seemed, you know, chummy -- perhaps on the way to a group sauna or something like that. But even then, at age 28, Hall found the image a little cheesy.

"The photographer had us take off our shirts for about two minutes during that shoot," Hall recalls, sitting at a cafe here last week. "And the record company said, 'This is a really striking image.' "

Fortunately for Hall, "Waking and Dreaming" featured not just several cubic feet of frisky man-flesh, but also "Still the One," a hit that sparked more anniversary-party conga lines than any other song in history. It even turned up as an ABC promotional jingle for a couple of years, and it -- along with Orleans's other wussy-rock classic, "Dance With Me" -- has ka-chinged in Hall's bank account for some three decades now. He wrote both tunes with his former wife, Johanna, and the pair get paid every time the songs are played on the radio.

Once we forgive Hall for penning such excruciatingly unshakable couplets as "You're still the one who can scratch my itch / You're still the one and I wouldn't switch," let us acknowledge his singular place in American history: He is the first professional rock musician elected to Congress.

No, we're not counting Sonny Bono, because he didn't play an instrument, at least not onstage. And before you start complaining that "Dance With Me" isn't "rock" enough to count, note that before Orleans was founded in 1972, Hall was a sought-after session guitarist who played with Taj Mahal and Little Feat and was once summoned to Bob Dylan's SoHo loft for two weeks of improvised jamming.

"I was in awe of him," says Hall, who was barely out of his teens at the time. "I'd been listening to 'Just Like a Woman' for years -- there I was, playing my guitar over it."

It's hard to believe that the bearded and topless Hall of 1976 and the Hall wearing a suit and tie today are the same man. It's not just that he would blend in at a board meeting of any Fortune 500 company -- he is tall and serious and pretty formal. He actually sounds like a politician, too: He can speechify in that earnest and somewhat tedious way that only politicians can.

No offense, but you've never met anyone who toggles so quickly between gripping anecdote and soporific spiel. With little prodding, Hall will talk about the time in 1974 that Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band opened for Orleans at a high school in Maine. ("He was supposed to play for 45 minutes. He played for 2 hours and 45 minutes.") And he is happy to describe the time he rode in a limo with Janis Joplin to her last show at Madison Square Garden. ("There was no way she could walk down a street and not be recognized.")

But frankly, he'd rather talk up his slate of left-leaning goals, such as raising the minimum wage, weaning the nation off fossil fuels or pushing for universal health care.

The surprising thing is that he has always been this way. His Orleans band mates say that in the '70s, Hall would launch into a politically charged monologue in the middle of a concert, grinding the festivities to a temporary halt.

"It was one of the hallmarks of our shows," says Larry Hoppen, who sang both of Orleans's hits. "We'd be playing, and inevitably John would start going off on the issue of the day. It's one thing to make a passing comment. It's another to do a five-minute, detail-oriented diatribe about nuclear power."

The progressive-minded geek and the virtuoso musician have coexisted in Hall for as long as he can remember. He was raised in Upstate New York, the son of a Westinghouse engineer, and started playing piano at the age of 4. A stellar student, he entered Notre Dame at 16, though he quit after a year, deciding that music was his calling. He wound up in New York, where he and Springsteen -- then leading his first band, the Castiles -- took turns onstage at Cafe Wha? in the West Village.

"We'd play six sets per night," Hall remembers. "It was $6 per guy in the band, plus all the potato chips and ice cream we could eat."

After a few years of session and solo work, he helped start Orleans, naming after the New Orleans rhythms the band members loved. But not long after the group's hits slid off the charts, Hall split for a solo career, which never quite took off. Along with Bonnie Raitt, Jackson Browne and Graham Nash, he formed Musicians United for Safe Energy to fight nuclear power, and he helped organize a series of benefit concerts, eventually packaged in a film and a rather extravagant triple album, "No Nukes/The MUSE Concerts for a Non-Nuclear Future."

Hall returned to Orleans in 1984 and he has recorded and toured with the band off and on ever since. (The group released the widely ignored "Dancin' in the Moonlight" earlier this year.) His only experience with elective politics was a two-year stint as an Ulster County legislator, and the noisy protests he made when the Bush entourage used "Still the One" at campaign stops in 2004. (The song was quickly dropped.)

Nobody took his campaign very seriously, even he after he won the primary. The 19th District is largely made of New York City suburbs that tilt Republican, and for six terms the congressional seat there belonged to Sue Kelly, who in 2004 won 60 percent of the vote. She had $900,000 on hand for the general election; Hall had $57,000.

As with nearly every campaign this year, things got ugly. A few weeks before Election Day, the Kelly campaign jump-started a direct-mail attack, accusing Hall of radical left-wing views and charging that he wanted to raise taxes and socialize medicine. For an added measure of humiliation, one mailing included a reprint of the cover of "Waking and Dreaming."

"The point," says Jay Townsend, Kelly's campaign spokesman, "was basically to say, this guy isn't serious enough to send to Washington."

Hall kept harping on Iraq, and when the Mark Foley page scandal broke, Kelly was sideswiped by questions from Hall and the media about her tenure several years ago on the House Page Board. Meanwhile, late-night satirist Stephen Colbert showed up in the district to interview Hall, and the pair performed an impromptu a cappella duet of "Dance With Me."

Hall won by 4,300 votes.

"I don't quote George Bush very often, but I think I will here," says Hall. "They misunderestimated me."

DOJ_NMG_0099069

In a way, Hall's new job has simply broadened the audience for his lectures, from the Orleans crowd to the C-SPAN crowd. Not that this will change his message. Asked if he will keep sticking it to the Man now that he is the Man, Hall responds with a quick story.

"I already met a couple lobbyists from Raytheon during orientation in Washington, and I just told them what I think is wrong with their missile system. Maybe they'll write checks to my next opponent. I don't care. I got into this race because my wife told me to stop yelling at the TV."

Washington Wire (WSJ)

November 28, 2006; Page A14

We'll soon find out if the loss of both houses of Congress was enough of a shock for Republicans to check into the Hazelton rehab center for spending addicts. GOP Doctors, er, Senators Jim DeMint (South Carolina) and Tom Coburn (Oklahoma) have been staging an intervention so their colleagues don't risk another overdose before they ride off into the minority.

The drama played out on the Senate floor recently as the pair blocked GOP Appropriators from passing spending bills for Fiscal Year 2007 unless they stripped out special-interest "earmarks." You could almost feel the withdrawal shakes coming on, as the Members contemplated a year without pork.

The agriculture bill, for example, includes a new $4.9 billion "emergency" handout for farmers, courtesy of North Dakota Democrat Kent Conrad. Millions more would have been directed to Alaskan salmon research, Montana sheep, New York geese and animal-waste management in Kentucky. The 10 remaining Senate spending bills (and nine in the House) are estimated to contain some 12,000 earmarks. If GOP leaders couldn't pass these bills individually, the scheme was to wrap them all into one giant "omnibus" bill whose innards no one would ever be able to inspect.

Enter the two rebel Senators, who rallied enough of their mates to block any omnibus bill containing earmarks. The result is that the GOP Senate may return next week for its final lame duck days and instead pass a "continuing resolution" that would fund the government at 2006 levels, kicking 2007 decisions over to the Democratic majority in January. By Mr. Coburn's estimate, taxpayers would save about $17 billion if Congress takes this approach.

That prospect has the usual spenders howling that the world will soon end if they don't get their fix. The Social Security Administration is warning that it would have to furlough "every employee"; we'll believe that when we see it. Meanwhile, a source from Housing and Urban Development claimed that "thousands" of poor people "would end up out on the street." Please.

It is true that once Democrats are in control next year they will be able to impose their own spending priorities. But Senators DeMint and Coburn have said the GOP spenders could still impose their policy preferences for 2007 in individual bills if they'd merely abandon their earmarks. Their refusal to do so suggests they care more about their own projects than they do about other policy matters.

All of the special-interest shouting is a familiar bit of bad Washington theater designed to scare Congress into spending more. But what do Republicans have to lose now that they've already lost their majority? On the other hand, what they could gain is some of the fiscal respect they abandoned in recent years. By leaving behind a lower spending "baseline," they'd also make it harder for Democrats to break the bank next year.

So rather than denounce Senators DeMint and Coburn, their GOP brethren should thank the pair for offering this tough love to help break their addiction. It's more love than the voters just showed them.

Stocks Fall As Investors Take Profits (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

Stocks fell sharply on Monday, with a weakening U.S. dollar and tepid sales at retail giant Wal-Mart Stores giving investors the opening they were looking for to cash out some of the profits they've booked during the market's four-month surge.

The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500 index each sank more than 1% for the first time since July 13. The losses were spread across many sectors, including technology and financial services, that had been strong performers in recent months. Overseas markets also retreated.

DOJ_NMG_0099070

Investment pros said the decline was not surprising given Wall Street's strength this year, especially through its seasonally weak period in September and October. They attributed the sell-off largely to profit taking by big institutional investors that are sitting on sizable recent gains.

"This is more of an excuse to sell rather than a real reason to sell," said Marc Pado, U.S. market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald. "This isn't the start of something big."

The Dow sank 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, its biggest decline since a 1.5% slide on July 13.

The S&P 500 was off 19.05 points, or 1.4%, to 1381.90. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index skidded 2.21%, tumbling 54.34 points to 2405.92.

Smaller stocks, which have rallied sharply in the last month, fell more than blue chips. The Russell 2,000 small-stock index was down 20.18 points, or 2.6%, to 772.10. It was the biggest loss since the index dropped 2.7% on July 20.

The declines seemed muted compared to the extended rally of recent months. Even after its decline on Monday, for example, the Nasdaq is up 19% since July 21 and 9.1% for the year.

The Dow is up 13.1% since Jan. 1, and the S&P 500 has gained 10.7%.

Stocks historically sag after Labor Day before recovering at Thanksgiving and rallying into Christmas.

But the post-Labor Day slump didn't happen this year. Stocks moved higher after the Federal Reserve paused in its string of interest-rate hikes as hopes grew that it could slow economic growth without triggering a recession.

Market pros say institutional investors knew a downdraft would eventually come, and were prepared to sell at the first whiff of bad news.

That opportunity came Friday, when the dollar fell to a 20-month low against the euro amid concerns about a weakening U.S. economy. Stocks declined in light trading Friday, but absorbed a bigger hit Monday when most traders returned from the holiday weekend.

Stocks "can actually go down as well as up," joked Phil Roth, a technical analyst at New York brokerage Miller Tabak & Co. "I'll be darned."

The dollar continued to lose ground Monday, with the euro trading at $1.313, from $1.309 Friday.

As stocks declined, some investors looked to the U.S. Treasury bond market as a safe haven. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note fell to a nine-month low of 4.53%, from 4.55% on Friday. Yields decline as bond prices rise.

Also adding to Wall Street's unease was the news out of Wal-Mart. The retail behemoth disclosed Saturday that sales at stores open at least one year fell 0.1% this month, its first such drop in a decade.

On Monday, shares of Wal-Mart fell $1.29, or 2.7%, to $46.61.

Wal-Mart's sales slump overshadowed more upbeat reports from the long Thanksgiving weekend, the first big weekend for holiday sales. The National Retail Federation said Sunday that spending this past weekend was up 18.9% over last year, boosted in part by sales of big-ticket items such as high-definition televisions.

But Wal-Mart is considered a retailing bellwether, and other merchants also posted declines Monday.

Federated Department Stores, which owns big chain stores including Macy's and Bloomingdale's, subtracted $1.27, to $41.84. Electronics retailer Best Buy dropped 71 cents, to $54.37. Discounter Target dipped 64 cents, to $57.07, while Big Lots fell 76 cents, to $22.42.

In other markets highlights:

Technology and financial issues, which have been among the market leaders this year, took some of the hardest falls Monday. Among tech firms, Google lost $20.25 to $484.75 and Cisco Systems fell $1.04, to $25.80.

Among banking concerns, Wall Street powerhouse Goldman Sachs slid $8.49, to $193.11, while rival Merrill Lynch sank $3.38, to $89.21.

Airline stocks descended as crude oil prices rose to $60.32 a barrel, from $59.24 Friday. UAL, the parent of United Airlines, sank $2.81, to $41.63. AMR, which owns American Airlines, declined $1.90, to $32.20. Among the discounters, Jet Blue dropped 92 cents, to $13.79 and Southwest fell 44 cents, to $15.81.

An AG Edwards & Sons analyst lowered his recommendation from "buy" to "hold" on several major hotel chains, sending their shares lower. Hilton Hotels $1.70 to $32.10, Marriott International gave up $1.54 to $44.91 and Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide subtracted $1.92, to $63.46.

Stocks Fall Sharply On Concerns About Slowdown (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Stocks suffered their biggest drop in four months today, as concerns about a weak holiday shopping season fed into broader anxiety about the slowing economy.

DOJ_NMG_0099071

It was a day with little for investors to cheer, with the dollar continuing its slide against the euro and the price of a barrel of oil rising.

The decline on Wall Street spoiled what had been a steady run-up in stock prices in recent weeks. In the past month and a half, the Dow Jones industrial average broke through 12,000 for the first time, while the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose to its highest point in six years.

But some of that investor enthusiasm faded, pushing the three leading stock market indexes into retreat today. The S.&P. 500 lost 19.05 points, or 1.4 percent, to 1,381.90, its first close below 1,400 since Nov. 16. The Dow shed 158.46 points, or 1.3 percent, to 12,121.71. The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 54.34 points, or 2.2 percent, to 2,405.92.

Some of the steepest losses came in the shares of retailers like Wal-Mart, whose troubles reverberated throughout the stock market. The world's largest retailer reported Saturday that its sales in November fell for the first time in 10 years. Despite signs that retailers on average fared well during the first weekend of the holiday shopping crunch, the poor results from Wal-Mart raised questions about how much consumers will spend this season.

"The question has always been whether the consumer would be able to hang in," said Stuart Schweitzer, a global markets strategist with J.P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management. "If Wal-Mart's news is indicative of the potential for broader disappointment, that is worrisome."

With the economy slowing down — the nation's gross domestic product expanded at an annual rate of 5.6 percent in the first quarter but only 1.6 percent in the third — strong consumer spending is needed to keep growth from becoming too sluggish. But as the fall in the stock market suggests, there is still considerable uncertainty about how much of a slowdown could be.

That uncertainty has put strain on the value of the dollar in recent days. On Friday, the dollar's weakness pushed the euro above $1.30 for the first time in a year and a half. The dollar's decline deepened today on concerns that the United States economy would falter while economies in Europe grow stronger. The euro rose to $1.3133 late this afternoon.

The decline in the value of the dollar on Friday came on a light and shortened holiday trading day for Wall Street. Analysts said the losses in the stock market were in part an acceleration of the sell-off that began on Friday after the dollar tumbled.

But other factors contributed to the drop, analysts said, including an apparent desire by investors to cash out. After the stock market's recent rise, some sort of correction was inevitable, they said.

"You've been up 131 days without a 1 percent correction; that's just unnatural for equity markets," said Henry McVey, chief United States investment strategist for Morgan Stanley.

Wal-Mart's Forecast, Weakening Dollar Send Stock Indexes Tumbling (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

U.S. stock markets dropped sharply yesterday, spurred by higher oil prices, a weakening dollar and an unexpectedly glum sales forecast from Wal-Mart.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed down 158.46 points, to 12,121.71 -- a 1.3 percent loss. Twenty-seven of the 30 Dow stocks traded lower.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 19.05 points, to 1381.90, a drop of 1.4 percent. The Nasdaq composite index tumbled 54.34 points, to 2405.92, a 2.2 percent loss.

Investors weren't encouraged by the dollar's performance against the euro, which reached $1.3128 late yesterday in New York. Earlier, the euro traded at $1.3172, a 20-month high against the dollar. The dollar has been falling in recent days on concern about potential economic weakness in the United States and about the country's huge trade deficit and other global imbalances.

The stock pullback came on what retailers called Cyber Monday, a day they hoped would bring in colossal sales on their Internet sites.

Wal-Mart had already been trying to boost sales by cutting prices on items such as the Amazing Amanda Doll (to $69 from $99.97) and a Panasonic 61-inch TV (to $2,297 from $2,597). The retailer's Web site also offered 97-cent shipping on some products.

But Wal-Mart disappointed investors over the weekend when it announced that it expected sales at stores open at least a year to decline 0.1 percent this month. That would represent the retailer's first monthly drop in same-store sales since 1996.

Yesterday's stock sell-off also was driven by a 1.8 percent jump in crude-oil futures, fueled by reports that Saudi Arabia's oil minister may support a cutback in production at the next meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Light sweet crude for January delivery gained $1.08 to settle at $60.32 a barrel.Movers

Wal-Mart fell $1.29, to $46.61.

Dow Drop A 'much-needed Correction'? (USAT)

By Adam Shell
USA Today, November 28, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow, which has been hitting new highs almost daily, suffered its worst point drop in more than four months Monday as investors fretted over the falling value of the U.S. dollar and a weak sales report from the nation's largest retailer.

However, some Wall Street strategists said the 158.46-point drop to 12,121.71 suffered by the Dow Jones industrial average was long overdue given the Dow's uninterrupted run-up in recent weeks.

"It was simply a much-needed correction," says Rod Smyth, investment strategist at Wachovia Securities. "I genuinely believe this (selling) has been building."

Still, the broad market sell-off, which resulted in sizable losses for virtually every type of stock — blue chips, technology names and both large- and small-capitalization stocks — grabbed the attention of a complacent Wall Street caught up in Dow fever.

"It doesn't feel good no matter how high the market is when it starts falling," says Stuart Schweitzer, global strategist at JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management.

While it's difficult to glean too much from one day of trading, a number of theories emerged to try to explain the selling:

·Preserving gains. It's been a big year on Wall Street, and investors sitting on sizable gains with the Dow up 13.1% for the year might have decided to pocket those gains by selling, says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors.

·Avoiding fallout of the slumping dollar. The greenback fell to a 20-month low vs. the euro Monday, exacerbating fears that foreigners would lighten up on their considerable holdings of U.S. stocks and bonds, Johnson says.

A weaker dollar hurts foreign investors holding U.S. securities, because the gains on those dollar-denominated assets shrink when they are converted into such local currencies as the euro. But some debunked the notion that foreigners were selling U.S. assets Monday because the price on the 10-year Treasury bond held steady, a sign that heavy selling from abroad was absent, Schweitzer notes.

·Avoiding Wal-Mart-like weakness. After Wal-Mart Stores said sales at its stores open at least a year dipped for the first time in more than a decade in November, investors were left wondering whether the problem was specific to Wal-Mart or whether it was signaling that the economy is softer than economists believe it is.

Smyth says Wal-Mart didn't have a huge negative impact on trading: "I didn't get the impression investors were worried about Christmas sales." That sentiment was backed by ShopperTrak RTC, which reported that Black Friday sales were up 6% vs. a year ago. In another sign of strength, the S&P retail index fell just 1.2% Monday, less than the broader market.

Stocks Tumble On Retail Fears; Dow Drops 1.3% (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay And Michael Hudson
The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average suffered its biggest drop since mid-July as stocks tumbled, hurt by signals of faltering retail sales, another drop in the dollar and higher oil prices.

Some Wall Street pros also said the stock market was due for a pullback, following more than a month of fresh records and last week's holiday-shortened trading.

The blue-chip Dow slid 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, up 13% on the year. One of the weakest components was Wal-Mart Stores, which dropped 2.7% after the retailing giant reported a November decline in same-store sales, its first monthly drop since 1996. That sparked broader concerns about a weak holiday shopping season throughout the retail industry to end the year.

Four other Dow components fell at least 1.7%, and only three finished in the black, eking out small gains. One gainer was Exxon Mobil, which edged up 0.1%, after crude oil rallied on concerns about supply from the Middle East.

Oil futures for January delivery rose $1.08, or 1.8%, to $60.32 a barrel, though oil is still off 1.2% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Except for energy producers like Exxon Mobil, such moves hurt shares of most companies because higher energy costs hurt consumers' ability to spend on other goods and services through the economy.

Rising interest rates overseas have hurt the dollar recently, a trend that continued in stark fashion yesterday. The euro rose to $1.3126, a 20-month high against the greenback, compared with $1.3097.

DOJ_NMG_0099073

The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fared even worse than the Dow in percentage terms, off 2.2%, or 54.34 points, to 2405.92, up 9.1% on the year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.4%, or 19.05 points, to 1381.90, up 11% on the year.

Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, still figures the market is generally headed higher through the end of the year. But he said stocks were probably due for a short-term drop, considering that the S&P 500 hasn't had a decline of 2% from a high since mid-July.

That streak is still intact, since the broad index now stands 1.7% off its recent high set last Wednesday. "This is the longest period without a 2% correction in 20 years," said Mr. Bianco. "It just shows you how strong the market has been that we have to think in these terms now."

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note inched up 5/32, or $1.5625 for each $1,000 invested, driving its yield down to 4.534%, its lowest level since early February.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1; bonds rose. The 30-year bond rose 10/32 to yield 4.614%.

The dollar was mixed.2 While falling on the euro, the U.S. currency rose to 116.08 yen.

Shoppers Shake Off Housing Slowdown (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — A sharp slowdown in the housing market isn't darkening consumers' moods as feared, suggesting they will continue to be a source of strength in the economy through this year and possibly into 2007.

Results from the first few days of the key holiday shopping season point to increases in retail sales from a year ago, despite a mediocre performance at Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer.

With consumer spending accounting for more than two-thirds of U.S. economic activity, spending gains are good news for the broad economy as it faces a number of headwinds, including the housing slowdown and turmoil in the automobile industry.

“A lot of the worries out there about consumers … are all much exaggerated,” National City chief economist Richard DeKaser says.

The holiday shopping season accounts for about one-fifth of all retail sales for the year and for some retailers, such as those that sell toys, it can account for 40% of annual sales, according to the National Retail Federation.

One fear going into the season was that the slowdown in the housing market would weigh on consumers.

With homes taking longer to sell and prices dropping across much of the USA, Americans might be feeling less wealthy and less in a mood to spend.

But more than 140 million people shopped over the Thanksgiving holiday weekend, spending an average $360.15, up 18.9% from a year ago, according to the NRF.

DeKaser and other economists, including those at Bear Stearns, Global Insight and First Trust Advisors, say the so-called wealth effect of the housing market is far overshadowed by strength in the job market and rising incomes.

“The big picture is, ‘How healthy are consumers?' And I continue to believe we are pretty well off,” says Timothy Rogers, chief economist at consulting firm Briefing.com.

“The underlying conditions (that determine spending) are employment and income growth,” he says. “Those two things are really quite positive right now.”

The unemployment rate was 4.4% in October, the lowest in 5½ years, according to government statistics.

Employers are raising wages and increasing workers' hours. In October, average weekly earnings after adjusting for inflation rose 1.7%, the second-consecutive monthly gain and the biggest increase in more than a decade.

“The labor market is throwing off some fairly significant wage gains to the consumers,” Bear Stearns senior economist Conrad DeQuadros says. “In the face of a housing market slowdown, the consumer has held up quite well.”

Lower gasoline prices are also working in consumers' favor. The national average price at the pump for regular gasoline was $2.246 Monday, down 79 cents from this year's peak of $3.038 in August, according to the Energy Department.

Massachusetts To Sue Big Dig Firms, Alleging Negligence In Deadly Collapse (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

BOSTON -- Massachusetts is preparing a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the companies that worked on the Big Dig highway tunnel project, alleging their negligence led to the ceiling collapse that killed a woman, a spokesman said Monday.

Attorney General Tom Reilly is seeking unspecified damages for repairs, loss of tunnel use and toll revenue and other economic factors, spokesman David Guarino confirmed Monday. The lawsuit was to be filed Monday or Tuesday, he said.

"This lawsuit is more than just about money, although we will be seeking monetary damages," Mr. Reilly told a local radio station earlier Monday. "What this case is has always been about is the tragic death of Milena Del Valle. That could have been any one of us."

The lawsuit, to be filed in Suffolk Superior Court, alleges project manager Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Modern Continental Construction Co. were "grossly negligent" in constructing the ceiling that collapsed. The suit also names Gannett Fleming, the firm that designed the I-90 connector tunnel; as well as companies that supplied the epoxy or ceiling bolts used to hold up ceiling panels.

Four of the concrete panels, each weighing about three tons, fell on a car in which Del Valle, a 38-year-old from Boston, was a passenger July 10. Gannett Fleming also is being sued for breach of contract, Mr. Guarino said.

Representatives of Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Cambridge, Mass.-based Modern Continental didn't immediately return calls seeking comment Monday. Both organizations have previously said they stand behind their work. Representatives of Gannett Fleming also didn't immediately respond to a call seeking comment.

Ms. Del Valle's family filed a wrongful death lawsuit in August against many of the same companies as well as the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, the agency that oversees the $14.6 billion highway project, the most expensive in U.S. history.

The Big Dig replaced the old elevated Central Artery that ran through the heart of Boston with a series of tunnels, ramps and bridges. The project has been plagued by leaks, falling debris, delays and other problems linked to faulty construction.

States Give Failing Grade To Graduation Rates (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

BOSTON

For decades, college gates have opened wider and wider to the American public, with more whites and minorities attending than ever before. But that expansion is under strain in the face of rising costs and faster growth of minority populations long left behind in the march to graduation.

A new report released Monday from the National Conference of State Legislatures sounds the alarm: For every 100 ninth graders, only 18 will enter college and finish within six years.

"These results simply are not good enough," concludes the report, which was compiled by a bipartisan commission over 18 months.

To help more students earn diplomas, higher education and the states that oversee much of the system need to tackle spiraling tuition, poor college preparation, and the lack of help to keep students moving toward a degree, say experts.

"Colleges have to take seriously the responsibility for graduating the kids they admit," says Thomas Mortenson, an analyst with the Pell Institute for the Study of Opportunity in Higher Education. "And if they don't, maybe they ought to pick up the student loan burden of the people who don't finish."

The report lays much of the blame at the ballooning price of a bachelor's degree, which is more than double the rate of inflation. For example, over the past five years, average tuition has climbed 35 percent, adjusted for inflation, at four-year public colleges, according to the College Board in New York. Inflation rose 13.8 percent over the same period.

Two-thirds of college students must borrow money to pay for their education. Loan debt by student borrowers at public colleges jumped from $8,000 10 years ago to $17,250, according to inflation-adjusted figures from the American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

States such as Indiana, Georgia, and Oklahoma are taking steps to aid college students and their families. And reducing the student-loan rate is an "early action" item on the agenda for the Democratic-controlled Congress.

And there are some positive trends. Graduation rates for those who start college are finally inching up after years of setbacks, says Mr. Mortenson. And the share of Americans with postsecondary degrees is higher across all major ethnic categories.

But it's taking students a longer time on average to complete degrees, and the process is saddling them with more and more debt. "The state is short-changed on its return on investment in these students," says the NCSL report.

States have significant control over higher education - and a real economic interest in its success. Wisconsin spends roughly $1 billion on its university system, which generates $10 billion annually to the state's economy, according to a University of Wisconsin report.

Across the country, higher education boosts tax revenues, cuts dependence on welfare, and boosts community service among other social benefits, according to the Institute for Higher Education Policy in Washington.

Despite the payoffs, states have cut back their commitment to higher education, according to the NCSL, shifting more of the burden to those paying tuition.

And the federal government Pell Grant program "has fallen apart," says Mortenson. If grants had kept up with the rises in tuition, the average Pell Grant would be around $10,000, rather than $4,000, he says. Instead, much of the new assistance for students comes in the form of loans.

The financial burdens appear to be making it more difficult for low-income students to complete a degree. Of students starting at a four-year college in 1996, only 50 percent of those from households making $25,000 or less ended up with a bachelor's degree by 2001, compared with 74 percent of students from households making $70,000 or more.

Working while in school also depresses graduation rates. In those same years, 65 percent of those who did not work graduated, while only 31 percent who worked full time did so.

There are also wide disparities in college attendance and completion rates between ethnic and racial groups, with Hispanics and blacks lagging behind whites and Asians.

The costs of higher education, as well as poor preparation for college, are holding back many minority students, experts say.

To tackle the problems faced by disadvantaged students, several states are tying financial incentives to long-term commitments from students long before they enter college.

Indiana is striking a bargain with its poor and lower-middle-class eighth graders: Maintain at least a 2.0 grade point average through high school, stay out of drugs and alcohol, and take the right set of classes, and we'll pay your in-state college tuition.

Last year, some 15,000 eighth graders enrolled in the 21st Century Scholar Program, and 125,000 have enrolled since the program started in the mid-1990s.

"It's increased a lot of the high-school graduation rates. It's certainly increased the number of low-income students going to college," says Nick Vesper, director of policy and research at Indiana's State Student Assistance Commission in Indianapolis.

Studies are only being done now, however, to determine if the program is boosting college degree completion rates.

Mr. Vesper describes the initiative as an "early intervention program" since it works with kids years before they enter the college-application process to get them the tutoring, mentoring, and course work needed to be successful in college.

Oklahoma offers a similar program. Texas has a variation on the theme: Finish college within five years and maintain a 3.0 grade point average and all tuition loans will be forgiven.

The granddaddy of all state-scholarship programs is in Georgia, which launched its HOPE scholarship program in 1993 and has given more than $3 billion in funds to some 900,000 students.

State legislatures also have control over the spending of public colleges and universities, meaning they could in theory drive down tuition increases by curbing spending. But higher education - both public and private - is under tremendous pressure to provide more amenities to students.

"It's a very careful balance and tightrope that we walk in trying to make sure that we appeal to our market's almost insatiable interest in buildings and resources and technology and accoutrements, and then their absolute need and cry for controlled cost," says Mary Grondahl, head of admissions at the College of Saint Rose in Albany, New York.

Panel: States Should Set Education Goals (USAT)

USA Today, November 28, 2006

A higher-education panel created by the National Conference of State Legislatures agrees with most of the points raised by a national commission created by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. But there's one major exception: It says states, not the federal government, must be at the center of a nationwide higher-education reform movement. Higher education “can get short shrift in tough budget times because it has the built-in funding source of tuition,” says the report, released Monday. But, it says, states spend $70 billion a year on higher education and provide more funding and regulation of colleges and universities than any other level of government. The government's involvement centers on funding academic research and financial aid for low-income students, the report says. “Each state's systems, traditions, strengths and weaknesses are unique. States need the flexibility to set their own goals,” says commission co-chair Denise Merrill, a state representative in Connecticut.

Demand for exotic pets may pose threat

A booming demand in the USA for exotic animals, captured in the wild and brought into the country with little or no screening for disease, leaves Americans vulnerable to a virulent outbreak that could rival a terrorist act, suggests a report. More than 650 million critters — from kangaroos and kinkajous to iguanas — were imported legally into the USA in the past three years, according to U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service documents obtained by the Associated Press. Countless more pets — along with animal parts and meats — are smuggled across the borders as part of a $10-billion-a-year black market that's second only to illegal drugs. While exotic pets can be cute and fashionable, The Journal of Internal Medicine estimates that 50 million people worldwide since 2000 have been infected with zoonotic diseases — animal-borne diseases that jump to humans — and as many as 78,000 have died.

Whales have brain cells similar to humans

Humpback whales have a type of brain cell seen only in humans, the great apes, and other cetaceans such as dolphins, according to a new finding by scientists. This might mean such whales are more intelligent than they have been given credit for, and it suggests that the basis for complex brains either evolved more than once or has gone unused by most species of animals, researchers reported Monday in the science journal The Anatomical Record. The brain cell (called a spindle neuron) was located in the cortex in areas comparable to where it is seen in humans and great apes. The finding may help explain some of the behaviors seen in whales, such as intricate communication skills, say researchers.

Parents fingerprinting kids, taking DNA

Many parents across the country are swabbing the inside of their children's mouths to get a DNA sample just in case the youngster is ever kidnapped, runs away or has an accident. News reports about child abductions and TV shows such as CSI: Crime Scene Investigation are helping drive the interest in keeping records that could be used to identify remains, hair or blood. "It's the CSI mentality: that DNA is going to be the answer to any problem that comes up," says Jerry Nance of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. He notes that missing children who are murdered or never heard from again make up only about 2% of the 850,000 children who are reported missing every year.

American Red Cross fined for violations

The Food and Drug Administration has fined the American Red Cross a record $5.7 million for violating blood-safety laws and the terms of a 2003 consent decree. The fine covers quality assurance, inventory management, control of non-conforming blood products, donor screening and blood component manufacturing issues that turned up during a 2005 inspection of a Red Cross facility in West Henrietta, N.Y. Red Cross spokesman Ryland Dodge said the organization is reviewing the FDA letter that announced the fine.

3 GOP-Led House Races Remain In Dispute (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Nov. 28 -- Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) won reelection Monday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required.

Unofficial results announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy by 1,055 votes, or 0.4 percent of the vote.

An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than 0.5 percent.

The race was one of a handful that had remained unresolved across the country since Election Day.

Pryce lost Franklin County, the district's most populous, but she retained her overall lead, thanks to votes she picked up in two other counties.

In North Carolina, election officials said a manual recount of randomly chosen precincts will take place Wednesday and Thursday in the 8th District race between Rep. Robin Hayes (R) and Democrat Larry Kissell. Hayes leads by 329 votes.

And Florida officials will start an audit Tuesday of electronic voting machines in the 13th District House race between Democrat Christine Jennings and Republican Vern Buchanan. The state certified Buchanan the winner by 369 votes, but Jennings contested, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned.

The Campaign Is Still On (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Forget recounts; in Texas, there is an actual campaign. Representative Henry Bonilla, a Republican, faces a runoff on Dec. 12 after failing to gain a majority of votes on Election Day. (Texas is one of a few states that require runoffs when no candidate breaks 50 percent.)

Mr. Bonilla, left, won 48.6 percent of the vote. His opponent, Ciro Rodriguez, led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent.

The race is a hangover from the redistricting battle: when the State Legislature redrew the map in 2003, Mr. Rodriguez lost his seat in another district, and Mr. Bonilla was made safer in his. But the map was redrawn this summer after the Supreme Court threw out the Texas plan, restoring some balance between the parties. KATE ZERNIKE

Poll: Giuliani, McCain, Obama Rank High (WP/AP)

By John Christoffersen

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099077

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Americans have the warmest feelings about former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, according to a poll released Monday that scores the popularity of national leaders.

The Quinnipiac University's "thermometer reading," taken the week after the Nov. 7 election, asked voters to rate their feelings for 20 leaders on a scale of 0 to 100.

Giuliani, a Republican weighing a presidential bid in 2008, scored the highest at 64.2. Obama and McCain, who are also considering a 2008 campaign, finished next at 58.8 and 57.7.

President Bush was 15th out of 20 while his secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, was fourth and former President Clinton fifth.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton scored ninth of the 20 leaders with a score of 49. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic nominee who was roundly criticized before the election for suggesting that students who don't study could end up stuck in Iraq, came in last at 39.6.

Kerry later apologized for what he said was a botched joke.

Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the next House Speaker, improved her standing, moving from last to 12th in a few weeks. The next Senate Majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid, was 19th.

"As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions," said Peter Brown, assistant poll director. "They are well-regarded and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but four in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion."

The telephone poll was conducted from Nov. 13-19. Quinnipiac surveyed 1,623 registered voters nationwide and the poll has a sampling error margin of plus or minus 2.4 percentage points.

Giuliani Tops Most Popular U.S. Politician Polling (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Rudolph W. Giuliani is the most popular politician in America, according to a new survey. The former New York City mayor, a likely candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, tops a list of 20 leaders whose popularity with registered voters was measured in a new survey by Quinnipiac University.

The survey asked respondents to rate their feelings about the 20 leaders on a "thermometer reading" scale of 0 to 100. Mr. Giuliani finished with a 64.2 rating. Trailing closely were Sens. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican, who tallied 58.8 and 57.7. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was the top-ranking woman in the survey, finishing just behind Mr. McCain with a 56.1 rating.

"As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions," said Quinnipiac assistant poll director Peter A. Brown. "They are well-regarded, and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but 4 in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion."

Despite concerns that his liberal views on social issues will hurt him with Republican primary voters, Mr. Giuliani continues to lead the field in nearly every publicly released presidential poll.

President Bush did not fare nearly as well, coming in at number 15 with a 43.8 rating. Former President Bill Clinton topped Mr. Bush with a 55.8 rating and a fifth-place finish. However, Mr. Bush did top 2004 rival Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, who finished 20th in the survey, with a 39.6 rating.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, finished ninth in the survey with a 49-point ranking. Mrs. Clinton is now considered the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi finished in 12th place, with a 46.9 rating. That marks a substantial increase for Mrs. Pelosi, who did not make the top 20 in the last Quinnipiac survey.

"In September, most Americans did not know enough about U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, and those who did didn't like what they knew," Mr. Brown said. "Now, perhaps because everyone likes a winner, she has increased her standing with the American people."

Miss Rice's high rating in the survey was particularly impressive considering she is the only individual placing in the top 10 who has not previously sought elected office. Excluding Miss Rice, seven of the top 10 are considered likely presidential candidates in 2008.

"I was very excited to see how well she did," said Richard Holt, a founding member of the National Black Republican Association. "She'd make an excellent candidate."

Survey respondents also named Miss Rice as the most powerful woman in America, topping Mrs. Clinton 45 percent to 29 percent. Twenty-three percent selected Mrs. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0099078

However, Mrs. Clinton topped Miss Rice in the same survey when respondents were asked which female leader they think is best qualified to serve as president.

Fifty-six percent said Mrs. Clinton is most qualified to serve as president. Miss Rice finished a close second with 50 percent. Meanwhile, 47 percent said they do not think Mrs. Pelosi is qualified for the White House.

Can The GOP Find Its Center? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

"The center does not try to read anybody out of the party," the experienced Republican politician declared. "But the farther you go in either direction, the greater the inclination to read others out." He deplored party purges as "political cannibalism" and insisted: "The center must lead."

That was Richard M. Nixon, about a week after Barry Goldwater's landslide defeat at the hands of Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964.

Nixon was to succeed in reconstituting a Republican center that propelled him to the presidency four years later. But that center could not hold. As J. William Middendorf II recounts in "A Glorious Disaster," his book on the Goldwater campaign with the pitch-perfect title, the movement led by the conservative Arizona senator, not Nixon, shaped the Republican future.

This fall's election defeat was inglorious for Republicans because it ratified Nixon's original worries about the cost of chasing away the GOP's moderates and revealed that the Barry Goldwater-Ronald Reagan political settlement has expired.

You wouldn't know that listening to Republican congressional leaders who still think all will be well if the party just hugs the old conservative faith a little harder.

Thus did House Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio promise "to fight for a smaller, less costly and more accountable federal government." Thus did the great conservative hope, Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, promise to steer the Republican Party "back to the principles of limited government, fiscal discipline and traditional moral values."

But such boilerplate will not solve the new problems Republicans confront.

The first is obvious: The party's credibility on national security has been shattered by the failure of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq. Many Republicans know this, which is why President Bush's biggest problem in his last two years will be not the Democratic opposition to the war but the growing ranks of Republican political pragmatists who want to separate themselves from Bush's Middle East venture.

The second is less obvious but no less important: Pro-market libertarians and pro-family social conservatives are more aware than ever that their respective values and interests do not coincide.

In an article in the latest issue of the conservative Weekly Standard, Yuval Levin, a fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, explains the tension between the market and the family as clearly as anyone has:

"The market values risk-taking and creative destruction that can be very bad for family life, and rewards the lowest common cultural denominator in ways that can undermine traditional morality. Traditional values, on the other hand, discourage the spirit of competition and self-interested ambition essential for free markets to work, and their adherents sometimes seek to enforce codes of conduct that constrain individual freedom. The libertarian and the traditionalist are not natural allies."

Levin acknowledges that the policy fixes he proposes (including health-care portability, long-term care insurance and school choice) are "barely a start" to what needs to be done for those in what he calls "the parenting class." Still, he identifies a central conservative problem.

The difficulty, of course, is that a conservatism that cares only about "limited government," "fiscal discipline" and preaching about "traditional moral values" will shy away from Levin's practical, problem-solving approach by government that might involve -- horrors! -- new or different kinds of spending.

That's one reason the decline of the moderate Republicans hurts the party: The moderates were always looking for innovative ways to use government for practical ends. And as an electoral matter, the 2006 vote proved that if Republicans lose too many of their moderate members in areas such as New England, the mid-Atlantic states and the Midwest, they no longer have a majority. Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, said moderates had, to no avail, warned their leadership of "the consequences of pushing a legislative agenda kowtowing to the far right in our party."

The flight from a solution-oriented politics designed to deal with the pressures on working- and middle-class families had the final effect of driving many of the onetime Reagan Democrats, the "security moms" and disaffected men over to the Democrats, who enjoyed strong gains in the large swath of households in the $30,000 to $100,000 annual income range.

The GOP desperately needs to disenthrall itself from old thinking. Some inventive Republican presidential candidate might study the policy playbook of a politician who liked to condemn "the brain-dead politics of both parties." His name was Bill Clinton.

Crash The Parties (USAT)

By Don Campbell

USA Today, November 28, 2006

I was young and naive — maybe even delusional — when I began covering Congress and national politics in 1972. But I quickly formed several impressions about the men (and the few women) who wielded power on Capitol Hill and in the two major political parties.

Most of them seemed to be decent people who treated political opponents with respect, or at least basic civility. They were motivated by the pursuit of power, to be sure, but did not use that pursuit to justify character assassination of the opposition as the first line of offense. When the times demanded it, they seemed willing to put the nation's interest ahead of their own political interest — not that the two were always at odds. I even liked some of them.

After I left Washington 20 years later, in 1992, my perspective changed 180 degrees. It was as if those who work in Washington and those who live outside it occupy separate universes.

Columnist Finley Peter Dunne's bartender, Mr. Dooley, famously said that "politics ain't beanbag," and I agree. I have a strong stomach, but the partisanship and political slander that in the past decade have come to characterize virtually every utterance have driven me to become nauseated almost every time a Washington politician appears on my TV screen.

I had given up hope and interest in politics until I recently had conversations with two old political hands whose judgment I still respect.

Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Democrat Jimmy Carter's underdog campaign for the White House in 1976, and Douglas Bailey, the veteran Republican consultant and co-founder of the daily online news briefing The Hotline, have teamed up to lead a grassroots movement that promises an alternative to the partisanship that has polarized Washington. The objective of their movement, called Unity08 (www.unity08.com), is to use Internet balloting to forge an independent national ticket for 2008 in which the presidential nominee is from one major party and his or her running mate is from the other major party. Anyone can form a ticket and run, and the organizers hope eventually to attract some recognizable names.

Though such a proposition might sound fanciful, the founders of Unity08 are absolutely serious. To be sure, the technological and logistical hurdles are imposing, but the organizers are methodically moving ahead.

The Internet will be key to Unity08's success. Organizers will use it to raise money and to identify questions to ask candidates on such issues as education, global terrorism, health care, energy independence and corruption in Washington. Unity08 will play down what its organizers call "important but not crucial" issues such as abortion, same-sex marriage and gun control.

The operating premise is that both major parties have been hijacked by extremists on the left and right, leaving a wide swath of voters in the middle without choice or voice. No one should be fooled by the make-nice talk that followed the recent congressional elections. It won't last. But Bailey calls it a "breath of fresh air" that moderates showed some signs of reasserting themselves on Nov. 7.

Bailey recalls that until the 1990s, the major parties traditionally fought over swing voters and split-ticket voters, but he says that both have essentially abandoned that practice. The polarization that comes from catering to the political extremes, Bailey notes, has been exacerbated by cable television news and talk shows that highlight partisan and combative views.

The trend is further fueled, Bailey says, by the entrenchment of partisan incumbents in Congress who owe their political success to state legislators who draw them safe congressional districts and to the Washington lobbyists who line their pockets with campaign cash. Incumbents who, I would add, have reasonably concluded that if they spread enough political pork and constituent service around, the voters will ignore the partisanship that has left them gridlocked on policy issues that matter.

The challenges that Bailey, Jordan and crew face are sizable, starting with the likelihood that political hackers, crazies in the blogosphere and those invested in the status quo — think Washington lobbyists — will try to sabotage the online operation. They will also have to build organizations in all 50 states to get on the general election ballot, after Unity08 nominees are chosen in online voting sometime next year. They are not assuming, as the Howard Dean campaign in 2004 apparently did, that online support automatically translates into turnout on Election Day. They also must create and implement a set of rules that will pass muster with the Federal Election Commission.

But there are just as many reasons to think that they could be a big player in two years: The power of the Internet to organize and communicate, hinted at in 2004, is enormous. By operating mostly on the Internet, Unity08 will have maximum flexibility in deciding when it wants to do things, unlike the political parties, which are bound by rigid schedules and the need to rent convention halls. Jordan sees this as a key advantage.

Moreover, presidential candidate Ross Perot proved in 1992 that you don't have to be aligned with either party to be a major force. He ran one of the wackiest campaigns in modern history and drew nearly 20 million votes.

DOJ_NMG_0099080

Ultimately, Jordan says, Unity08 will be a success if it provides a "jolt of reality" to the two major political parties. Now it's up to the American people to provide the electricity.

Doing The Primary Shuffle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

Move over, Iowa. Make way, New Hampshire.

Four days after the midterm elections, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a former Democratic presidential nominee vying to play that role again, flew to Greenville, S.C. His running mate in 2004, former Senator John Edwards, appeared in Columbia, S.C., the next weekend. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware addressed about 200 people yesterday at a Rotary Club in Columbia. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa had plans to swing through South Carolina early next week after appearing in Nevada as he introduces himself to voters as a presidential candidate.

It is not that anyone is writing off Iowa and New Hampshire. But the Democratic Party's decision to shuffle its presidential primary schedule, so that Nevada's caucus closely follows Iowa's and South Carolina gets a primary week of its own after New Hampshire's, is changing the early rituals of campaigning, forcing contenders to extend themselves in more states.

The change could hurt candidates like Mr. Vilsack, an Iowan, while benefiting others like Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina. But they are all going to be spending more time on airplanes.

"It's a long trip from Las Vegas to Columbia, S.C.," said Jeff Link, an aide to Mr. Vilsack. DAVID D. KIRKPATRICK

Ex-RNC Chief Set For State Party (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Virginia Republicans say they expect Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to be named the new head of the state party.

"I think he's probably the nominee for that post," Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling, a Gillespie supporter, told The Washington Times. "He's got the background, knowledge and experiences to do the job."

Republicans yesterday told The Times that Mr. Gillespie's election appears imminent now that the other front-runners for the spot -- former Lt. Gov. John H. Hager and Chuck Smith, chairman of Virginia Beach's Republican Party -- dropped out of the race last week in a telephone conference call with the state executive committee.

"I know of no one else whose name is still in the ring," Mr. Smith said. "My understanding is that John Hager and I were the only other two names."

"It was a pretty easy sell," Attorney General Robert McDonnell said. "Ed is an extremely accomplished political figure. He is a proven winner from Northern Virginia who knows how to do grass-roots and raise money."

Mr. Gillespie has lived in Virginia for 13 years.

The official election is scheduled for this weekend at the 23rd annual Donald W. Huffman Advance at the Homestead Resort in Hot Springs -- a Republican retreat where grass-roots activists and elected officials kick off the 2007 state legislative campaign season.

Wayne "Bubba" Ozmore, chairman of the 4th Congressional District Committee, said that tapping Mr. Gillespie for the position would be like "putting a Formula One race car on a NASCAR track."

"He's built for speed and has run at high levels, but you can also get bumped and bruised on the NASCAR track, so it could be interesting," he said.

A New Jersey native who started his career on Capitol Hill as a Senate parking lot attendant, Mr. Gillespie has built a strong reputation as a Republican strategist.

In 1994, he was a top aide to then-Rep. Dick Armey, Texas Republican, and helped draft Republicans' "Contract with America," which many credit with winning Republicans control of the House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years.

In 2000, Mr. Gillespie served as a senior communications adviser for the presidential campaign of then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush and as communications director for his 2001 inauguration.

Mr. Gillespie was a campaign strategist for Sen. Elizabeth Dole in 2002. Mrs. Dole, North Carolina Republican, won by the biggest margin of victory of any Senate candidate in the state in more than 25 years.

From July 2003 to January 2005, he served as chairman of the Republican National Committee. He was the first chairman in 80 years to oversee the re-election of a Republican president while maintaining majorities in both chambers of Congress.

He currently works for Quinn Gillespie and Associates, a bipartisan political consulting firm he co-founded in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0099081

Mr. Gillespie's anticipated selection as party chairman comes as Virginia Republicans mull over why they have fallen short in recent statewide races.

Democrats have won the last two gubernatorial elections, and James H. Webb Jr. secured Democratic control of the U.S. Senate by thwarting the re-election bid of Sen. George Allen, a Republican, this month.

Republicans say they must concentrate on keeping majorities in both chambers of the General Assembly. Next year, all 140 seats in the state Senate and House of Delegates are up for election.

The party also must be ready to replace Sen. John W. Warner if he decides to retire after his term ends in 2008 and field a viable candidate for the 2009 gubernatorial race.

Last week, Mr. Gillespie sent a letter to Virginia Republicans asking them to support his candidacy and outlining his vision for the state party.

He said Republicans must be a bottom-up party, foster unity within the party, increase fundraising operations and promote a positive message "that resonates with voters."

"I am proud to be a Virginian," he wrote in the letter. "I am proud to be a Republican. I would be proud to be Chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia, and would work hard to make you proud if you find me worthy of that position."

Court Rejects Maine School Vouchers Case (AP-Y)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court decided Monday not to plunge into the issue of school choice, passing up a dispute over a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools.

A conservative group, the Institute for Justice, had asked the justices to take the case. The group is representing eight Maine families who would receive public tuition funds but for the fact that their children attend religious schools.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and President Bush's homestate of Texas had weighed in, saying in filings to the Supreme Court that Maine is unconstitutionally discriminating against religion.

Vouchers are championed by the president and many conservatives who call them a ticket out of dismal and dangerous public schools. However, those who champion public education say that vouchers divert already-scarce resources from a system badly in need of repair.

School districts in 145 small towns in Maine that have no high schools currently offer tuition for 17,000 students to attend high schools of their choice, public or private, in-state or out-of-state. But religious schools are no longer on the list. Maine's school system dates back to 1879.

In 1980, the state attorney general said the program violated the U.S. Constitution's Establishment Clause. The Maine Legislature made it law in 1983.

Last April, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court ruled that restrictions on tuition vouchers are a valid, constitutional enactment. The court said the state attorney general and the legislature were motivated by a desire to respect and comply with the Constitution rather than any religious hostility.

Dick Komer, the senior litigation attorney for the Institute for Justice, said Maine is engaging in blatant government discrimination against parents who choose religious schools and that it is "appalling that the nation's highest court" lets it continue.

In upholding the exclusion of religious schools from the system, the Maine court relied on a 2004 U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding a Washington state college scholarship program prohibiting the use of scholarship funds for pursuit of a devotional theology degree.

The Institute for Justice said the Maine case gives the justices an opportunity to make clear that its 2004 decision only carved out a narrow exception to the general rule requiring equal treatment of religious and nonreligious options.

In asking the Supreme Court to take the case, the Maine families cited the court's 2002 decision allowing the use of public funds in inner-city Cleveland to underwrite tuition at private or parochial schools if parents retain a wide choice of where to send their children.

The Maine case is Kevin and Julia Anderson v. Durham School Department, 06-132.

No Tax Money For Stem Cells (LAT)

By Sigrid Fry-revere

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

CANDIDATES WHO promised to advance stem cell research fared well in this month's elections. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said that stem cell therapy has "the biblical power to cure," and others have touted public funding for stem cell research as key to finding cures for everything from Parkinson's disease and multiple sclerosis to hundreds of rare immune and genetic disorders.

Politicians are right that stem cells hold the promise of incredible medical progress. But we won't achieve the promised results if we insist on public funding of the research. In fact, government-funded research has proved bureaucratic, expensive, wasteful, fickle and divisive. Since 2003, five states — Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Connecticut and California — have pledged billions of dollars to support stem cell research. But political opposition has prevented all but a few million dollars from reaching researchers. This year, six more states pledged funds — but none have paid up. In 2004, California voters approved Proposition 71, which provided $3 billion in public funds for stem cell research. Two years later, challenges to its constitutionality are still pending. Religious and taxpayer groups lost a first round in court, but their appeals, or any other state attempts to fund stem cell research, are likely to be tied up in court for at least another year.

Luckily for California, several private philanthropic organizations have loaned the state $14 million to start providing grants. This confirms the conclusions of a September 2005 article in the Journal of the American Medical Assn., which found that when public funding for research lapses, private funders almost always step in to take up the slack, often funding projects at a higher rate than did the government.

Other states have had similar experiences. The Ohio governor earmarked $19.4 million for Case Western University for stem cell research, but the Legislature banned it. Funds pledged by Illinois and New Jersey — $10 million and $5 million, respectively — are tied up in legislative limbo because politicians can't agree on what types of stem cell research should be funded and where the money should come from. Only one state got it right: Missouri. This month, voters passed a ballot initiative amending the Missouri Constitution to protect the right to pursue and benefit from any stem cell research or therapies allowed under federal law or available to other Americans. Government funding was not the issue; it was the need to guarantee that research could proceed without political interference. The Stowers Institute for Medical Research was standing by with $2 billion in funding. Once the amendment passed, research began within days.

Such private funders are also more efficient than government at doling out research money. After paying administrative costs and interest on the bonds that will have to be issued, Californians will end up forking over more than $6 billion for less than $2.8 billion for stem cell research.

To be sure, private organizations attach strings. Many want access to lab financial records, and some discontinue funding if dissatisfied with how research is conducted. But such accountability is important in research. And when stem cell research is not a political football, less time and money is wasted on campaigns, bureaucracy and litigation. More important, those who object to the research aren't forced to fund it.

The development of in vitro fertilization provides a perfect model. For years, researchers lobbied government to fund IVF, but amid Luddite cries that "test-tube babies" would lead to societal ruin, funding was denied at every turn. As a result, the federal government didn't spend a cent on the development of IVF. Scientists complained that there would be a brain drain away from the U.S. to countries where such research was publicly funded, and that the U.S. would fall behind in the development of new reproductive technologies. None of these gloomy predictions came true. Today, infertility treatment is a $16-billion-a-year industry in the United States.

The stem cell debate evokes déjà vu. Geron Corp. has already invested twice as much in stem cell research as the federal government, and Harvard University has received more requests for money to fund such research than the National Institutes of Health. Some estimate that the stem cell industry will amount to $10 billion by 2010.

Stem cells hold more promise than any breakthrough since Watson and Crick discovered the structure of DNA. But governments should not make promises that they cannot keep due to political opposition and their own inefficiency. The false hope that the government is taking care of stem cell research will only inhibit private donors and investors from stepping up to the plate.

We should legalize stem cell research in all its forms, protecting universities and private organizations from the uncertainties of political whims — and leave it at that.

Dial Joe-4-Chávez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez is an ally of the Iranian mullahs, a supporter of North Korea, a close friend of Fidel Castro and a good customer for Vladimir Putin's weapon factories. Now he's also a business partner of Joseph P. Kennedy II.

The former Democratic Congressman describes the deal he's cooked up with Mr. Chávez as charity for low-income consumers of heating oil. But it's worth asking what the price of this largesse is to Venezuelans and to U.S. security interests.

The arrangement is this: Mr. Chávez's Citgo -- a Houston-based oil company owned by the Venezuelan government -- is supplying home heating oil to Mr. Kennedy's Citizens Energy Corporation at a 40% discount. Citizens, a nonprofit outfit, says it passes the savings onto the poor, aiming to help 400,000 homes in 16 states that would otherwise have trouble heating their homes. In the process, Mr. Kennedy happens to get a high-profile publicity plug. If you think you qualify, says the television ad that drew our attention to this partnership, just dial 1-877-Joe-4-Oil.

Generous Joe is not the only one polishing his public image here. In the mold of the Castro strategy of sending armies of "doctors" and "teachers" among the Latin American poor, Mr. Chávez is trying to shape U.S. public opinion in the hope that more gringos will come to see the Chávez government as benevolent.

Massachusetts Democrats seem especially eager to help. In a September 29, 2005, "confidential memorandum" addressed to "President Hugo Chávez" and uncovered by a Congressional committee, William Delahunt (D., Mass.) gushed that it was a "pleasure" to have met with the strongman "to discuss your generous offer." The Democrat advised Mr. Chávez to steer his oil through Mr. Kennedy's nonprofit and declared that "from a public relations perspective" the discount oil scheme "is an extraordinary opportunity to address urgent needs of people living in poverty, while showcasing the compassion of your nation."

Compassion? If fighting poverty is the goal, Mr. Delahunt would do better to remind Mr. Chávez that charity begins at home. The U.S. is far richer than Venezuela and since Hurricane Hugo took power in 1999 Venezuelan living standards have suffered despite soaring oil prices. Annual inflation averaged more than 20% between 2001 and 2005, imposing a tax on the poorest. Meanwhile, an insecure investment climate has taken a harsh toll on private-sector employment and shrunk the middle class.

In his eight years in power, Mr. Kennedy's business partner has also polarized Venezuela with his class warfare, rewritten the constitution, politicized the judiciary, the electoral council and military, and announced he plans to rule until 2021. Freedom House now ranks Venezuela 34th out of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere in press freedom. Only the Cuban press is more repressed.

Transparency International puts Venezuela second to last in the Hemisphere in its 2006 "corruption perception index." And then there was that revealing rant against President Bush ("the devil") at the United Nations in September. Even Mr. Delahunt criticized his Venezuelan buddy after that one.

But Mr. Kennedy keeps on trucking. Last week in a telephone interview with the Washington Post, he defended his Chávez subsidy deal as "morally righteous," arguing that the Citgo contribution to his nonprofit is only "one-half of one percent" of Citgo oil and product sales in the U.S.

We dialed Joe-4-Oil ourselves to ask directly whether it is also "righteous" to assist an anti-American tyrant at the expense of the Venezuelan people. In between berating our reporter for daring to ask such a thing, Mr. Kennedy said that Mr. Chávez has done "so much more" for the poor than any previous government. As for democracy, he said there was "ample room for improvement in the ways that people get elected in Venezuela as well as in Florida." Mr. Chávez chose his partner well.

Israeli Premier Makes An Offer To Palestinians (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 27 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, trying to build on a shaky cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, on Monday offered Palestinians a series of incentives, including negotiations and a prisoner release, if they turned away from violence.

The offer was made in what was billed as a major policy speech, but it contained little that was new. The timing was important, though, because Mr. Olmert and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, are eager to bolster their own political positions, begin a serious dialogue and stop a bloody cycle of violence.

President Bush will be in Jordan this week to discuss Iraq and other regional issues. On Sunday, Jordan's king, Abdullah II, warned of "the strong potential of three civil wars in the region, whether it's the Palestinians, that of Lebanon or of Iraq."

Expectations are high that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice may come here after Jordan to try to solidify the fragile attempt at reconciliation that Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert are discussing, which may include an extension of the cease-fire to the West Bank.

In his speech, Mr. Olmert appealed to Palestinians to turn away from militant resistance and make a commitment to peaceful negotiations for an independent state. "You, the Palestinian people," he said, "are standing in these days at an historic crossroads."

If the Palestinians can form a new unity government that satisfies international standards and release a captured Israeli soldier, Mr. Olmert said, he will respond by immediately meeting with Mr. Abbas, releasing hundreds of Palestinian prisoners, reducing checkpoints and moving toward a further withdrawal of Israeli settlers from the occupied West Bank.

He promised that Israel would also then release to the Palestinian Authority the $50 million a month in taxes and duties that Israel has collected for the Palestinians but withheld — more than $500 million so far this year — contending that Hamas, the governing Palestinian faction, is a terrorist group.

But those steps, essentially confidence-rebuilding measures, are far short of serious negotiations to end a conflict that is nearly 60 years old.

One of the new elements in the speech was more subtle, an Israeli official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the content of the speech publicly. He pointed to Mr. Olmert's praise for moderate Arab countries like Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Persian Gulf states that "strive for a peaceful solution to the conflict between us." Mr. Olmert said he found parts of a 2002 Saudi peace initiative to be "positive," the first time an Israeli leader has done so, the official said.

The Saudi initiative, supported by the Arab League, offered normal relations with Israel in return for an Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 boundaries, the establishment of a Palestinian state and a just solution to the issue of Palestinian refugees. Mr. Olmert has said that Israel will not return to the borders predating the 1967 Arab-Israeli war but that it is willing to negotiate land swaps.

"I intend to invest efforts in order to advance the connection" with the moderate Arab states, he said, "and strengthen their support of direct bilateral negotiations between us and the Palestinians."

Palestinian reaction was cautious. Hamas, which does not recognize Israel's right to exist, was unenthusiastic. A spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government, Ghazi Hamad, said Mr. Olmert had not specified borders and was not willing to release enough prisoners. Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator and aide to Mr. Abbas, said that "most important is to sustain the cease-fire" and extend it to the West Bank "in the next few days." That would "pave the way for a political horizon," he said.

Within hours of Mr. Olmert's address, delivered in the Negev town of Sde Boker at a commemoration for Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, Palestinian militants in Gaza fired two rockets toward Sderot in Israel, despite the cease-fire. One landed in Gaza, the other in the Sderot cemetery. There were no reported casualties.

Responsibility for the rocket fire was taken by Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, a group that belongs to Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction. Mr. Erekat asked for patience.

The militants said they were responding to the killing of two Palestinians and the arrest of 15 in an Israeli raid on Monday in the West Bank, where a truce is not in effect and where Israel discovered a bomb factory on Sunday.

One of the dead was a militant commander, Abdel Razek Bahar, 22, of the Popular Resistance Committees; the other was a passer-by, Fatma Nezal, a 55-year-old woman, Palestinians said. The Israeli Army said its forces had been fired on and were returning fire.

Mr. Olmert argued to the Palestinians that the election of Hamas and "the uncompromising extremism of your terror organizations" have not brought Palestinians closer "to achieving the goal that I'm convinced many of you share to establish a Palestinian state." Hamas argues that Israel does not make concessions through negotiations, but only when faced with "resistance to occupation."

Mr. Olmert said that "in the framework" of talks and the "road map," an internationally backed outline for peace negotiations, Israel "will agree to the evacuation of many territories and communities we have created," a reference to Jewish settlements built since 1967 in the West Bank, which are regarded as illegal by much of the world. Mr. Olmert was elected in March on a program to carry out a withdrawal of up to 80,000 Israeli settlers from part of the West Bank.

But with the violence in and around Gaza and the war last summer with Hezbollah in Lebanon, the idea of unilateral withdrawals has been sharply criticized in Israel, and Mr. Olmert shelved his plan. He seems to be trying to revive the idea, but in the context of talks with Mr. Abbas.

Olmert 'ready To Free Jailed Palestinians' (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

The Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert said publicly for the first time on Monday that Palestinian prisoners would be released if a captured Israeli soldier were freed first.

Mr Olmert also offered humanitarian concessions in return for an end to violence soon after a truce was announced in the Gaza Strip and days ahead of a visit by George W. Bush, US president, to neighbouring Jordan for talks with Iraqi prime minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The Palestinians said they were ready for peace talks immediately but Mr Olmert set various conditions before the resumption of any direct discussions. The conditions included the release of Corporal Gilad Shalit, captured in June, and the formation of a new government to replace the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

Palestinians welcomed the possibility of efforts to ease humanitarian conditions, made worse under a western aid boycott since Hamas came to power in March. But they still doubted Israel's intention to create a Palestinian state that is viable and settle thorny issues that remain at the heart of the conflict, such as the division of Jerusalem and refugees.

Mr Olmert made no mention of an earlier plan to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank, a policy shelved after the summer war against Hizbollah in Lebanon.

"I think the Israelis are working towards something like parallel unilateralism whereby both sides make moves, perhaps towards some sort of interim Palestinian state, but the process falls short of full bilateralism," said an advisor to the Palestinian leadership.

Mr Olmert did make reference to an initiative recently revamped by moderate Arab states, offering full normalisation of relations with Israel in return for an internationally recognised Palestinian state.

Countries such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan have been pressing Washington over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying it would make it easier for them to present a common front on a host of regional crises, from the violence in Iraq to Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"I have been following with great appreciation the serious efforts made by these [Arab] states to bring about a cessation of violence in the region and I respect their sincere desire to create a new atmosphere between us," said Mr Olmert.

Mr Bush was expected to focus on Iraq during his visit to the Jordanian capital Amman tomorrow (weds) and Thursday. Palestinian officials also said there was a possibility of Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's Palestinian president, meeting Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, also in Amman this week.

No talks between Mr Bush and Ms Rice and any Israeli officials were scheduled. "At this point in time, it's probably best if Bush were not to meet any Israelis," said an Israeli government official.

Olmert Urges Palestinians To Seek Peace (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, November 28, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert reached out to the Palestinians on Monday in one of his most conciliatory speeches yet, saying he was prepared to grant them a state, release desperately needed funds and free prisoners if they choose the path of peace.

Olmert's remarks sealed a dramatic policy shift and built on a day-old truce meant to end five months of violence in the Gaza Strip. But new rocket attacks by Palestinian militants threatened the latest rapprochement.

"I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," Olmert said.

"We cannot change the past and we will not be able to bring back the victims on both sides of the borders," he said. "All that we can do today is stop additional tragedies."

Olmert appealed to the Palestinians to form a new, moderate Cabinet committed to carrying out a U.S.-backed peace plan and securing the release of a captured Israeli soldier.

Once such a government was established, Olmert said, he would call for an immediate meeting with the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, "to have a real, open, honest, serious dialogue between us."

Palestinian legislator Saeb Erekat, a top Abbas aide, said the Palestinians were ready to negotiate a final peace deal.

"I believe Mr. Olmert knows he has a partner, and that is President Abbas. He knows that to achieve peace and security for all, we need to shoot for the end game," Erekat said.

But the Palestinian Cabinet, led by Hamas militants who reject Israel's right to exist, accused Olmert of posturing.

"This is a conspiracy. This is a new maneuver. Olmert is speaking about the Palestinian state without giving details about the borders," said Ghazi Hamad, a government spokesman.

Olmert's speech raised the diplomatic stakes ahead of President Bush's scheduled trip to neighboring Jordan this week for talks with Iraqi leaders.

Erekat said it was possible Abbas would meet with Bush there, but Israeli officials denied that Abbas and Olmert might meet on the sidelines of the Bush visit.

Olmert was elected in March promising to set Israel's final borders with the Palestinians by uprooting isolated communities dotted all over the West Bank while holding on to major settlement blocs. Israel, Olmert said, would act unilaterally without a Palestinian peace partner — something it appeared inclined to conclude because of Hamas' violently anti-Israel ideology.

But a summer war with Lebanese guerrillas, which many Israelis blamed on their unilateral pullout from southern Lebanon six years ago, left Israelis cool to ceding more territory, and Olmert shelved that plan.

His speech Monday signaled a final break with that program — and an attempt to entice the Palestinians back to the negotiating table by outlining likely Israeli concessions under a future peace deal.

"We, the state of Israel, will agree to the evacuation of many territories and the settlements that we built there. This is extremely difficult for us, like the splitting of the Red Sea. We will do it for real peace," he said.

Israel would pull out of West Bank land and uproot settlements under a peace deal, Olmert said.

DOJ_NMG_0099086

In return for a serious Palestinian push for peace, he said, Israel would be prepared to reduce checkpoints that have severely restricted movement in the West Bank; release hundreds of millions of dollars in funds frozen after Hamas took power in March; and free some of the thousands of Palestinian prisoners Israel holds if Hamas-linked militants release — alive and healthy — an Israeli soldier they captured in June.

The freezing of funds has created great hardship in the Palestinian territories by rendering the Hamas government unable to pay full salaries to its civil servants, who provide for one-third of the Palestinian people.

A significant prisoner release would be a major confidence-building gesture because prisoners hold great weight in Palestinian society.

Israeli government officials said they had not ruled out releasing Palestinian uprising leader Marwan Barghouti, who is serving five life sentences for masterminding deadly attacks.

In exchange for Israeli concessions, Olmert said, Palestinians would have to renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to live in peace and security and give up their demands to allow refugees from the 1948 Mideast War to return to their homes in what is now Israel.

"The uncompromising extremism of your terror organizations ... hasn't brought you closer to achieving the goal that I'm convinced many of you share — to establish a Palestinian state," he said.

Hamad, the Palestinian government spokesman, said Palestinians would not abandon the fight for refugees.

"It is a main part of the Palestinian cause," he said.

Olmert's offer to revive stalled peace talks came a day after the two sides began observing a cease-fire in Gaza, raising hopes new peace efforts would follow.

Palestinian militants violated the cease-fire by launching two rockets at Israel on Monday. No one was injured, but Israel has threatened to strike back if rocket attacks increase.

The Army of Islam, a militant group linked to Hamas which claimed responsibility for seizing the Israeli soldier in June, has refused to abide by a cease-fire with Israel, according to an Internet statement posted on Monday.

Erekat said he was working with the Israelis to expand the cease-fire to the West Bank and hoped to have an agreement within days. Israeli officials said they would wait to see what happens in Gaza first.

"If the cease-fire in Gaza works, I hope it will be possible to transfer that more positive reality to the West Bank as well," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said.

Israeli Leader Olmert Makes Peace Overtures (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Seeking to build on a shaky cease-fire with the Palestinians, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert offered Monday to free prisoners, lift checkpoints and release funds withheld from the Palestinian Authority in return for decisive steps toward peace.

In one of his most conciliatory speeches, Olmert spelled out Israel's likely concessions under a final peace accord, including a withdrawal of its troops and many of its settlements from the West Bank, and the establishment of a Palestinian state.

"I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," he said during a ceremony at the tomb of David Ben-Gurion, Israel's founding father.

The offer was a switch for Olmert, who declared during his election campaign last spring that no Palestinian leader was capable of making a deal with Israel. Since his election, he has worked to isolate the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

Monday, he invited the Palestinians to help negotiate a lasting settlement, saying they stand at a "historic crossroads."

Hours after the speech, two rockets fired from the Gaza Strip fell harmlessly in the Israeli border town of Sderot, violating a truce started two days ago and threatening to undercut U.S.-backed diplomatic steps toward a meeting between Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Palestinian leaders reacted to Olmert's initiative with caution and skepticism.

"We want serious negotiations," said Nabil Abu Rudaineh, a spokesman for Abbas, whose Fatah Party is more moderate than Hamas. The spokesman welcomed the prospect of a release of prisoners and funds but added: "We want to see acts, not just words."

Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas government spokesman, dismissed the Israeli leader's speech as "a new maneuver" but did not reject the idea of talks between the two sides.

"Olmert is speaking about the Palestinian state without giving details about the borders," the spokesman said.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Bush administration viewed Olmert's speech as "constructive" and was working with moderate Arab states to help Israel and the Palestinians overcome their differences.

DOJ_NMG_0099087

President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plan to visit Jordan on Wednesday, for talks about the conflicts here and in Iraq.

Olmert spelled out his conditions for a revival of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, which collapsed nearly six years ago at the start of a Palestinian uprising.

First, he said, the Palestinians must release Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit, whose capture in a cross-border raid by Hamas and other armed groups in June set off five months of fighting that the weekend cease-fire accord aimed to halt.

And, he said, the Palestinians must establish a new government committed to principles set by the United States and other Western governments but so far rejected by Hamas: recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous Israeli-Arab peace accords.

On those terms, Olmert said he would invite Abbas "to meet with me immediately in order to conduct a real, open, genuine and serious dialogue" aimed at the creation of "an independent and viable Palestinian state."

The captured soldier's safe return, Olmert added, would bring about the release of "numerous Palestinian prisoners, including ones who were sentenced to lengthy prison terms, in order to increase the trust between us."

Also, he said, the Palestinian government would get hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue that Israel collected but withheld after Hamas came to power in March. Checkpoints would be lifted, easing travel in the Israeli-occupied West Bank.

Both of Olmert's conditions seem attainable. Negotiations over an exchange of Palestinian prisoners for Shalit have made progress in recent days under Egyptian mediators, who reportedly have persuaded Hamas to reduce their prisoner list from 1,400 to a few hundred.

Disagreement remains, however, on whether the Israeli soldier should be freed first.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, tentatively has agreed to step down in favor of a unity government made up of Hamas and more moderate groups and led by a technocrat not affiliated with any party.

Talks on the makeup of such a government have dragged. But Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign-policy chief, who met recently with Abbas, said Monday that "something is moving" and a new government is "pretty near."

Palestinian leaders say a unity government would give Abbas exclusive authority to negotiate with Israel. Such a formula, they say, would make it unnecessary for Hamas to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

Olmert's critics in Israel worry that Hamas, flush from an arms buildup in Gaza, would pull the strings of any government that emerges and block any significant concessions to Israel. They say the cease-fire will damage Israel by allowing Hamas to stockpile weapons more freely.

But the Israeli leader's peace initiative has breathed a new sense of purpose into his coalition government, which has been increasingly unpopular since the country's inconclusive summer war in Lebanon.

In his speech, Olmert said leaving the West Bank would be "extremely difficult for us, akin to the parting of the Red Sea," but said he would agree to a pullout if the Palestinians "stop the terror..., recognize our right to live in peace" and stop demanding a return of all Palestinian refugees.

Olmert's initiative was already being threatened Monday by militant resistance. The armed wing of Fatah said it fired rockets from Gaza to protest Israel's ongoing operations against fighters in the West Bank, which is not covered by the truce.

The rocket attack followed an Israeli raid on the West Bank town of Qabatiya, where Israeli soldiers killed a 22-year-old male Palestinian fighter and a 57-year-old woman during an exchange of gunfire. The Israelis said the woman tried to pick up the dead man's gun; Palestinian witnesses said she was trying to help him get medical attention.

Special correspondent Maher Abukhater in the West Bank contributed to this report.

Get Real, Hamas (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

WHETHER THE impetus was a shaky cease-fire in the Gaza Strip or President Bush's visit to the Middle East, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday unexpectedly extended an olive branch to the Palestinians. If the Palestinian Authority — including the Islamic party Hamas — doesn't respond in kind, it will be yet another golden opportunity for Mideast peace squandered.

Speaking against the backdrop of a truce designed to end months of violence in Gaza, Olmert offered to engage Palestinians in new talks to create something even many liberal Israelis once considered unthinkable: an independent Palestinian state.

Declaring that "I hold out my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbors in the hope that it won't be returned empty," Olmert offered to uproot Jewish settlements in the West Bank, reduce the number of checkpoints, unfreeze funds withheld from the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority and release "numerous Palestinian prisoners, including ones who are sentenced to lengthy prison terms."

DOJ_NMG_0099088

In exchange, the nascent state of Palestine, and its Hamas-led Cabinet, would have to recognize Israel's right to exist, and Hamas would have to return Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June. The stage would then be set for negotiations toward the two-state solution envisioned in the "road map" for peace endorsed in 2002 by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union.

The timing of Olmert's initiative could cause him political problems at home. Given Israel's unsatisfying war against Hezbollah in Lebanon last summer, continued violence in the Gaza Strip and disarray in the Palestinian Authority, Olmert was expected to shy away not just from negotiations but from his own proposal for unilateral Israeli withdrawal from some occupied territories.

Especially delicate is Olmert's willingness to trade captured Palestinian prisoners for Shalit, considering that when Hezbollah guerrillas from Lebanon kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in July for the express purpose of forcing a prisoner swap, Israel responded with a retaliatory attack that eventually killed 1,200 Lebanese (most of them civilians) and 157 Israelis.

It would be a tragedy, most of all for the Palestinians, if Olmert's initiative were rebuffed. Hamas is not being asked to approve of the creation of Israel half a century ago, only to recognize that the modern Jewish state is a legal government endorsed by the United Nations and deserving of security. It's not enough for Hamas to enter into a hudna, or 10-year truce — a scenario floated by Ahmed Yousef, an advisor to Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniya. Hamas' recognition should be a nonnegotiable issue both for Israel and the United States.

The late Yasser Arafat dawdled and dissembled for years before finally accepting Israel's existence, a belated accommodation to reality that led to a White House invitation for the erstwhile terrorist and the creation of the Palestinian Authority. If Hamas is willing to recognize the same fact of life, the benefits for the Palestinians could be even more dramatic.

Rice May See Olmert, Abbas Separately (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 28, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice may confer separately with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas while she and President Bush are in the Mideast this week, but the U.S. is unlikely to broker a direct meeting between the Mideast leaders, a U.S. official said Monday.

Israeli officials also rejected the possibility of a summit between Abbas and Olmert on the sidelines of Bush's visit to neighboring Jordan later this week. Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin said the sides were discussing when the leaders would meet, but no date had been set.

A summit between Olmert and Abbas would represent a renewed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians, especially if the meeting carried the imprimatur of the United States. Moderate Arab states allied with the United States have been urging more forceful U.S. involvement, possibly including a three-way peacemaking summit in the mold of the groundbreaking Camp David accords.

Olmert, seeking to build on a shaky cease-fire with the Palestinians, offered Monday to reduce checkpoints, release frozen funds and free prisoners in exchange for a serious push for peace by the Palestinians.

Olmert said that if the Palestinians establish a new, moderate Cabinet committed to carrying out the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan and securing the release of a captured Israeli soldier, then he would call for an immediate meeting with Abbas "to have a real, open, honest, serious dialogue."

In what was billed as a major policy speech, Olmert said Israel would also pull out of the West Bank and uproot settlements under a final peace deal.

Rice may see Olmert in Jerusalem and Abbas at his nearby West Bank headquarters on Thursday, the U.S. official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice's schedule is not definite. The official suggested that despite encouraging signs that both sides seem interested in new peace efforts, the United States does not want to rush a two- or three-way meeting.

A lasting peace deal between Israel and its Palestinian neighbors is one of Bush's main foreign policy goals, but it has seemed remote for much of his presidency. Bush is pledged to seeking an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. Major obstacles include the fate of large Israeli settlements on land the Palestinians claim in the West Bank, and the future of Jerusalem.

Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan want the United States to resume its traditional role as shepherd or go-between for the two sides, arguing that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is key to defusing other Mideast problems. Rice may meet with those Arab allies as well as other friendly Persian Gulf nations on the sideline of a Mideast democracy and development session in Dead Sea, Jordan this week. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict would be high on that agenda.

Olmert's offer to restart long-stalled peace talks came a day after the two sides began observing a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip. The cease-fire is meant to end five months of widespread violence in the coastal area.

DOJ_NMG_0099089

Relations between Israel and the Palestinians, rocky after more than five years of fighting, further plummeted in January when Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Israel cut off ties with the Hamas-led Cabinet and froze the transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to their government to try to pressure the Islamic group to recognize Israel and renounce violence.

Tensions exploded in June when Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid, sparking a wide-scale Israeli offensive in Gaza that killed more than 300 Palestinians, scores of them civilians. Five Israelis have also been killed in the violence.

N. Korea Nuke Envoy Arrives In Beijing (AP)

By Audra Ang

AP, November 28, 2006

North Korea's nuclear envoy flew into Beijing on Tuesday as his counterparts from the United States, China, South Korea and Japan gathered to hammer out plans to restart talks on dismantling the reclusive nation's nuclear weapons program.

The arrival of North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan has heightened expectations he may meet U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, although no plans have been announced.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a meeting between Hill and Kim is "certainly an open possibility."

"The issue for us is to make sure we are extremely well-planned and ready for the six-party talks, which we do anticipate will get going at some point very soon," Hill said when he arrived in the Chinese capital on Monday.

Officials have yet to determine an exact date for the six-nation disarmament negotiations, which also involve Russia.

Hill met with South Korea's nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, and China's negotiator, Wu Dawei, Tuesday morning, said Susan Stevenson, the spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. She did not have any details on the talks.

Japan's representative Kenichiro Sasae told Japanese reporters that he had held talks with Wu and Hill separately but denied that there were any plans for multilateral discussions between the negotiators.

In Tokyo, Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Sasae and Wu discussed plans for the nuclear talks and bilateral relations.

"We are naturally exchanging opinions on what kind of results the resumption of the six-party talks should produce," Shiozaki said.

An unannounced meeting between Hill and Kim last month in Beijing led to North Korea agreeing to return to the arms negotiations amid heightened tensions after its first nuclear test on Oct. 9.

The talks have been stalled for more than a year because of North Korean anger over financial sanctions imposed by the United States.

Chun has said getting preparations right for progress at the talks was more important than setting a date for restarting the negotiations.

"We will mainly focus on the procedure of the talks as it is essential to accomplish substantial progress rather than talking just for the sake of talking," he told reporters after arriving in Beijing on Monday.

The six-nation talks were last held in November 2005 when the envoys failed to make progress on implementing an earlier agreement, in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"The holding of the six-party talks is on the horizon, so I hope to discuss ways to make progress in the six-way talks, as well as ways for Japan and China to cooperate over the issue," Japan's Sasae said, according to Kyodo News.

Hill said he will stay in Beijing "a couple of days" and then go to Seoul and Tokyo.

US, Chinese Leaders Discuss North Korea, Darfur (AFP)

AFP, November 28, 2006

US President George W. Bush held talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao on North Korea's nuclear program and developments in Sudan's troubled Darfur region, a White House spokesman said.

Bush spoke with Hu during his flight to the Baltics, where the US president will visit Estonia and attend a NATO summit in neighbouring Latvia.

Bush asked for "continued Chinese leadership on various international issues such as the situation in North Korea and Darfur," said the spokesman, Gordon Johndroe, who had arrived in the Estonian capital Tallinn ahead of Bush.

"The two presidents reviewed their good meeting in Hanoi on the margins of the APEC summit and agreed that US-China cooperation is moving forward well, to the benefit of both the American and Chinese people," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099090

The leaders held talks on November 19 on the sidelines of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in Vietnam.

Washington and Beijing have been cooperating to try to relaunch talks aimed at getting North Korea to give up its nuclear activities.

The two countries -- veto-holding members of the UN Security Council -- have also been working to encourage Sudan to allow an international peacekeeping force into Darfur, amid a grave humanitarian crisis there.

Estonian Leader Voices Worry Over Russia (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia, Nov. 27 -- On the eve of the first visit to this tiny Baltic country by a sitting U.S. president, Estonia's new president voiced concern Monday over the poisoning death of a prominent Kremlin critic in London, portraying it as another worrisome signal about the political situation in Russia.

Toomas Hendrik Ilves, 52, grew up in New Jersey and spent 23 years in the United States before renouncing his U.S. citizenship. He said he would not speculate about who was behind the death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. But he said in an interview, "If you see a critic of the Kremlin die with a radioactive chemical polonium that is not one of your regularly available commercial chemicals but rather is one that falls under the purview of state regulation, then it's cause for concern."

He also pointed to the case of another Kremlin critic, journalist Anna Politkovskaya, whose recent killing Litvinenko was investigating. "Coming on the heels of the murder of Politkovskaya -- these are all things that should make all people in the democratic world feel a little edgy," he said.

His comments suggested that Bush will also be discussing growing concern in Europe and the United States over rising authoritarianism in Russia under President Vladimir Putin and his hostile relations with some of the new democracies on Russia's borders. Bush will participate in a round of meetings Tuesday morning with Ilves and other Estonian leaders before flying to Riga, Latvia, for the NATO summit.

Ilves said he would be discussing Russia's difficult relations with some of its neighbors, especially Georgia, which he visited last week for consultations.

The Estonian leader said Russia "seems to treat democracy on its borders, be it Estonian, Ukrainian, Georgian, as a security threat and sees despotism on its borders -- Turkmenistan, Belarus -- as being a good thing as it represents stability. . . . That kind of view is not one which is very conducive and helpful to the security situation on our continent."

Ilves is one of several Baltic leaders who spent large chunks of their lives in North America; Bush will also meet with Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who was a professor of psychology at the University of Montreal. Ilves was born in Sweden to Estonian exiles and moved to the town of Leonia, in northern New Jersey, at age 3.

Ilves said he does not make much of his past connection to the United States. "The parties against me made it a big issue, but obviously it wasn't important enough to be a defining issue," he said. "I have been serving the Estonian state almost from the time independence was reestablished. I renounced my U.S. citizenship. What else can you do?"

OECD Rebukes Kremlin Over Economy (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky In Moscow

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Monday slammed the Russian government for its expansion into key economic sectors and raised concern about the “seemingly insatiable appetite” of Gazprom, its state-run energy giant.

In a critical report on the Russian economy, the OECD also said that the Kremlin’s expansion into key economic areas was a “disturbing trend” that “bodes ill” for the country’s growth.

Instead of concentrating on market reforms, the government had been increasingly focused on tightening the state’s grip on what it deemed to be strategic sectors, which include aviation, media and finance, as well as energy.

“The expansion of state ownership in important sectors will probably contribute to more rent-seeking, less efficiency and slower growth,” the OECD said.

It was particularly concerned by Gazprom’s “seemingly insatiable appetite for asset acquisition, often at the expense of a focus on its core business”. The report follows a chorus of international and domestic criticism of Gazprom’s business strategy.

Instead of investing in gas production, Gazprom has been expanding its interests in recent years in other sectors such as oil, electricity, power generation machinery and media. Last week’s announcement of the purchase of Komsomolskaya Pravda –

DOJ_NMG_0099091

Russia's largest circulation newspaper – is its latest foray into media. It also owns an airline, a bank, three television channels, several newspapers, radio stations, cinemas and hotels.

Gazprom's investment in developing gas fields has been minimal over the past few years, leading to stagnating production. Yet its monopoly over transportation infrastructure has constrained the development of independent gas producers.

The OECD's criticism comes at a time of growing concern about Russia's ability to sustain and increase its gas production.

But the report says Gazprom's expansion is part of a wider trend of accumulating assets in state hands. According to one recent estimate, cited by the OECD, the state-owned share of Russia 's equity market capitalisation rose from 20 per cent in mid-2003 to 30 per cent early this year.

The change has been particularly visible in the oil sector where the state share of the total production increased from 16 per cent in 2000 to almost 40 per cent. Yet the growth of oil production has slowed down dramatically over this period.

The OECD traces the beginning of the trend to the expropriation of Yukos's assets in favour of Rosneft, the state-controlled oil company.

It argues that the Yukos affair exemplified the trend towards state ownership.

However, the Russian state has also been extending its reach to non-energy sectors of the economy, including aviation and automotive.

Russia: The Enemy

November 28, 2006; Page A15

It's time we start thinking of Vladimir Putin's Russia as an enemy of the United States.

This isn't simply because a former KGB agent turned Putin critic died last week in London after ingesting a dose of polonium 210, an element that usually functions as a neutron trigger in atomic bombs. Nor is it that Alexander Litvinenko's death is the latest in a series of killings, attempted murders, imprisonments and forced exiles whose victims just happened to be prominent opponents of Mr. Putin. It is because the foreign policy of Russia has become openly, and often gratuitously, hostile to the U.S.

Some examples: Last summer, Russia signed a billion-dollar arms deal with Venezuela; Hugo Chávez wasted no time fantasizing aloud about using the weapons to sink an American aircraft carrier. Last week, Russia began deliveries to Iran of highly sophisticated SA-15 anti-aircraft missiles, at a value of $700 million. Russian Defense Minister Igor Ivanov claims the missiles will "have no influence on the balance of power in the region." But the purpose of the missiles is to defend Iran's nuclear sites, which do threaten the balance of power. Mr. Ivanov also says he is "absolutely sure" the billion-dollar Bushehr reactor that Russia is building for Iran could not be used to build nuclear weapons. This is false, and Mr. Ivanov must know it: The spent plutonium from the reactor can easily be diverted and reprocessed to produce as many as 60 bombs.

At the United Nations, Russia has consistently opposed U.S. efforts to sanction Iran and North Korea for their nuclear programs and diluted the effects of the resolutions that were passed. The Russians say they oppose the use of sanctions because they "don't work." It's an odd claim coming from a government that in October brusquely imposed trade, travel and postal sanctions on neighboring Georgia.

It is said often that Russia's motives are essentially mercenary and thus amoral. That's only partly true. Paul Volcker's investigation into the Oil for Food scandal revealed that Russian companies did $19.3 billion in oil deals with Saddam Hussein (by contrast, the French did a mere $4.4 billion) and that Russian individuals were the great beneficiaries of Saddam's illicit largesse -- one reason, perhaps, that Russia vigorously opposed the U.S. invasion. As recently as July Russia had plans to supply North Korea with advanced encryption and nuclear-storage systems. The total value of Russian arms sales to Tehran has risen nearly sixfold in recent years.

Yet Russia hardly depends on Iran as a weapons-export market, to say nothing of North Korea; most of its arms sales are to China and India. So why would Moscow, which has its own grave problems with Islamic radicals, abet the nuclear ambitions of a revolutionary Islamic regime that sponsors terrorism from Buenos Aires to Beirut?

Part of the answer, surely, has to do with the psychology of clientism and Russia's desire to assert and expand its sphere of influence. Part of the answer, too, is that a Russia that can obstruct American purposes -- whether in Latin America, Northeast Asia or the Persian Gulf -- must also be one that is relevant and powerful.

But there is also a fair bit of rank anti-Americanism at play. Take the September contretemps with Georgia, which involved Tbilisi's arrest of four Russian officers it had charged with espionage: Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned darkly at a press conference that "this latest escapade . . . happened straight after NATO's decision to grant Georgia an intensive cooperation plan and [Georgian President] Mikhail Saakashvili's visit to the United States." Was Mr. Lavrov playing to traditional Russian paranoia about the designs of outsiders on the motherland? Or did he really believe that Washington, Brussels and Tbilisi were conspiring trilaterally in this two-bit "plot"?

How does the Litvinenko murder fit into this? Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet dissident now at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, has often made the point that the best predictor of how nations behave toward their neighbors is how they treat their own people. "I think there's a very high probability [the Litvinenko killing] was done by the security services," he says in a telephone interview. The Kremlin's denials notwithstanding, the use of exotic poisons has been a KGB (now FSB) signature for decades, and killing Litvinenko in London would certainly be one way of letting the Kremlin's critics know that nobody is immune anywhere. As for negative public reaction, Mr. Sharansky observes that "experience shows them that it's short-lived."

That's certainly been Mr. Putin's experience with this White House. It was George W. Bush who first saw gold in Mr. Putin's soul, sometime after the Russian had decimated the city of Grozny. It was Condoleezza Rice who came up with the formulation after the Iraq war that the U.S. should "punish France, ignore Germany and forgive Russia." And it was this administration that agreed last week to Russian membership in the World Trade Organization, with Mr. Bush thanking Mr. Putin for "your time and friendship."

A case can be made for bringing Russia into the WTO, but caveat emptor: A government that trashes the rule of law domestically isn't likely to long sit still in any rules-based organization. There is no case for Russia's continued participation as the eighth member of the Group of Seven, once a club for mature democracies only. Putting Mr. Putin on notice that only gentlemen belong in gentlemen's clubs would be the right first step. Treating him for what he is -- "unworthy of the trust of civilized men and women," as Litvinenko wrote from his deathbed -- would be the next.

Orange Revolution's Foe Transformed In Ukraine (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Nov. 27 -- The Orange Revolution, strangely, has been kindest to the man who played the villain to the waves of protesters who rolled onto the streets of this capital two years ago. Viktor Yanukovych, once cast as the bluff hack who tried to steal Ukraine's presidential election, is back in power as prime minister thanks to free and fair parliamentary elections in March that were made possible only by the street protests of late 2004.

As he prepares for his first official trip to Washington, a four-day visit beginning Sunday, Yanukovych is suddenly projecting himself as the voice of democratic reform. He also appears eager to assure his White House hosts that his popular image as a pro-Russian straw man is a gross distortion.

Now, he suggests that he, too, was a catalyst in the transformation of this once stagnating country into the most politically competitive of all the post-Soviet states, a nation where debate is dynamic and where power, ultimately, resides with the people.

"There were many mistakes made by the previous authorities and many injustices," he said in an interview in his office here Monday. "The authorities lost trust. One should recognize that there is more democracy, that there is freedom of speech -- and that is an achievement of these historic events, although I don't call it a revolution."

Yanukovych bears little resemblance to the figure who provoked tens of thousands of Ukrainians to demonstrate against electoral fraud in 2004, eventually sweeping his opponent, Viktor Yushchenko, into the presidency. And some question the sincerity of what they see as his self-serving rhetoric.

"He talks like he was part of it," said David Zhvania, a member of parliament and financier of Yushchenko's campaign and the protests in Kiev's Independence Square. "It's a game. We showed Ukrainians why he was scary, but we also explained to Yanukovych why he was scary, and from his first day in power we saw that he was listening."

For others, however, the fundamental legacy of the Orange Revolution, named for the color adopted by those advocating democratic change, is that Yanukovych must now bow to the electorate and that Ukraine, a nation of 47 million, cannot return to autocratic rule.

"He is forced to play within the rules of a new political culture," said Vadim Karasev, director of the Institute for Global Strategies in Kiev. "He understands that a dictatorial style is no longer permissible in Ukraine. The Orange Revolution made him a politician."

The change in attitude is immediately apparent to visitors to his office. The first visible image is a portrait of Yushchenko, which was placed in a prominent position on Yanukovych's orders, according to his media aides. The prime minister also regularly speaks Ukrainian, not Russian, in public now; his vastly improved fluency clearly reflects an attempt to project himself as something more than the representative of pro-Russian business clans from eastern Ukraine.

The bulk of Yushchenko's support came from the Ukrainian-speaking west, while Yanukovych's base is in the Russian-speaking east.

"There is more and more desire among the people to unite under the state flag," Yanukovych said. "They want to build a strong unified state, a united Ukraine."

The coalition that had backed Yushchenko collapsed following bitter infighting, but Yanukovych strikes an accommodating tone in discussing the president's goals -- integration with the West, including membership in NATO and the European Union, while maintaining respectful but independent relations with Russia, Ukraine's giant neighbor.

"My goal, first, is to develop a strategic relationship between Ukraine and the United States that is predictable, effective and has a good perspective," he said of his Washington visit, during which he will meet with Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. His aides are still hoping for a meeting with President Bush, however brief. According to protocol, he should meet only with the vice president, since he is not the head of state, but a presidential handshake would imply some acceptance of Yanukovych's new incarnation.

On NATO membership, a prospect that a majority of Ukrainians oppose, according to opinion polls, Yanukovych said his compatriots first need to be educated about the goals of the alliance and its benefits for Ukraine.

"You cannot put a boat to sail without first building it," he said. "For Ukraine, and the Ukrainian people, the priority is first to improve the standard of living, build up the legal system and create a just state with democratic values and freedom, and only then a security system. The population will support integration with NATO when they see positive changes in the country itself."

Asked about his personal view of NATO membership, Yanukovych said, "I think we will do everything that serves the national interest." And that, he added, includes "a normal and stable working relationship with Russia which is of mutual benefit. It is extremely important for us. Russia is a very important strategic, trade and economic partner."

But he also said he wanted to pursue policies that reduce Ukraine's dependence on its neighbor, particularly its almost total reliance on Russia for energy. "We want to develop a diversification of energy supplies," he said. "And Russia is not obstructing us in this process."

Three Sent For Radiation Tests After Death Of Russian Ex-Spy (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

New York Times, November 28, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 27 — Three people complaining of symptoms consistent with the radiation poisoning that killed a former Russian spy last week have been sent to a special clinic here for further tests, the authorities said on Monday.

They would not elaborate on the symptoms and said it would take a week before they knew whether the three had been exposed to polonium 210, the radioactive isotope found in the urine of the former spy, Alexander Litvinenko. But they said the danger to the public was minimal.

In order to fall ill, “you would need to ingest or inhale some of his body fluids,” Jill Meara, deputy director of the radiation protection division of the Health Protection Agency, which is responsible for assessing public health risks, said in an interview. People who had touched Mr. Litvinenko when he was sick, she said, would not be at risk, unless they failed to wash their hands and then put their fingers in their mouths, or if they somehow absorbed his body fluids — through swallowing, for instance, or through an open sore.

Of 450 people who had called a special government hot line over the weekend, worried that they had been in contact with Mr. Litvinenko, only 18 were referred for follow-up questioning. The three being sent for further tests are among that group.

Four days after Mr. Litvinenko died of polonium 210 poisoning, the police do not seem any closer to solving the mystery of how he was poisoned. They have not even said it was murder, despite Mr. Litvinenko’s deathbed assertions that he had been poisoned by Russia’s government. An inquest will begin Thursday.

“I would urge caution on everyone not to get ahead of ourselves or, in particular, the police investigation,” the home secretary, John Reid, told the House of Commons on Monday. “The police have been very careful in the words they used. They said they are dealing with a suspicious death, and that is the basis for their investigations.”

DOJ_NMG_0099094

David Davis, the home affairs spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party, said, however, that it was "incredibly important to resolve the question of whether the Russian state was involved." If it was, he told the House of Commons, "given that a British citizen who had been given asylum may have been murdered on British soil, this has enormous implications to the relationship between the U.K. and Russia, and implications, too, for the other émigrés in the U.K. who are opponents of the Russian government."

Britain is in a delicate situation in relation to its Russian ally, as it is increasingly dependent on its oil and gas.

"Going by past patterns, it's obviously going to cause short-term deterioration in the tone of the relationship, but not in its substance," Alex Pravda, an expert in Russia's post-cold-war foreign policy at the foreign policy research organization Chatham House, said in an interview. "There's an interlocking set of vested interests in getting on with a stable relationship."

The police have closed two places — the Itsu sushi restaurant in Piccadilly, and the Pine Bar at the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair — where Mr. Litvinenko is known to have been on Nov. 1, when he became sick, and where low levels of radiation have been detected. Radiation has also been found in his home. The BBC reported that radiation had been detected in a West End office building and at a building in Mayfair. [Wire services and the Tuesday Guardian cited various sources as saying that one of the buildings included the office of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian tycoon, who had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko, and the Guardian said, citing anonymous sources, that traces had been found there.]

But the authorities do not seem to be particularly worried. Julian Metcalfe, the founder of Itsu, a chain of restaurants in London, said that 16,000 people had eaten in the Piccadilly location since Nov. 1, and none had fallen ill with radiation poisoning.

Radioactive Traces Found At More Sites In London (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 27 -- Traces of the radioactive substance responsible for the death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko have been found in two downtown London offices, and three people who are not feeling well have been referred for tests to determine if they might also have been exposed, officials said Monday.

Home Secretary John Reid, speaking in the House of Commons, called for calm during the investigation of the death of Litvinenko, 43, who died Thursday from exposure to radioactive polonium-210. "The nature of this radiation is such that it does not travel over long distances, a few centimeters at most, and therefore there is no need for public alarm," Reid told legislators.

Reid said that about 500 people have called government hotlines established following Litvinenko's death and that only "a small number" had been referred for testing as a "very precautionary measure."

A spokeswoman for the Health Protection Agency said Monday evening that three people had been referred for urine tests to screen for radiation. She said that all three had reported being in the same areas Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and that they also were suffering from potential poisoning symptoms, such as diarrhea and vomiting.

Reid cautioned against drawing premature judgments about what happened in this unprecedented case, noting that it was not even established that Litvinenko had been murdered; police are calling his case an "unexplained death."

Litvinenko was an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Following his death, a friend of Litvinenko's read a statement, which he said had been written by Litvinenko on his deathbed, alleging that Putin was behind his death. Kremlin officials have called those allegations "nonsense."

Reid told legislators that the Russian ambassador to Britain had been summoned to the Foreign Office and asked for Russian cooperation in the investigation.

Police said traces of polonium-210 had been discovered in offices at 7 Down St. and 25 Grosvenor Sq. in central London. They declined to provide further details, including why those addresses had come to the attention of investigators.

News media here reported that Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, another Putin critic who won asylum in Britain after fleeing Russia, maintains an office at the 7 Down St. building. Sky News reported that Litvinenko had visited a security company with offices at the Grosvenor Square building.

Litvinenko, a former colonel in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the domestic successor to the KGB, publicly accused FSB agents of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 that killed more than 300 people. He also accused his FSB superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky.

Berezovsky said in a telephone interview last week that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital during his illness and said Litvinenko told him he had "no doubt" that he had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin to kill him." Berezovsky said poisoning was "a classic way" that Russian agents work.

Traces of polonium-210 had already been found at two locations that Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1: the Itsu restaurant in Piccadilly, where he met an Italian contact, and the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, where he met several Russian men, including a former KGB agent. Traces had also been found in his home in Muswell Hill in north London.

The Case Of The Poisoned Spy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Conspiracy theories always turn out to be nothing more than paranoid fantasy. At their heart lies the notion that while the rest of us blithely go about doing whatever it is we think we're doing, occult and all-powerful forces are really running the world -- starting wars, engineering suspicious plane crashes, surveying the next grassy knoll. Take this stuff too seriously and you find yourself on the corner with the Lyndon LaRouche people, trying to convince passersby that the queen of England is actually a ruthless drug dealer in sensible pumps.

But every once in a while, an episode such as the death of Alexander Litvinenko comes along to boost the morale of conspiracy theorists -- and remind the rest of us that there does exist a secret world full of characters and plotlines so bizarre and implausible that the bard of betrayal, novelist John le Carre, would be embarrassed to write them.

These clandestine creatures don't actually run the world, of course. But they seem to think they do.

Litvinenko was the former KGB agent -- and bitter critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, also former KGB -- who died in a London hospital Thursday after a brief, devastating and mysterious illness. Doctors suspected poisoning, since that was the most likely reason a healthy 43-year-old's hair would fall out and his organs would fail. Finally they identified a most unlikely poison: polonium 210, a radioactive element discovered by Marie Curie in 1898 (for which she later won the Nobel Prize) and named after her native country, Poland. The substance is so deadly if ingested, even in microscopic amounts, that doctors still haven't done a proper autopsy on Litvinenko for fear of killing themselves in the process.

Polonium isn't the kind of thing you find at the local drug store. Only a sovereign government is likely to have any lying around, which narrows the field of suspects.

Before he died, Litvinenko blamed his impending demise on Putin, whose enemies tend to meet untimely deaths. Litvinenko was said to be on the verge of obtaining documents -- or maybe they were already in his possession; this part is unclear -- proving that Putin had staged attacks on Russian civilians and made it look as if Chechen separatists were responsible so that Putin would then be free to wage a brutal war of suppression against the Chechens. In the secret world, this sort of gambit is called a "false flag" operation.

But how had the poison been administered? Polonium isn't really harmful unless you get the victim to ingest it.

It turns out that on Nov. 1, the day he became ill, Litvinenko met a friend at a sushi bar near Piccadilly Circus. Predictably, this was no ordinary friend. It was an Italian "security consultant" named Mario Scaramella, who has described himself as an expert in nuclear materials -- according to reports in the British media, which have pursued this story with old-school Fleet Street gusto.

Pretty intriguing, this Scaramella guy, but there's no obvious reason he would have wanted to kill Litvinenko, who was apparently an ally. According to the Daily Mail, Scaramella might have used the sushi bar meeting to pass a document to Litvinenko -- there are lots of incriminating documents circulating in the secret world -- that contained a hit list of Putin's critics who have been targeted for death by a group of former Russian spies calling themselves "Dignity and Honor."

The Daily Mail started to lose me when it also reported that British authorities suspect Litvinenko's killer might be a "ruthless assassin" -- former KGB, of course -- named Igor, who is a judo master (like Putin), walks with a limp (unlike Putin) and is thought to have fled to Italy (watch your back, Scaramella).

The whole thing is so over the top that you almost expect Dr. Evil from the "Austin Powers" movies to make an appearance. It's easy to lose sight of the fact that all these cloak-and-dagger characters really exist (although I have my doubts about Igor) and that a man who spoke out against Vladimir Putin's ongoing consolidation of power really did succumb to a rare, exotic poison. I should point out that British authorities haven't entirely discarded the possibility that, for some reason, Litvinenko poisoned himself.

Spies, former spies, counterspies, a mysterious character named Scaramella. . . . The authorities need to find out quickly just what happened to Litvinenko and banish all this throwback, Cold War-style conspiracy and intrigue to its proper venue: the pages of a thrilling but unconvincing novel.

Awaiting Pope, Turkey Is Unsure About Ties To West (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 27 — A short 24 hours before a visit by Pope Benedict XVI to this Muslim country, its prime minister finally agreed to meet him publicly. The venue: the airport, on the Turkish leader's way out of town.

DOJ_NMG_0099096

The elaborate, last-minute choreography pointed to the deep divide that has festered within Turkish society since the foundation of the modern state. Should Turkey face eastward, toward its Muslim neighbors, or westward, toward Europe?

In the past five years, Muslims here have repeatedly felt betrayed by the West. The United States began holding Muslims without charges at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. It invaded Iraq and abused prisoners at Abu Ghraib. The European Union has cooled to them. The pope made a speech citing criticism of Islam.

Now, Turkey — a Muslim country with a rigidly secular state — is at a pivot point. It is trying to navigate a treacherous path between the forces that want to pull it closer toward Islam and the institutions that safeguard its secularism. Turkey's government, which is pro-Islamic, is constrained by rules dictating secularism established by Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, Turkey's revered founder.

The extremes jostle on Istanbul's streets, where miniskirts mix with tightly tied headscarves and lingerie boutiques stand unapologetically next to mosques.

"There are two Turkeys within Turkey right now," said Binnaz Toprak, a professor of political science at Bosporus University.

The pope's visit, which begins Tuesday, falls squarely on that sensitive fault line and has brought into stark relief a slow but steady shift: Turkey is feeling its Muslim identity more and more. The trend worries secular Turkish politicians, who believe the state's central tenet is under threat. In late October, a senior officer of Turkey's army — which has ousted governments it has seen as overly Islamic — issued a rare warning to that effect.

Others say the threat is overstated, but acknowledge that Turks do feel pushed east by pressures on their country from America and Europe. A poll by the Pew Foundation in June found that 53 percent of Turks have positive views of Iran, while public opinion of Europe and the United States has slipped sharply.

"Many people in Turkey have lost hopes in joining Europe and they are looking for other horizons," said Onur Oymen, an opposition politician whose party is staunchly secular.

It has been more than 80 years since religion was ripped out of the heart of the new Turkish state, which was assembled from the remains of the Ottoman Empire, the political and economic heart of the Muslim world for centuries. But the portion of Turks who identify themselves by their religion, first and foremost as Muslims, has increased to 46 percent this year, from 36 percent seven years ago, according to a survey of 1,500 people in 23 cities conducted by the Turkish Economic and Social Studies Foundation, an independent research organization based in Istanbul. That is a trend that has emerged in countries throughout the Muslim world since Sept. 11, 2001.

"I'm here as a Muslim," said Fatma Eksioglu, who was sitting on the grass next to her sister in downtown Istanbul on Sunday at a demonstration of about 20,000 people opposing the pope's visit. She did not belong to the Islamic party that organized the gathering, she said, adding, "When it comes to Islam we are one."

But in a paradox that goes to the heart of the nuances of modern Turkey —— a stronger Muslim identity does not mean that, as in Iraq, fundamentalism is on the rise. or even that more Turks want more religion in their government. Indeed, the number of Turks in favor of imposing Sharia law declined to 9 percent from 21 percent, according to the survey, which was released last week.

Perhaps the most powerful factor pushing Turks toward the east has been a series of bitter setbacks in talks on admission to the European Union. To try to win membership, the Turkish government enacted a series of rigorous reforms to bring the country in line with European standards, including some unprecedented in the Muslim world, such as a law against marital rape.

But the admission talks have stalled. And while the official reason is a quibble involving the longstanding Greek-Turkish dispute over Cyprus, most Turks say they believe the real reason is a deep suspicion of their country's religion.

They see that in the opposition to Turkey's admission voiced by some European countries, including Germany, Austria and France. Indeed, in 2002, , former President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing of France said Turkey's admission to the European Union would mean "the end of Europe," and now the French presidential hopeful Nicholas Sarkozy has made his opposition a campaign issue. Even the pope, when he was still a cardinal in Germany, said publicly that he did not think Turkey fit into Europe because it was Muslim. That talk has begun to grate on Turks.

"It hurts me that the E.U. expects Turkey to be something it's not," said Nilgun Yun, a stylish 26-year-old chewing a chocolate muffin in a downtown Istanbul cafe on Sunday.

Her position, shared by many of her friends, was simple: "Accept me as I am. We are Muslim, and we will remain Muslim. That's not going to change."

Mr. Oyman, the Turkish opposition politician, said that talk about Turkey was tougher than ever. "You cannot believe how they accuse Turkey on Cyprus and other issues," he said in a telephone interview from Brussels, where he was attending a meeting of European parliamentarians. "Our European friends are playing a very shortsighted game."

DOJ_NMG_0099097

The shift has begun affect trade. While Europe is still Turkey's largest trading partner, business with other neighbors, including Syria, Iraq and Iran, has picked up substantially in recent years, said Omer Bolat, the head of one of the country's largest business associations, whose members are mostly pro-Islamic. He put the growth at about 30 percent from just 3 percent in 2000.

"It is risky for a country with respect to foreign policy to have dependence on one partner and market," he said in English, sitting in a sleek conference room when overlooking a bustling trade fair showcasing Turkish goods. "Now Turkey is opening its muscles, its horizons."

The policies of the Bush administration have deeply worried Muslims, he said, before rushing off to speak to the Pakistani ambassador, who had arrived to the trade fair.

"The United States used to be paradigm of freedom and rights," he said. "But since the Republican period, the U.S. policies have been so detrimental in Muslim eyes."

Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, in just four years, has managed to get inflation down to historic lows and growth rates to all-time highs. The growing prosperity has eased integration of religious Turks into the country's self-consciously society, which is still suspicious of advocates of Islam, as well as of Mr. Erdogan and his pro-Islamic government.

"This group of people that was more religious has relaxed," Ms. Toprak said. "They are now visible. They go to restaurants they would never have gone; they go to posh shopping malls."

"It was a struggle to get a piece of the pie," she said. "Now they have one."

Even so, the increased religiosity, or at least identification with religion, could eventually present a serious problem for Turkey. There are already rumblings. A killing of a judge whose court had ruled on a headscarf case aroused suspicions among Turkey's securlarists. Gen. Yasar Buyukanit, head of the Turkish Army, has referred to a rising threat of fundamentalism on at least four occasions since he came to office in late August.

Mr. Erdogan's closely watched government has attempted to limit liquor consumption in public places, but later backed down. It also tried to make adultery a crime, but later relented.

Some Turkish officials play down the possibility of real damage to secularism, but say that European suspicion does Turkey no good.

The delay with Europe, for instance, "fans up the disappointment, the disillusionment," said Namik Tan, the spokesman for the Turkish Foreign Ministry. "People say, why are they doing this?"

That is why public officials, including Mr. Erdogan, have shrunk from the visit of the pope, who symbolizes, in the eyes of Turks, a disdain for Islam and the unfair exclusivity of the Western club. A cartoon in a Turkish newspaper last weekend showed two public officials belly-laughing at the bad luck of those Turkish officials obliged to meet him. (The senior official appointed to be his formal guide has the portfolio of youth and sport.) But the pope is coming, and the meetings are happening. Despite growing pains, a neglected Kurdish minority in the south, a thin skin for any reference to the Armenian genocide, and failure to scrap a law that makes insulting Turkishness a crime, Turkey stands out as lively democracy in a larger Middle East riddled with restrictions, and its acceptance by the West is a test case for everyone, officials said.

Muslim countries, Mr. Tan points out, are watching. "Turkey is a beacon for those countries," he said. "Don't forget, if we fail, then the whole dream will fail."

Turkey's EU Entry Bid Stalls On Cyprus Issue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

BRUSSELS -- A failure to get a deal on Cyprus will lead to at least a two- to three-year pause in Turkey's negotiations to enter the European Union, analysts, officials and business leaders say.

Few see a major short-term reaction in Turkish markets, saying investors already priced in the breakdown. If the rupture becomes final, many fear Turkey's long-term economic progress could be halted.

Negotiations in Helsinki over Cyprus between Turkey and the EU collapsed yesterday. The EU had demanded Turkey open its ports to trade with the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus. Turkey had demanded that the EU open its borders to trade with Turkish-speaking Northern Cyprus.

A Finnish compromise proved unacceptable to both sides. It called for granting the northern Cyprus seaport of Famagusta free trade with the EU in return for the Turkish side handing over control of nearby Varosha. After talks with Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul and Cypriot Foreign Minister George Lillikas, Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja was quoted as saying there was "no basis for a solution."

Turkish markets seem undisturbed. The Istanbul index rose 1.8%, with bargain hunters buying stocks that had fallen last week. Turkey's signing of a letter of intent with the International Monetary Fund to finalize a review of its three-year $10 billion loan deal helped encourage investors.

The West's Eastern Front (WSJ)

By Hugh Pope

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

ISTANBUL -- The Istanbul professor who is a leading character in "Bliss," a lyrical novel by Zülfü Livaneli, imagines the Turkish intellectual as an acrobat swinging through the air. He lets go of his trapeze, sure in the belief that his European partner and inspiration waits on the other side, ready to catch him. Too late, he discovers his mistake.

If the much-bruised Turks agonize long and loud about when they'll ever be accepted as Europeans, the Europeans seem willfully blind to the Turks. Another crisis looms in the long-running negotiations over Turkey's possible membership of the European Union, this time over the conveniently distracting issue of access to Turkish ports for Cypriot ships. Meanwhile the reigning pope, who wants to reclaim Europe for Christianity to the exclusion of the Turks, today touches down in this Muslim land. So it's worth thinking again about who the Turks are, what they want, and how helpful to Europe their practice of Islam really is. * * *

No clear answer exists, of course, to the question of whether the Turks are Europeans. There are just too many subjective variables. There is plenty of official hypocrisy, too. Europe has never negotiated with Ankara in wholly good faith, and Turkey has never been wholly sincere in its stated goal of joining the EU as it is today. But before muskets and scimitars are brought down from the attics of history, one must note that the Turks are already much more European than most Europeans realize.

The land of modern Turkey has always been part in, part out of Europe. The Roman Empire included most of today's Turkey, which has also gone by other names like Anatolia or Asia Minor. The most easterly Roman forts are inside Georgia on the foothills of the Caucasus Mountains. To the southeast, the main Roman customs houses were along the Euphrates -- roughly where the Kurdish-majority areas of Turkey begin today.

The subsequent Turkish conquest of Anatolia, and two sieges of Vienna, has not always meant a historic exclusion from Europe. The Ottomans had strategic alliances with France and Britain, among others. They were briefly part of the "Concert of Europe" in the late 19th century, were thought of in decline as the "Sick Man of Europe" (not Asia) and were the allies of Germany and Austria in World War I. In the Cold War, Turkey joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and guarded a whole third of Europe's front line with the Warsaw Pact.

Institutionally and commercially, Turkey is already deep in modern Europe. Formal Turkish-EU ties have deepened through nearly half a century of intense negotiation, including a customs union since 1996. Turkey is a member of the Council of Europe; its well-trained soldiers are projecting European political resolve in Afghanistan, Kosovo, Lebanon and Congo; its sports teams play in European leagues; and it takes part in and once won the Eurovision song contest.

Arguments that Turks are somehow ethnically Asiatic and non-European also hold little water. Yes, the original Turkish tribes and dynasties like the Seljuks and Ottomans came from Central Asia. Turkey is the most powerful state in what can be seen as an emerging Turkic-speaking world, which counts 140 million people from Kashgar to Cologne. But the six main Turkic states do not form a political bloc and, although not EU applicants, most share Turkey's ambition to be seen as part of a European or Western culture.

Furthermore, the 70 million people in modern Turkey may be Turkic in name and language, but are not so genetically pure. The main influx of Central Asian Turks to Turkey ended in the 13th century. Overall it seems to have added only about 10% of the population to the existing muddle of ancient Anatolian populations. Western Turkey, at least, is not much different from other Eastern European members of the European Union, where Bulgars, Finns and Hungarians also have origins in the eastern steppe. Turkey's Kurds, meanwhile, speak an Indo-European language.

Nobody doubts, however, that Europe's cold shoulder to Turkey is mainly due to its Muslim identity. As a cardinal in 2004, Pope Benedict XVI put this argument in terms of Turkey as being "in permanent contrast to Europe." But Europe cannot just wish Islam away. Some 15 million to 20 million Muslims already make up nearly 5% of the EU's population; that number includes 3.5 million Turks. Europe is deluding itself if it thinks it can isolate itself from engagement with not just Turkey but its whole Islamic backyard around the Mediterranean Sea.

In contrast to the narrow defensiveness of some European opinion leaders who treat a "clash of civilizations" as inevitable, Turkey's current leaders have been reaching out to create an "alliance of civilizations." When Europe meets them half-way, as in the last phase of Euro-Turkish rapprochement, in 1999-2005, which culminated with the opening of talks on membership in the union, pro-Western Turks feel strengthened. When Europe turns its back, as this year, the local nationalist backlash forces them onto the defensive.

Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan was indeed once a hard-line Islamist. Yet, reflecting a broader change in the country, he had to split with the fundamentalists in order to win power in 2002 with a new, more center-right party that was acceptable to 35% of the Turkish population. He has presided over an economic and commercial convergence with Europe that has put more European names than ever on Turkish products and high street stores and banks.

Turkey started its acrobatic effort to assimilate European culture in the early, 19th-century Ottoman Empire. In the 1920s, the present Turkish Republic took Europe as its model for almost everything, since back then Europe equaled modern progress. The new state dumped almost all the hallowed pillars of Islamic culture: Islamic law, dervish lodges, even the Muslim caliphate.

Europe has long been slow to appreciate these changes. In 1949, the Times of London's opinion page thought Turkey had no place in Europe because it used the Arabic script: in fact, that, too, had been discarded two decades previously. More recently, one of Germany's ambassadors to Turkey surprised a visiting Bundestag politician by giving him the news that Turkey had repudiated Islamic punishments like cutting the hands off thieves nearly a century ago.

A recent socio-economic survey by TESEV, one of Turkey's new think tanks, shows piety on the rise in Turkey -- just as in Europe. It also found that, contrary to perceptions, the number of women covering their hair had decreased in the past seven years. Only 1% of women surveyed wear the full black face-and-body covering, and that 1% is almost entirely older, rural women. Support for the use of Islamic law has fallen to 9% from 21%, and 81% condemn suicide bombing as un-Islamic, whether in Palestine or Iraq. Opinion has been liberalized, the study found, by rising wealth, stability, education and urbanization -- the same factors that have slowly improved Turkey's human-rights and democratic records in recent years.

Until recently, the pollster's question "Do you want to join the European Union?" put to a Turk was enthusiastically approved as meaning "Do you want to be rich?" Support has however plummeted as Turks have learned of European hostility, often whipped on by European politicians trying to blame external causes for internal ailments. Yet polls don't show everything. Turkey still does a booming half of its trade with the EU and more than half of its 21 million tourists come from Europe. Similarly, the negative image of Turkey elicited in Europe by the question "Do you want Turkey in the EU?" is not the whole truth. Change the question to "What do you think of Istanbul?" and many Europeans describe the city as cool, or full of desirable commercial energy.

Rudyard Kipling's old saying that "East is East and West is West" -- or its modern incarnation, "the clash of civilizations" -- is not the right paradigm for Turkey, which feels increasingly confident as part of both. The West is now all over the East and the East is firmly camped in the West. Indeed, Turkey's republican founder Kemal Atatürk believed that the "East is East" idea was fostered by Western powers to justify clinging to power over their former colonial subjects. * * *

An impasse next month between Turkey and Europe, which threatens to freeze accession talks unless Ankara kowtows to its demands in the dispute over Cypriot ships, would be unfortunate and, on past diplomatic form, unlikely. Both sides would suffer too much commercial and political damage. The wider Islamic world, having reacted with delight to the EU's apparent decision to accept Turkey as an equal, would revert even more stubbornly to its default position that it is impossible to expect fair treatment from the West.

A pause for reflection seems in order for both sides. An acrimonious standoff with the EU in the late 1990s cleared the way for Turkey's great leap forward of 1999-2005. A Dutch ambassador at the core of those EU-Turkish negotiations once described the relationship as a wrestling match, with no time clock but no alternative. Neither Europe nor Turkey can "win." But neither side can afford to let go.

Mr. Pope is author, most recently, of "Sons of the Conquerors: The Rise of the Turkic World" (Overlook Duckworth, 2005).

Lawyers Cite Obstruction In 2nd Trial For Chinese Rights Advocate (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 27 — A Chinese legal expert who exposed abuses in the country's population control policies began a rare second trial on Monday, but his lawyers accused local authorities of preventing them from mounting a vigorous defense.

The legal expert, Chen Guangcheng, was sentenced in August to four years and three months by a county court in Shandong Province for destroying property and organizing a mob to disrupt traffic.

A higher court later quashed the verdict and ordered a new trial, which some supporters of Mr. Chen cited as an important breakthrough for China's Communist Party-run judicial system.

But the first day of the new trial, held in the same county court, ended in acrimony. Several of Mr. Chen's most important witnesses were prevented from attending the hearing by thugs who had the backing of local officials, his lawyers said, and the judges in the case declined to grant a defense request to delay the trial.

The lawyers said the witnesses, residents of Mr. Chen's village, were prepared to testify that the police had tortured them to provide false evidence against Mr. Chen. But three witnesses were detained before the trial began and none of them could attend the hearing, the lawyers said.

Li Jinsong, a lawyer for Mr. Chen who is based in Beijing, argued in court that the trial should be postponed until the witnesses could appear. When the judges rejected his request, he stormed out of the courtroom in protest.

"Our witnesses were prepared to make clear that the evidence against Chen Guangcheng was based on forced confessions of several people who do not stand by their accusations against him," Mr. Li said. "Those witnesses were prevented from attending the trial, and I believe we are headed toward another wrongful conviction."

Mr. Chen, who has been blind since a childhood illness, taught himself the law and became a campaigner for peasant rights. For a time he was hailed in China and abroad as a barefoot lawyer who helped legal norms take root in China's countryside.

But in 2005 he sought to organize a class-action lawsuit on behalf of people forced to undergo late-term abortions or sterilization operations in a mass crackdown aimed at helping local officials meet their quota for limiting population growth. In so doing he ran afoul of powerful party officials in Shandong.

Local authorities retaliated against Mr. Chen, confining him to his home for many months and later charging him with destroying property and disrupting traffic. Mr. Chen's lawyers say that the charges were fabrications.

Though the Chinese news media have been barred from reporting on the matter, the case has attracted high-level attention in Beijing. Many legal experts in the capital believed that local authorities would come under pressure to grant Mr. Chen at least the semblance of an impartial hearing.

Mr. Chen's defense lawyers say that despite the detention and intimidation of potential witnesses, the second trial was in some respects an improvement over the first. In the first trial, Mr. Chen's defense attorneys were not allowed to represent him, and he was assigned new lawyers who did not contest the charges.

This time, Mr. Li, his lead lawyer, was permitted to defend Mr. Chen in court. But he said, "Under Chinese law this is still a wrongful case."

Rare Retrial Begins For Blind Chinese Legal Activist (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 27 -- The retrial of a blind legal activist kicked off in eastern Shandong province Monday, but not without some of the same courtroom tumult that characterized his first trial, which was widely denounced by human rights advocates, lawyers said.

Chen Guangcheng, who embarrassed officials last year by exposing forced abortions and sterilizations, was convicted in August of disrupting traffic and damaging property during a village protest. A Chinese court earlier this month granted a retrial, citing a lack of evidence from the prosecution.

Chen's case, however, suffered another setback Monday, according to his attorneys, one of whom stormed out of the courtroom in protest. Three defense witnesses disappeared before the trial, the attorneys said, marking the second time Chen's allies were unable to speak on his behalf. On the eve of his first trial, the defense team was detained by police and accused of petty theft.

Despite the setbacks, Chen's attorneys said, there were moments during the nearly 10-hour proceedings Monday that gave them small reason to hope. Spectators, even though they were government employees, sometimes hissed at the prosecutors. And the simple chance to appeal was seen as a positive sign. Chinese courts usually find all criminal defendants guilty; acquittals and retrials are rare.

Chen last year highlighted abuses in family planning programs around Linyi, a city of 10 million people about 400 miles southeast of Beijing. Officials, whose promotions depended on not exceeding birth quotas, had forced thousands of men and women to have abortions and sterilizations, often conducting midnight raids and beating or holding residents hostage until they complied.

Chen, blinded by a childhood illness, taught himself law and helped many of the victims prepare an unprecedented class-action lawsuit. Since then, his supporters have been harassed, beaten and placed under house arrest. Chen was sentenced to more than four years in prison. His attorneys say the charges were trumped up by local authorities as payback for embarrassing them.

One of Chen's attorneys, Li Fangping, said the mood of the court Monday was markedly different from the last trial.

"In the morning, the prosecutor interrupted us all the time, and the judge was always on the prosecutor's side. I was expelled from the court because the judge kept granting the prosecution's objections but I kept talking," Li said. But Li said he returned to the courtroom and continued to identify discrepancies between the written and oral testimony of prosecution witnesses. "In the afternoon, the prosecutors tried to interrupt us about 20 to 30 times, but this time, the judge mostly denied their objections."

DOJ_NMG_0099101

Chen, who wore a long green army coat and a two-inch beard, defended himself in court enthusiastically, complaining loudly about being illegally detained and persecuted by local officials, Li said. "This is the first time he was willing to talk. Last time he refused to speak because the procedure was so unfair," Li said. "He was in high spirits."

But Li Jinsong, the chief defense counsel, walked out of the courtroom at midday in protest after a disagreement with the judge about the three missing defense witnesses.

"Three major witnesses, neighbors Chen Guanghe, Chen Guangdong and Chen Gengjiang, all confessed to us before this retrial that their testimony in the first trial was false because they were tortured by police," Li said. "They promised us they would come to court to tell the truth. But two of them were missing this morning and one was kidnapped last night by eight unidentified men in front of our hotel. Two other lawyers witnessed it."

When Li tried to raise that issue with the judge and ask for an adjournment, the judge ruled that it was irrelevant. "So I quit the court to protest. I wanted to tell them, 'Don't try to play tricks with me. I will not let you tread on the law,' " Li said.

The Linyi Municipal Public Security Bureau referred calls about the alleged abduction to police in the neighborhood where the man disappeared, the Associated Press reported. A police officer in the neighborhood said he was unaware of any such incident.

Chen Guangcheng's eldest brother, Chen Guangfu, said he seemed to be the only spectator at the trial who supported the defendant.

"All the people who sat beside me were employees from the local prosecutor's office, the local police or the courthouse. There were also four village party secretaries from neighboring villages. I didn't tell them who I was," Chen Guangfu said. "But during the lunch break, I overheard a spectator, who said, 'Whenever the defendant says something crucial, the prosecutor interrupts, saying it's irrelevant. But actually I think this is the most crucial part of the case.' I can feel the mood of the court change in the afternoon."

Chen said his brother grew angry when interrupted by prosecutors. "He told them, 'You're shameless!' Even though he was insulting the prosecutors, it was joyous to hear."

A verdict is expected within a week, attorney Li Fangping said.

Researcher Jin Ling contributed to this report.

Rebels Attack Oil Field In Darfur (AP-Y)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, November 28, 2006

Darfur rebels attacked an oil field in a rare extension of their campaign east toward the Sudanese capital and said Monday the military garrison guarding the field had surrendered. But the government said its forces repelled the assault and were in full control of the Abu Jabra oil field Monday.

The attack on the field on the edge of South Darfur appeared to be another sign that Darfur's violence was spreading across the region.

"The government garrison guarding the oil field was totally destroyed," the National Redemption Front rebel group said in a statement. "Numerous soldiers, including high-ranking officers and generals, have surrendered," the rebels said, claiming to have shot down an army helicopter and to have captured a "substantial amount" of weapons and military vehicles.

A Sudanese military spokesman denied the army had surrendered, saying its troops had "inflicted heavy causalities on the rebels, who withdrew from the area." He spoke on condition of anonymity in line with official policy.

A Sudanese official in the oil industry said Abu Jabra's capacity had been damaged in the attack, but insisted it would not affect overall production. The state-owned facility pumps up to 10,000 barrels per day — a relatively small output. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of the issue.

The rebel raid came amid heightened violence in Darfur, where pro-government janjaweed militia have been accused by the United Nations of forcing 60,000 people to flee their homes this month. Violence in Darfur over three years has killed 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million.

Observers fear Darfur's violence threatens to destabilize the entire region. Neighboring Chad accuses Sudan of backing a rebel raid that briefly took a large Chadian town and threatened the capital in recent days.

To the south of Darfur, the Central African Republic also alleges Sudan is backing a local rebellion. Khartoum denies both charges, but aid workers in the west Darfur town of El Geneina said they had seen Chadian rebel groups operating freely in the area. The aid workers spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Sudanese officials say the country produces about 500,000 barrels per day and that oil revenue should be at least $4 billion this year, more than half of the government's income.

DOJ_NMG_0099102

Most of Sudan's oil reserves are in the south of the country, which is now semi autonomous under a separate peace agreement that southern rebels signed with the government in January 2005.

Violence Continues To Roil In Chad (AP)

By Michelle Faul

AP, November 27, 2006

With gunfire sounding in the distance, workers took stock Monday of looted U.N. warehouses and government offices in this town in eastern Chad, the latest victim of unrest that started in Sudan's Darfur region and has spread across a swath of Africa.

Chadian rebels who have bases in Darfur seized this hub for humanitarian workers Saturday, and government forces retook it Sunday. Amid the upheaval, looters pillaged some $1.5 million in U.N. aid and carted off goods from a courthouse, a national bank office, a cigarette factory and the state archives, said Ouaddai provincial Gov. Mahamat Nimir Hamata.

Both Hamata's office and his nearby official residence were stripped of doors, windows and plumbing.

"It's really sad," said Hamata, who seemed particularly troubled by the disappearance of state records. "I don't understand the state of mind of the people. How can you destroy our archives?"

Hamata declared a dusk-to-dawn curfew late Sunday and, in a radio address, pleaded with people to return stolen property.

It was not clear what prompted civilians to loot and target government buildings, but President Idriss Deby, who took power at the head of a rebel army in 1990, is considered unpopular here.

Chadian rebels have clashed sporadically with government forces since 2005 and launched a failed attack on the capital N'djamena in April. The competition for power has become more intense since Chad began exporting oil in 2004. The rebels have been able to exploit volatility in neighboring Sudan, establishing bases in Sudan's troubled Darfur region, which borders eastern Chad.

French troops, who have a base near Abeche some 550 miles east of the capital, deployed to protect Abeche's airport and some 150 foreigners seeking refugee in an aircraft hanger here.

"We are in a state of war," French officer Didier Lebailly told reporters and aid workers who arrived Monday on the first flight into Abeche since rebels briefly held the town.

He said Abeche still is under threat "from all sides." French troops in jeeps mounted with machine guns patrolled the perimeter of the airport.

Gunfire could be heard in the distance after nightfall, and residents said it was rebels fighting government troops north of town. No casualties were immediately reported.

In Paris, French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters Monday: "These new rebel attacks show again the gravity of the situation and the urgency for an international presence to be deployed along the border between Chad and Darfur," he said.

According to initial reports from staff, more than 500 tons of food worth $500,000 were taken from a World Food Program warehouse in Abeche. Also stolen was around $1 million worth of blankets, tents, stoves, medical, communications and water purification supplies and other equipment.

"Stealing food from people who have lost everything is the most shameful and inhumane act that anyone can possibly commit," WFP Executive Director James Morris said.

U.N. and other agencies based in Abeche deliver aid to 218,000 Darfur refugees and some 90,000 internally displaced Chadians.

In the capital, heavily armed Chadian soldiers reinforced their positions Monday. The government insisted its forces were pursuing the rebels in the east toward the Sudanese border.

Troops were positioned throughout the capital, cordoning off key government buildings and supported by at least a dozen tanks guarding the main entrances to the city. Schools have been closed and residents of N'djamena have been stocking up on food and water.

At dawn a French Mirage fighter jet conducted low-level reconnaissance flights over the capital and surrounding areas.

Both France and Britain have issued warnings of reports of rebel forces heading toward the capital, urging against all travel to Chad. The Chadian government has denied rebels were about 250 miles from the capital and said they were no longer advancing.

Besides the rebellion, Chad's government has in recent weeks reported violence pitting ethnic Arab Chadians against ethnic African Chadians, mirroring ethnic clashes in Darfur. Chad accused Sudan of instigating the clashes. Chad often accuses Sudan of supporting Chadian rebels; Sudan makes a similar accusation against Chad.

In Darfur, ethnic African tribes who accuse the central government of neglect launched a rebellion three years ago, following years of low-level tribal clashes over land and water. The government is accused of responding by unleashing ethnic Arab tribal militias who have been linked to atrocities. Strife believed related to Darfur has also been reported in the Central African Republic.

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been displaced since fighting began in Darfur in early 2003.

Chad, an impoverished country in central Africa, has suffered from years of political turmoil that have hampered economic development. The economy relies on livestock and a relatively new oil industry.

Correa Looks Toward Reforms In Ecuador (AP)

By Monte Hayes

AP, November 27, 2006

Rafael Correa, the leftist nationalist headed to victory in Ecuador's presidential race, is already planning radical reforms when he takes office in January.

That is putting him on a fast track to a dangerous confrontation with the country's opposition-controlled Congress — a body he has called a "sewer" but which he needs to carry out his reforms.

"We receive this triumph with deep serenity and humility," the 43-year-old Correa, who calls himself a "personal friend" of Venezuela's anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez, said at a news conference Sunday night.

With 58 percent of the ballots counted, Correa had a 65 percent to 35 percent lead over banana tycoon Alvaro Noboa, Ecuador's Supreme Electoral Tribunal said Monday.

While votes in Noboa's stronghold of Guayas, Ecuador's most populous province, were among the last to be tallied, even a strong advantage there would not be enough for Noboa to win.

Correa's followers took to the streets in caravans with musicians to celebrate a victory that few questioned except Noboa, who said he would await the end of the official count that might not come until Tuesday.

Correa said his victory "is a clear message to our traditional political class of the profound changes that our citizens want. This country doesn't need patching up. It needs a new constitution in tune with the times."

Correa, who has a doctorate in economics from the University of Illinois, surged in voter support as a fresh-faced outsider determined to reform Ecuador's political system.

His view that the Ecuadorean democratic system is designed to benefit parties rather than people is shared by many voters fed up with corruption, greed and incompetence in the political establishment.

During the campaign, Correa attacked Ecuador's Congress as a "sewer" of corruption and ran no candidates for the legislature. He now faces a Congress totally in the hands of his opponents — but says that's not important.

"Let's stop worrying so much about Congress. Let them scrutinize what they want. We're not afraid," he said. "What we won't tolerate is any attempt at instability or blackmail."

Correa says his first act after being sworn in as president on Jan. 15 will be to call for a national referendum on the need to elect a special assembly that could rewrite the constitution and even shut down Congress.

That puts him on a collision course with the legislature, which has dismissed Ecuador's last three elected presidents, violating impeachment proceedings in the process, after huge street protests demanding their ousters.

Jaime Duran, a public opinion analyst who served as chief of staff in a previous government, noted that the congressmen elected in October were just as legitimately elected as Correa.

"They have the same right to serve as Correa does," he said.

Correa's problem is that Congress would have to approve a constitutional reform to allow creation of a constituent assembly. And it has blocked attempts by the last two presidents to rewrite the constitution.

Correa has vowed to rally street protests if lawmakers don't agree to a new constitution that trims the power of the traditional parties.

Many of the reforms he proposes would make politicians more responsive to voters. For example, congressmen would represent districts instead of being elected with a national vote. He also supports allowing recall of all elected officials.

But he risks violating the constitution if he tries to organize an election for a constituent assembly without Congress' approval.

He argues "the voice of the people" as reflected in a national referendum takes precedence over Congress or the constitution — a position challenged by most legal experts.

Insistence on forcing electoral authorities to convene an election for the assembly could put him in risk of impeachment, say experts.

"That immediately creates a conflict with Congress," said Benjamin Ortiz, head of a think tank in Quito.

DOJ_NMG_0099104

Since Correa has no congressmen to defend him, "for the first time there would be sufficient votes to impeach a president without resorting to the murky maneuvers of the past," Ortiz said.

Nicaragua's Total Ban On Abortion Spurs Critics (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Jazmina Bojorge arrived at Managua's Fernando VÃ©lez Paiz Hospital on a Tuesday evening, nearly five months pregnant and racked with fever and abdominal pain. By the following Thursday morning, both the pretty 18-year-old and the female fetus in her womb were dead.

The mystery of what happened during the intervening 36 hours might not ordinarily have catapulted Bojorge into the headlines of a nation with one of the highest maternal mortality rates in the Western Hemisphere.

But a week before her death on Nov. 2, Nicaragua's legislature had voted to ban all abortions, eliminating long-standing exceptions for rape, malformation of the fetus and risk to the life or health of the mother. Now, outraged opponents of the legislation have declared Bojorge its first victim.

"It's clear that fear of punishment kept the doctors from doing what they needed to do to save her -- which was to abort the pregnancy immediately," said Juanita JimÃ©nez of the Women's Autonomous Movement, an advocacy group that is leading the campaign to reverse the ban. "This is exactly what we warned would happen if this law was passed. We've been taken back to the Middle Ages."

Julio CÃ©sar Flores, director of the hospital, countered that the new legislation, which took effect Nov. 19, hadn't even been signed into law when Bojorge arrived for treatment. Her death, which remains under investigation by Nicaraguan medical authorities, "has nothing to do with the abortion law," he said. "These charges are being made by people who are taking advantage of what happened."

The controversy is the latest twist in a debate over the proper limits on abortion that is raging not just in Nicaragua but across Latin America.

With the exception of Cuba, every nation in this predominantly Catholic region either totally prohibits abortion or limits it to extreme circumstances. And while the global trend over the past decade has been to liberalize abortion laws, efforts to do so in Latin America have been met by an equally determined campaign to strengthen them further.

So far, the anti-abortion camp's greatest triumph has been in El Salvador, where in 1998, at the public urging of San Salvador's Archbishop Fernando Saenz Lacalle, lawmakers removed all exceptions to the nation's ban on abortion and increased penalties to up to 50 years' imprisonment.

Here in Nicaragua, the church has also long played an influential role in politics. Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, who is retired but remains a public figure, is still respected by many for standing up to both U.S.-backed dictator Anastasio Somoza during the 1970s and Daniel Ortega, the Marxist-leaning revolutionary who replaced him in the 1980s.

Soon after El Salvador passed its new law, Obando and his successor, Archbishop Leopoldo Brenes, turned their attention to pressing for a similar measure in Nicaragua.

Abortion had been illegal in Nicaragua for more than a century, punishable by prison terms of up to four years for women undergoing the procedure and 10 years for doctors who performed it.

However, the penal code made an exception for "therapeutic abortion" if three doctors determined it was needed. According to Health Ministry regulations, this covered abortions of pregnancies lasting 20 weeks or less that posed a threat to the life or health of the mother or in which the fetus was malformed. In practice, rape victims were also permitted legal abortions.

Advocates for greater access to abortion argued that even that law was too restrictive, prompting an estimated 32,500 women to get illegal and potentially unsafe abortions in Nicaragua every year and accounting for 16 percent of the more than 100 maternal deaths here annually, according to a 2002 ministry study. By contrast, the Health Ministry recorded only six legal abortions in Nicaragua last year.

But church leaders and other anti-abortion activists in Nicaragua contended that the number of legal abortions in Nicaragua was far higher, reaching about 1,000 a year.

"This idea of 'therapeutic abortion' was being abused," said Brenes, the archbishop. "People were easily getting doctors to say that the abortion was being done to save the mother's life, when in reality it was a person who just said, 'I don't want this child.' "

Nicaragua's tight presidential election this month offered Nicaragua's anti-abortion movement the opening it had been waiting for: With Ortega's conservative opposition evenly divided between two challengers, none of the top three candidates could afford to alienate the church.

DOJ_NMG_0099105

On Oct. 6, Obando, Brenes and various evangelical pastors led tens of thousands of citizens in a march to the National Assembly to demand a repeal of the exception for therapeutic abortions. Legislators obliged, fast-tracking consideration of the ban under procedures normally reserved for national emergencies.

Every major medical society in Nicaragua opposed the proposed ban. Their concerns were echoed by Nicaragua's health minister and a long list of foreign embassies and international organizations such as the U.N. Development Program.

"But the legislators wouldn't even meet with us," said Carmen SolÃ³rzano, a leading member of Nicaragua's Society of Obstetrics and Gynecology. "I'm indignant that in a state that is supposedly secular, the church has so much influence while the government won't even listen to doctors."

The Rev. Rolando Ãlvarez, spokesman for the Managua archdiocese, said that although church leaders oppose abortions in the case of rape or a malformed fetus, they intend to urge lawmakers to clarify that the elimination of therapeutic abortion should not prevent doctors from saving a woman's life when her pregnancy puts her in mortal danger.

Women's rights groups and medical associations, meanwhile, are preparing to petition Nicaragua's highest court to declare the ban unconstitutional. That approach met with success last May in Colombia, which, like El Salvador, had a blanket prohibition on abortions.

Failing that, activists who oppose the ban say they will take their case to an international body such the U.N. Human Rights Committee or the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights -- with Bojorge's relatives the likely plaintiffs.

According to Flores, the hospital director, although Bojorge showed signs of vaginal bleeding and uterine contractions on her arrival at the hospital, doctors decided to give her medication to stave off the contractions because an ultrasound indicated that her fetus was alive. The next day, another test indicated that the fetus had died, and Bojorge was taken off the medication to allow her body to expel the dead fetus naturally. Instead, she went into shock, possibly because the placenta had detached, causing massive blood loss.

Flores contends that the doctors' decision to prevent Bojorge from delivering while the fetus was still alive was routine. JimÃ©nez, of the Women's Autonomous Movement, argues that it was an extremely risky undertaking for a hospital that lacked ready access to ultrasound equipment. (The hospital's equipment is broken, forcing doctors to transport patients to a separate facility for scans.)

"In this sort of situation, the safe thing to do is to just abort the fetus," JimÃ©nez said. "It's obvious that the doctors were paralyzed by the new law."

Bojorge's relatives, meanwhile, are not sure what to think. "No one at the hospital ever told us what was going on," her mother, Rosa Rodriguez, 44, said sadly during an interview in front of the tidy tin shack where Bojorge lived with her husband and 4-year-old son.

Rodriguez and Bojorge's husband, Marvin Savala, a 24-year-old construction worker, had not even heard of the charge that the new abortion legislation may have played a role in Bojorge's death.

But as he contemplated that possibility, Savala's eyes darkened.

"If that's the case, then the doctors were very wrong," he said. "They should have done whatever it took to save my wife. Now I've lost not just our baby, but my whole family."

Cuban Rock Climbers Inspired By Foreigners Irk Castro Regime Youths Are Asked For Permits And Visited By Officials; No Fraternizing Allowed (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

VIÑALES, Cuba -- Seventy feet up a sheer limestone cliff known as La Cuchillita, or Little Blade, 17-year-old Roylandi González held onto a ledge by his fingertips. Then he glanced down to check the harness around his waist, grabbed hold of the rope that was tethered above him and started shimmying downward.

Over the past several years, adventurous Cuban youths like Mr. González, schooled by an influx of foreign rock climbers, have turned this western town into an extreme-sport mecca. Climbers test their mettle on dramatic crags, barely touched by man, which soar above a green valley designated as a United Nations World Heritage Site.

But climbers who have conquered Viñales's jagged peaks and imposing walls are now bumping up against a more formidable obstacle: the Communist political system. As Mr. González touched earth and removed his hard hat, he cast a wary eye for park rangers and police. "They threaten us and chase us off the hills," he said. "There's something about rock climbing that really seems to worry our government."

As Cubans begin contemplating life after Fidel Castro, rock climbing has emerged as an improbable political battleground between the government and young Cubans eager to embrace the latest foreign fashions. In 2003, amid a broad crackdown on civil liberties and fraternizing between tourists and Cubans, the government announced that rock climbers henceforth would be required to obtain a special permit. But the government has never granted the required permit to the many climbers who have requested one. Many Cubans and foreigners have continued climbing.

Adrián Pérez Martínez, a 20-year-old art teacher with a joker tattooed on his shoulder, says that police showed up at his house recently to warn him against climbing, especially with foreigners. "Good Cubans don't do this," he says they told him. "Climbers use drugs. And you shouldn't take foreigners to militarily significant areas." Indeed, some caves in the climbing area are designated as civil-defense sites in the event of a U.S. invasion.

Some of the official anxiety over climbing seems to be based on Cuba's revolutionary history. The revolution that brought Mr. Castro to power in 1959 was launched from a clandestine encampment in the Sierra Maestra Mountains on the eastern end of the island. Mr. Castro became intimately familiar with Cuba's highest mountain, 6,500-foot Pico Turquino. "The Revolution was the work of climbers and cavers," Mr. Castro once said, according to a history by Antonio Nuñez Jimenéz, a prominent revolutionary leader and naturalist.

Now the Cuban government may be worried that history will repeat itself. "The system is paranoid about Cubans' private activities, but especially when those activities are occurring in hills away from sight and when foreigners are involved," says Vitalio Echazabal, one of the first Cubans to take up rock climbing in the 1990s. "The authorities would ask, 'Are they spies? What are they plotting up there?' " Mr. Echazabal got so fed up that he defected to Spain during a climbing expedition in 2001, one of three Cuban climbers who have escaped the island during international sporting events. About a half-dozen other Cuban climbers got off the island after marrying foreigners they met on the hills.

The exodus of climbers has only served to intensify official suspicion of the sport. "Climbers are very independent people, and the Cuban government has a real hard time with anything it cannot control -- even a form of recreation," says Armando Menocal, a 65-year-old Wyoming lawyer who is the leading international proponent of Cuban climbing. Mr. Menocal, who runs the Cubaclimbing.com1 Web site, has been caught in the climbing backlash himself.

Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Menocal, who has family ties to Cuba, started training Cuban climbers, mapping local routes and importing donated equipment. But after having made about 15 climbing trips to Cuba over the past eight years, Mr. Menocal has been turned back by immigration officers at the Havana airport the last two times he tried to get into the country, most recently earlier this month. The authorities, he says, offered no explanation.

The 100 or so climbers remaining in Cuba would certainly welcome his return. Without official funding, Cuban climbers rely on equipment sent by Mr. Menocal or donated by tourists. José Luis Fuentes, a 20-year-old climber, says his shoes were given to him by an Italian, his rope by a Canadian and his harness by an American. "You speak a common language with other climbers no matter where they come from," he says.

He isn't sure it's a language Cuba's leaders could understand. "Older people just think we're a bunch of crazy kids," says Mr. Fuentes.

Climbing has attracted a special breed of Cuban youth since Mr. Menocal and some American friends used a slide show to recruit a core group of about half a dozen Cuban climbers in 1999. One Cuban went AWOL from his military unit to go on an outing with Mr. Menocal, subsequently earning two weeks in the brig.

Official eyes were watching. "The Cubans were always being persecuted because it was not looked upon favorably to socialize with foreigners," says Craig Luebben, a rock-climbing guide and journalist from Colorado who has made several trips to Cuba. As the pressure increased, the Cubans and their American climbing partners would avoid appearing together publicly, arranging separate transportation to a rendezvous at the secluded climbing site, Mr. Luebben says.

Climbers say official government climbing policy has been inconsistent. A few years ago, Hollywood, a cigarette brand partly owned by the government, launched an ad campaign featuring a Cuban climber. Yet at around the same time, Mr. Menocal on trips to Cuba was called before two different government authorities and told climbing wasn't permitted.

The inconsistencies continue today. On a recent day at the park visitors center near the Viñales climbing site, there were large posters of climbers in action. Nevertheless, the park ranger on duty insisted that climbing without a permit wasn't allowed under the 2003 law. "It's not something one should even consider," he said, though he had no idea how one might go about getting a permit.

The climbers are regrouping under the leadership of Alexei Suárez, a medical worker who sometimes reaches his second-story Havana apartment by scaling the wall. He has been talking with government officials, trying to better climbing's image, and he says the Cuban sports ministry has been very supportive. "We are loyal Cubans who want to make Cuba famous for climbing champions," Mr. Suárez says.

U.S. Embassy Asks Bush Twins To Leave Country (ABC News)

Joe Goldman and Rhonda Schwartz Report:

Amid a growing barrage of front-page headlines, U.S. embassy officials "strongly suggested" President Bush's twin daughters, Jenna and Barbara Bush, cut short their trip to Buenos Aires because of security issues, U.S. diplomatic and security sources tell ABC News.

But the girls have stayed on, celebrating their 25th birthday over the weekend and producing even more headlines about their activities.

Officials say the media coverage upstaged publicity plans for the new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne, who had only recently arrived in the country.

Neither the White House nor the U.S. embassy in Buenos Aires responded to requests for comment.

The Argentinean press blitz followed a report on "The Blotter" last week that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were stolen last weekend while dining at the popular San Telmo outdoor marketplace despite being guarded by the Secret Service.

Stories of the twins' visit took on wild proportions in the Argentinean press. One tabloid headline had the young women running nude in the hallway of their hotel, a report the hotel staff denied to ABC News.

According to sources, the U.S. embassy encouraged the two girls to cut their stay short because the added attention was making their security very difficult.

But to the dismay and anger of some U.S. embassy and security staff, the girls stayed on.

Thursday night, an ABC News producer was able to walk into their hotel unchecked and engage Barbara Bush in conversation while she checked her e-mail on a computer in the lobby. Jenna sat talking with friends on a sofa nearby. No Secret Service agents were anywhere to be seen in the lobby, according to ABC News' Joe Goldman.

And yesterday the Bush twins were spotted at the Sunday soccer matches, wearing team jerseys and sitting in the owner's box, watching Argentina's top team Boca Juniors compete. Several games have been canceled due to violence in the crowds this year. In fact, last weekend no spectators were allowed to attend the match other than season ticket holders.

Hot Topics but No Heated Discussions as Amy Holmes Sits In on 'The View'

In her usual TV talking-head gigs, Amy Holmes debates matters such as whether Alcee Hastings should head the House Intelligence Committee and the consequences of Don Rumsfel d's resignation. Yesterday's topics? Where she likes to Christmas-shop, her recent breakup with a boyfriend, and how hot that Daniel Craig is!

So it went as the former Bill Frist speechwriter sat in as guest co-host with the ladies of ABC's "The View." Producer Barbara Walters has said she's looking for a minority woman to replace Star Jones Reynolds-- does yesterday's show mean Holmes is a contender? "I just looked at it as a great opportunity," the D.C. resident told us.

Holmes, who has mostly been doing TV work since leaving Frist's office this summer, said she had some apprehension that her GOP ties would set her up for a battle with feisty liberal hosts Rosie O'Donnell and Joy Behar. "I was told before going on to think of it as a dinner party: You want to get your points in, but you don't want to be rude." But there were few cracks, even as Holmes showed photos of herself meeting Bush , Cheney and Clinton. (Was that our former colleague and her long-ago squeeze Lloyd Grove in the background?)

Elisabeth Hasselback asked if she had ever written a speech she didn't agree with. Holmes replied, "I worked with other people on the staff to develop [Frist's] policy positions. . . . It was a privilege."

O'Donnell gazed at Holmes with an I-hear-ya nod, then added : "You're very pretty."

"They were professionals about putting me and other guests on the show at ease," Holmes said later. "I didn't have the feeling I was dealing with divas. It can be more of a pit fight to be with Paul Begala on a cable show."It's Their Party and They'll Stay if They Want To

Those globe-trotting twins Barbara and Jenna Bush continued their Argentine birthday getaway Sunday with shopping and soccer.

The sisters, who turned 25 on Saturday, popped up Sunday morning in the Buenos Aires antiques market at Plaza Dorrego in trendy San Telmo (the same district where a thief nabbed Barbara's purse and cellphone while she dined last week). Casually dressed, with no security visible, the daughters went unrecognized by the local crowd, reports our colleague Libby Copeland. Later, they donned the blue and yellow jerseys of the Boca Juniors and sat in the owner's box for the team's match at La Bombonera stadium, where some games have been canceled because of violence.

After the purse-snatching, which sparked a media frenzy throughout South America, the Argentine interior minister told reporters, "From now on, we are participating actively" in protecting the twins. Late yesterday, the U.S. Embassy there issued a statement denying an ABC News report that embassy officials had "strongly suggested" the twins cut their trip short because of security issues. (ABC also reported that the twins got all the attention, not new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne.) Rather, embassy officials provided "close support and cooperation."

Barbara left the country late Sunday night; plans called for Jenna to party on until Thursday.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

A High Point For Nepal (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

THERE ARE A thousand ways for war to break out, it seems, but so few chances for peace to prevail. So let us take a moment to celebrate developments in Nepal, whose people danced in the streets last week after Maoist rebels signed a peace accord with the government to end a decade-long insurgency that has killed 13,000 people.

Nepal's political progress has been nothing short of remarkable. In less than seven months, its demonstrations of "people power" have forced a tyrannical king to surrender power and pushed the violent insurgents to the negotiating table. On Dec. 1, the insurgents will take their place in a temporary Cabinet; their army is to be confined in camps, and they will participate in elections next year. Meanwhile, the king has been stripped of immunity and virtually all his powers. It has not been easy or painless, but it has been accomplished without suicide bombings, without military action and, except for some skillful U.N. diplomatic help in the endgame, without foreign intervention.

There are, of course, many ways the peace deal could unravel in the South Asian nation of nearly 30 million people, home to eight of the world's 10 highest mountains. It is highly unlikely that the inept and reviled King Gyanendra could manage a comeback. He triggered the crisis by dismissing the elected parliament and prime minister. Still, his dynasty is 238 years old, and some Nepalis believe that he is the reincarnation of the Hindu god Vishnu. The new legislature, to be elected in June, is slated to take up the controversial issue of whether Nepal should be a kingdom or a republic.

Long before the elections, however, there is the possibility that the power-sharing arrangement in the interim government will break down. The U.N. can provide monitoring, but it cannot force the rebels or the royal army to stand down their troops or heavy weapons — and light arms simply can't be corralled.

One of the most tragic legacies of Nepal's lengthy violence is the thousands of people who have disappeared. Human rights activists are keen to see those responsible on both sides prosecuted. Perhaps the Nepalis, who've shown great wisdom and creativity in applying the lessons of democratic activism in other lands to their own democracy movement, will manage the trick of balancing the need to punish the guilty with the imperative of reconciling a dangerously and bitterly divided society.

El-Masri case goes to appeals court

By LARRY O'DELL
Associated Press Writer

November 28, 2006 RICHMOND, Va. -- The case of a German man who claims the CIA held him captive and tortured him went before a federal appeals court Tuesday.

Khaled El-Masri wants the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to reinstate his lawsuit alleging human rights and due process violations by former CIA director George Tenet and others. A federal judge dismissed the case in May, ruling that a trial could divulge state secrets and endanger national security.

El-Masri's lawyers claim the government is invoking its state secret privilege to avoid accountability. They say the suit can be decided based on what is already known about the CIA's "extraordinary rendition" program in the war on terror and the specifics of El-Masri's case without exposing state secrets.

The rendition program, in which terror suspects are captured and taken to foreign countries for interrogation, has been heavily criticized by human rights groups.

The Lebanese-born El-Masri alleges he was mistakenly identified as an associate of the Sept. 11 hijackers and was kidnapped while attempting to enter Macedonia on New Year's Eve 2003. He claims he was flown to a CIA-run prison known as the "salt pit" in Kabul, where he was beaten and sodomized with a foreign object during five months in captivity.

The lawsuit seeks damages of at least $75,000.

American Red Cross faces new fine over blood safety

By ANDREW BRIDGES
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The American Red Cross is facing another heavy fine over blood-safety violations, bringing penalties against the organization to more than $15 million despite a promise three years ago to fix the problems.

The Food and Drug Administration disclosed that it had fined the organization $5.7 million recently for continuing to violate blood-safety rules and failure to comply with a 2003 agreement aimed at correcting the unsafe practices.

The latest fine was noted in an FDA letter dated Nov. 21, to Red Cross interim president and CEO Jack McGuire, and posted Monday on the FDA Web site.

The Red Cross was given a mid-December deadline to produce a report on how it intended to comply with FDA requirements, or possibly be subject to additional penalties.

The latest fine is being added to a tally of nearly $10 million in previous FDA penalties for violation of blood-safety laws, regulations and the terms of the 2003 consent decree.

That settlement resolved charges that the Red Cross had committed "persistent and serious violations" of federal blood safety rules dating back 17 years.

In 2004, the Red Cross implemented a plan, with the FDA's blessing, to detect, investigate, monitor and correct the sorts of problems repeatedly cited by government investigators.

A 2005 inspection of a Red Cross facility in West Henrietta, N.Y. was supposed to be the first comprehensive evaluation of how the plan was working. But the federal inspectors, over 29 days, turned up 207 deviations from the plan, the FDA said.

The latest fine of $5.7 million stems from that inspection.

The inspectors found shortcomings in quality assurance, inventory management, control of non-conforming blood products, donor screening and blood component manufacturing issues as well as other problems, according to the FDA.

The Red Cross said it would devise a new plan to comply with FDA requirements. The Red Cross board of governors also has asked for an independent and comprehensive assessment of how it complies with FDA regulatory requirements.

The Red Cross does not use donated money to pay fines, but instead relies on operating funds, according to the organization. Those include revenue from the sales of blood products.

The Red Cross provides more than 40 percent of the nation's blood supply, selling blood products to health facilities.

Supreme Court Reviews U.S. Patent Rules in Suit Over Gas Pedals

By Susan Decker

The U.S. Supreme Court is using a dispute over automotive gas pedals to consider making it harder for some inventors to get patent protection for their innovations.

The justices will hear arguments today in a bid by KSR International Co. to stop a lawsuit that accuses it of using Teleflex Inc.'s patented invention for adjustable gas pedals. KSR is asking the court to rule that innovations that merely combine existing products often don't qualify for a patent.

Most patents are issued for improvements to existing products rather than entirely new inventions. A ruling for KSR may make it harder to get patents and easier to challenge them in court. Backing KSR are technology companies Intel Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc., which say getting a patent is too easy. On the other side, Tylenol maker Johnson & Johnson and Scotch tape maker 3M Co. say weakening patent protection would harm innovation.

The case ``goes to the whole heart of the test of patentability,'' said Frank Porcelli, a patent lawyer with Fish & Richardson in Boston. A Supreme Court ruling for KSR would open the way for arguments that ``a lot of patents were granted that arguably shouldn't have been granted,'' he said.

About 1.6 million U.S. patents are in force, according to the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. That's about 23 percent of more than 7 million patents issued in the nation's history. Under current law, patents expire 20 years from the date the application was filed.

`Non-Obvious'

Patents are issued to inventions that are ``new, useful and non-obvious'' -- in other words, innovations that wouldn't have been evident to a person who understands the basic technology.

The dispute affects ``85 to 90 percent of all intellectual discussion and work that goes on in the patent office,'' said Gerald Mossinghoff, a former patent commissioner now with the law firm Oblon Spivak McClelland Maier & Neustadt in Alexandria, Virginia.

The dispute over patent law also is being argued in Congress, where the technology industry is lobbying for changes to reduce infringement suits and damage awards.

Computers and other technology-based products use thousands of patented inventions. The Coalition for Patent Fairness, a Washington-based industry group, says technology companies are sued too often by patent holders. Intel, based in Santa Clara, California, and Cisco, based in San Jose, California, are among the group's members that filed briefs supporting KSR.

KSR also is backed by the Bush administration, which said too many patents are issued for ``non-innovative combinations."

Drug and Biotechnology

In contrast, drug, biotechnology and multi-industry companies say they need strong patent-enforcement rights to protect the billions of dollars they spend each year researching new products. General Electric Co., the world's second-biggest company by market value, joined Johnson & Johnson, based in New Brunswick, New Jersey, and 3M, based in St. Paul, Minnesota, in filing a brief supporting Teleflex. GE is based in Fairfield, Connecticut.

Limerick, Pennsylvania-based Teleflex, which has since sold its auto-pedal business, sued Ridgetown, Ontario-based KSR in 2002. The suit said KSR infringed Teleflex's patent for an electronic control combined with gas, brake or clutch pedals that adjust to the driver's height.

Closely held KSR makes the pedals for General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet and GMC trucks and sport-utility vehicles.

A trial judge in Detroit threw out the suit, saying the Teleflex patent was invalid because it merely joined two known inventions.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Washington, which specializes in patent law, revived the lawsuit against KSR.

Teaching or Suggestion

The court said a challenge to a patent must do more than show that the technology combined two known inventions. To invalidate a patent, a challenger should prove the existence of a ``teaching, suggestion or motivation" that would encourage someone to combine the prior inventions, the court said.

Millions of patents have been issued under that standard and ``if you change the rule, it will call into question innumerable patents," said Teleflex lawyer Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in Washington. ``Every invention takes what used to exist and puts it together in a novel way."

KSR argues the Federal Circuit's standard makes it too hard to challenge patents. KSR lawyer James Dabney of Fried Frank Harris Shriver & Jacobson in New York said challengers should be able to prove an invention is obvious by showing that someone with ``skill and ability" could have come up with the idea to combine the prior innovations.

Teleflex sold its auto-pedal business in August 2005 to DriveSol Worldwide, an affiliate of Sun Capital Partners Inc., a private investment firm based in Boca Raton, Florida. Sun Capital has taken over the case.

The case is KSR International v. Teleflex, 04-1350.

Dirty Laundry

Mark Tatge and Miriam Gottfried

Cintas has long been a leader in uniform rentals and cleaning services. But is it playing fair with customers?

Scott D. Farmer, the 47-year-old chief of Cintas Corp., likes to boast about how cheap he is. "This looks like wood paneling, but it's wallpaper," he smiles, tapping the hollow wall behind the desk in his office. "We have a Spartan approach." He learned that from his dad, Richard T. Farmer, who kept a tight lid on costs while delivering a 37-year streak of consecutive sales and profit gains, building Cintas into a giant provider of uniform rentals and cleaning services. In the fiscal year ended May 31 the Cincinnati company netted $327 million on $3.4 billion in revenue, up 8.8% and 11%, respectively, from a year earlier.

Wall Street loves a cheapskate. But to judge from a cascade of complaints and lawsuits, Cintas has been squeezing pennies a little too hard in an industry known for tough sales tactics. Typical among unhappy customers is Diana Stever, owner of an eight-employee truck repair outfit in Duenweg, Mo. She claims recurring annoyances. Among them: Cintas delivered uniform pants with holes, tacked on escalating service charges of $5 to $20 a week and, she says, tricked her into renewing her five-year contract (she was told it was about to expire when it wasn't up for another year). In June Stever quit Cintas--one of its drivers was her friend and let her out of her contract early--and now rents from rival Aramark.

Big clients have been unhappy, too. The Inspector General for the U.S. Postal Service is investigating whether Cintas violated the federal False\l "I" Claims\l "I" Act\l "I" when it tacked millions of dollars in "environmental fees" on uniforms, mops, mats and towels it cleaned for the postal service as part of a ten-year, $200 million contract. The question on the table is whether Cintas claimed it was under government orders to slap on the charges when, in fact, no such regulatory fees existed. In 2004 the IG subpoenaed Cintas' records of how much it collected from enviro surcharges and a year later went to court to enforce the writ, since the company had failed to comply. While the results of the probe have not been released, the subpoena cites a 2001 lawsuit in Alabama Circuit Court claiming that similar charges on customer invoices were bogus. That suit, originally seeking $175 million, was settled for $14 million. Cintas has stopped imposing such fees.

As for deceptive sales practices that some customers and former employees say still continue, Scott Farmer loses his trademark grin. "All of our partners"--read: employees and customers--"can call a 1-800 number," he says. "Any claim that is made is investigated." He adds, "If somebody does something wrong, they don't last long here."

But with myriad pressures on its businesses, Cintas can't help pushing its thousands of salespeople and drivers to squeeze out whatever they can. The double-digit profit and sales gains of Richard's reign are tougher than ever to come by, thanks to higher operating costs (energy is a big factor) and three powerful competitors--Aramark, G& K Services and UniFirst--in the $10-billion-a-year uniform-rental industry. Job losses in manufacturing and automotive services, two of the largest customers, have been devastating. Last year uniform rentals and laundry accounted for 75% of revenue and 86% of earnings before interest and taxes. Yet Cintas' top-line growth is now being driven by ancillary products, such as fire extinguishers, air fresheners, bandages, cough drops and lip balm, and services like document-shredding and restroom-cleaning. It has spent $1.3 billion on acquisitions since 2002. The additional businesses accounted for roughly 40% of sales growth last year. Company shares, a recent $42.50, are off 25% from their high in 2002.

Cintas began life as the Acme Industrial Laundry Co. in 1929. Scott's great-grandfather, Richard (Doc) Farmer, a circus prizefighter, collected chemical-soaked rags from factories and washed and returned them for a fee. His grandson Richard T.--now 71, still chairman and a billionaire--joined the family business in 1956 after graduating from Miami University of Ohio. He combined salesmanship with sleight of hand. To demonstrate how much more absorbent Cintas towels were, he grabbed two samples--one from Cintas, the other from a competitor--tied each in a knot and tossed them into a tankful of water. But Farmer was always careful to leave the knot looser on his towel so that it sank faster, according to his autobiography, Rags to Riches (Orange Frazer Press, 2004). Early on Richard recognized that growth lay in uniform rentals; that insight helped sales zoom from $300,000 in 1959 to $847,000 in 1963.

Over the next 30 years Cintas acquired more than 220 companies, improving operations and cutting costs. Farmer hired college-educated managers and built a sales organization that paid drivers and salesmen handsome commissions. A good driver could earn $75,000. Farmer also made product improvements--he started offering work wear with fabrics that resisted wrinkles and stains. By 2003 Cintas had 30% of the commercial laundry and uniform market, says market researcher ibis World. For some of that surge Scott, who joined the company in 1981 and became chief executive in 2003, can take credit. He introduced the first catalog of work wear in 1991; sales are now $510 million.

Today Cintas is trying to stay on top, partly with technology. Its drivers now have handheld Dell computers with touch screens to record orders, price changes and payments. But its plants--even the one in Milford, Ohio, built in 1997--are a bit behind the high-tech curve. Big black bags holding 250 pounds of dirty coveralls and uniforms are dumped from a rail system overhead into 450-pound steel washers big enough to scrub a small rhino. Once the laundry is cleaned and dried, it still has to be hand-sorted. Workers earning $8 to $13 an hour scan each item using bar-code labels--sewn by Cintas into the garment--to find out whose laundry has just been cleaned. Cintas executives say they are waiting for the next generation of RFID chips, with customer information embedded in garments, to further automate the process. That step is years away.

Meantime the compulsion to get new business has sometimes driven Cintas to extremes. For years it tried to get the multi-million-a-year account supplying uniforms to McDonald's North American outlets. The fast-food chain kept demurring, in favor of Terry Manufacturing, a minority contractor in Roanoke, Ala. In 2000 Cintas invested $5.4 million for 49% of a joint venture with Terry that was licensed to supply the uniforms. But a lawsuit filed in 2004 by a federal bankruptcy trustee in Alabama alleges that the joint venture kept no accounting records, had few assets, held no board meetings and routinely diverted sales to Terry and Cintas. At year-end 2002 Terry reported a net worth of $26.2 million. Months later it was insolvent. In July 2003 Terry Manufacturing declared bankruptcy, sparking more than 200 claims from creditors, who alleged losses of $100 million--and investigations by the FBI, the IRS and the U.S. Department of Labor.

Proprietors Rudolph and Roy Terry were accused of living a "champagne lifestyle" with company assets--from junkets to Las Vegas and sports skybox rentals to purchasing millions of dollars' worth of real estate in Jamaica. Roy Terry pleaded guilty in June 2005 to several counts of fraud and one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and received 61/2 years and $31 million in restitution. His brother Rudolph pleaded guilty last April to one count of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. and will spend 41 months in prison and pay $5.5 million in restitution. Scott Farmer and other Cintas executives are accused by the bankruptcy trustee of preparing bogus financial statements, violating their fiduciary duties and "conspiring" with Terry Manufacturing to deceive creditors. If the charges stick, Cintas might have to pay $50 million in compensatory damages and $100 million in punitive damages. No court date has been set.

"We don't agree with their position," says Scott Farmer of the trustee. "And nobody from our side did anything wrong." Cintas, he continues, lost $4.3 million on the joint venture after selling its interest back to the Terrys.

Small charge, small change. The most frequent criticism of Cintas--from former customers, salespeople and drivers--is that the company nickel-and-dimes everyone to death. In the 2002 case settled in Alabama, Cintas was accused of overcharging 480,000 customers $5 to $7 a week in environmental fees. Penny-ante stuff on an epic scale, amounting to an alleged $175 million a year. Today the company has 700,000 customers.

Former Cintas salesmen say they were trained to push unnecessary and excessive amounts of products and services and given financial incentives to persuade customers to sign a five-year contract for, typically, $25 to $100 a week. Onetime drivers say they were pressed to tack on extra services when they delivered fresh uniforms and supplies each week, and to raise prices incrementally until the customer caught on. When clients try to end their contracts early, Cintas calls their attention to the binding-arbitration clause dictated in the contract.

The company declines to comment on most individual complaints. All Cintas employees, says spokeswoman Pamela J. Lowe, must sign a statement that they agree to the company's code of conduct; all managers, she says, go through ethics training. Sales reps are supposed to conduct satisfaction surveys within 48 hours of signing new accounts and to check in periodically throughout the year.

Some cases slip through the cracks. A salesman from the Corpus Christi, Tex. plant got Rene Casas, 39, owner of an oil and gas construction company, to sign one contract, only to ask Casas' plant manager to sign another on the same date. There was one difference between the two documents: a stipulation in the plant manager's version saying Casas would have to buy the special fire-retardant uniforms for his 85 workers if he ever decided to quit Cintas. Now Casas wants to do just that, and Cintas filed suit against his business in mid-November for $33,525, the claimed value of the uniforms. "This is just unethical," Casas says. Once they've got you, I guess they expect you to be their customer forever."

Timothy Dziekonski, 31, an auto shop owner in Unionville, N.Y., signed a Cintas contract after, he says, being reassured by a salesman that it would be a nonbinding agreement. Instead of collecting a signature in person, Dziekonski says, the salesman faxed the first page of the agreement to be sent back signed but never sent the second page, which detailed the five-year commitment. David Levy, a former Cintas salesman in San Diego, said similar high-pressure tactics are not uncommon. "We were told never to call it a 'contract,'" he recalls. Dziekonski got out of his contract eight months into it, after sending Cintas a certified letter of complaint and hearing nothing back.

Some customers give in after a struggle. José Vargas, an alignment and suspension repair shop owner in San Francisco, says he found that Cintas failed to credit six checks he sent them, totaling $1,000. The accounting department, he says, claimed it never received the payments, but Vargas' bank records show the checks were cashed and stamped by Cintas. Angry, Vargas tried to end his contract early, but Cintas demanded he pay $4,045 to cover the rest of his five-year contract. After his lawyer contacted a Cintas plant manager, that sum dropped to $108. "I didn't owe them anything," says Vargas, who nevertheless paid the money. "I just wanted to get it over with and move on."

Spokeswoman Lowe insists such cases are the exception. Cintas' retention rate is 92%; two-thirds of all its customers, she claims, are highly satisfied. "Companies our size are going to have some disgruntled customers," Lowe says. "The bigger story is that most of our customers are happy."

But some former employees argue that gouging was standard practice. Ex-drivers Anthony P. Pianelli and Phillip Gemmati say they were pressured to raise revenues at least 50% per year at the West Palm Beach, Fla. office. Other ex-drivers confirm it was in their interest to do so: The more items or service charges--like $3.50 to change toilet paper--drivers added to the bill, the higher their paychecks. To get add-ons past customers, Pianelli and Gemmati say they forged signatures, got lower-level clerks to sign the invoice--even distracted the customer from looking at the bill. "We would talk about football or something to take their mind off the bill," Pianelli recalls. "If the customer bitched, we were told to take it off the bill most never noticed they were getting screwed by Cintas."

The West Palm Beach office had an unusual way of recording lost business, according to Gemmati. When a customer canceled a $550-a-week account, it was recorded as "no service" on the books. Then the account would gradually be reduced, first to $250 per week, then $125 and so on until it was written off as a $50 loss. The lost account was booked at $50 instead of $550, making everyone look better. Gemmati claims this was done with about $150,000 in accounts he handled. "My conscience couldn't live with it anymore," says Gemmati, who quit in 2004 to found Uniform Cost Solutions, which advises companies on how to save money on their uniform rentals and laundry bills.

Drivers were pushed so hard to drum up new business and bring in more sales that they often worked more than 40 hours a week. They made commissions on sales, but Cintas didn't always pay overtime, a mistake that led to two lawsuits. The first, filed on behalf of 800 California drivers, alleged that Cintas failed to properly record and compensate drivers for overtime and was settled in 2003 for $10 million. Later that same year a group of 2,400 drivers from across the nation filed another class action making similar claims. The plaintiffs are still awaiting class certification. Says Scott Farmer, "Those [claims], we believe, are bogus."

Cintas is fully capable of hitting back--hard. Unite Here, a union representing 450,000 members, has waged an unsuccessful four-year campaign with the Teamsters to organize Cintas workers. In 2004 Cintas filed a defamation suit after Unite issued a press release about a National Labor Relations Board decision, saying the government had found that Cintas had committed widespread violations of federal law. Cintas, claiming false characterization by Unite, says its stock dropped almost $5 in heavy trading, knocking more than $300 million off its market cap. The lawsuit, which seeks unspecified damages, is still pending in state court in Ohio.

Former sales rep Barbara Perez calls Cintas vengeful. This summer she quit the company's safety sales division in Denver and joined a competitor, First Aid & Safety 2000. She says has been repeatedly followed by Cintas managers when she goes out on sales calls. "They want to know where I am going," she says. "A majority of my customers came with me because they just hated Cintas so much." Adds Perez's boss, Safety 2000 owner Gordon Elliott: "I told her the next time it happens to pull over and call the police."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules Parts Of Terror Listing Order Unconstitutional. The Washington Post (11/29, A12, Eggen) reports, "A Los Angeles federal judge has ruled that key portions of a presidential order blocking financial assistance to terrorist groups are unconstitutional, further complicating the Bush administration's attempts to defend its aggressive anti-terrorism tactics in federal courts." The Post continues, "U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released late Monday, found that two provisions of an executive order signed Sept. 23, 2001, are impermissibly vague because they allow the president to unilaterally designate organizations as terrorist groups and broadly prohibit association with such groups." The Post adds, "The ruling marks a victory for the Humanitarian Law Project and other plaintiffs in the case, who are seeking to provide support for the 'lawful, nonviolent activities' of two groups designated terrorist organizations by the U.S. government: the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in Turkey and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), also known as the Tamil Tigers, in Sri Lanka. … They argue that federal anti-terrorism laws put charities and individual donors at risk of prosecution for providing benign assistance to foreign groups that have been added to the government's terrorism list." The Post notes, "The Justice Department said it is too early to decide on an appeal. … 'We are pleased that the court rejected many of the constitutional arguments raised by the plaintiffs,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. 'However, we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional.'"

The New York Times (11/29, Liptak) reports that Judge Collins ruled that the "executive order violated the Constitution because it was made without any announced standards. … The order 'provides no explanation of the basis upon which these 27 groups and individuals were designated,'" Judge Collins ruled. "'The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion.' … That means, Judge Collins wrote, that 'the president's designation authority is constitutionally vague.'" The Times adds, "David Cole, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, said yesterday that Judge Collins had broken new ground. … 'It's the first decision to challenge the constitutionality of what is clearly the broadest power to blacklist individuals and groups on the statute books,' Mr. Cole said. … The designation blocks financial and other interactions with the specified groups." The Times adds, "Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the government was pleased that Judge Collins upheld the ban on providing services to terrorist organizations. … 'However,' Ms. Scolinos said, 'we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Schmitt) reports, "The ruling came in a long-running lawsuit before Collins in which humanitarian groups are seeking to support the nonviolent work of two groups that the secretary of State has designated as terrorist: the Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey; and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka. … Earlier in the case, Collins struck down portions of a law that made it a felony to provide 'material support' to terrorists, saying that language in the Patriot Act, which had amended the law, was ill-defined. The Justice Department has often used the material support law in prosecuting terrorist cases." The Times adds, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency believed that the judge erred in her decision. … Collins' latest ruling could affect another one of the administration's most widely used authorities in its war on terrorism, although the full import of the ruling was not immediately clear." The Times notes, "U.S. officials have used the power to freeze the assets of hundreds of organizations and individuals around the world to try to choke off financing for what it views as illicit operations. … But Collins also said that many of the designations, especially those made by the Treasury Department rather than by Bush, were valid because they followed detailed procedures."

Civil Liberties Board Impressed By Bank-Data Monitoring Controls. The New York Times (11/29, Lichtblau) reports, "A civil liberties panel appointed by the White House received a classified briefing Tuesday on the Bush administration's program to monitor international banking transactions, and several members said they had come away impressed with the privacy controls in place to prevent abuses against Americans." The Times continues,

"The program, which gives American intelligence officials access to large volumes of banking data through a Brussels consortium known as Swift, has been attacked by regulators in Europe, who view it as illegal and have threatened sanctions. But the administration gave no indication at Tuesday's briefing that it was rethinking the program, defending it as a vital tool in tracking terrorist financing. … The briefing, lasting nearly two hours, was held at the Treasury Department for the five members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, created at Congress's direction in 2004 to examine privacy issues related to the war on terror. The board received a similar classified briefing last week on the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program, created by President Bush soon after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times adds, "The board's only Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, who was a senior aide to President Bill Clinton, said that before the latest briefing he had had doubts about the Swift banking program. But 'I was impressed with the lengths to which these people have gone to avoid infringing on people's civil rights,' Mr. Davis said in an interview. 'It was less of a concern than I expected.' … Democrats in Congress, however, have questioned the independence and resources of the board and its ability to inquire deeply into highly classified programs. Until last month the White House had resisted allowing the board to be briefed on the Swift and N.S.A. programs."

El-Masri Seeks Redress After Being Mistakenly Abducted By CIA. The New York Times (11/29, Lewis) reports from Richmond, VA, "A lawyer for a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured while in C.I.A. custody in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons." The Times continues, "In May, a federal trial judge threw out the suit brought by Khaled el-Masri, who said he was an innocent victim of the Central Intelligence Agency's program of transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation. Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets." The Times adds, "Benjamin Wizner, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened. … Gregory G. Katsas, a senior Justice Department lawyer, told the judges that courts must defer to the executive branch when it invokes the state secrets doctrine, which was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953."

WWBT-TV, NBC 12, Richmond, VA (11/29, Garrity) reports, "Journalists from around the world packed a Richmond courtroom today, as three federal judges considered whether a German man who says he was tortured by the CIA should have his case heard in U.S. Court. Today, attorneys representing the German man named Khaled El-Masri, argued the U.S. government made a mistake that it now does not want to admit." WWBT-TV continues, "Khaled El-Masri used an interpreter to speak to a crowd of journalists from as a far away as Russia and Germany outside Richmond's U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. 'I was humiliated, I was beaten, and I was drugged, and I was taken to Afghanistan against my will,' says El-Masri through his interpreter. … Attorney's representing El-Masri claim that back in December 2003, the CIA kidnapped him while he was on vacation in Macedonia. They say the CIA mistook El-Masri for a terrorist with a similar name. They say the CIA flew El-Masri to Afghanistan, tortured him, and held him in a prison for months. Eventually, they say El-Masri was released and left stranded on a mountain top in Albania, a country he had never been to. … But when El-Masri tried to bring a case against the CIA in U.S. District Court this May, a judge dismissed his case. So today, El-Masri's lawyers asked for an appeal."

The Washington Post (11/29, C1, Priest) reports, "Khaled al-Masri was supposed to have been disappeared by black-hooded CIA paramilitaries in the dead of night. One minute he was riding a bus in Macedonia, the next -- poof -- gone. Grabbed by Macedonian agents, handed off to junior CIA operatives in Skopje and then secretly flown to a prison in Afghanistan that didn't officially exist, to be interrogated with rough measures that weren't officially on the books. And then never to be heard from again -- one fewer terrorist in the post-9/11 world. … Instead, on Tuesday, Masri finds himself sitting in an American courtroom so elegant that even his experienced lawyers are commenting on its beautiful dark wood and graceful chandeliers. Dressed in white shirt sleeves and a modest maroon vest, Masri is waiting to see if the judges will allow the CIA to disappear him again." The Post adds, "This time, it's not the physical, flesh-and-blood, burly, ponytailed German citizen with six kids whom the U.S. government wants to make vanish from the face of the Earth. It's his legal case, his very right to have his argument heard in open court, that the CIA is seeking to have disappeared. They argue, citing the state-secrets privilege, that to proceed with the case would damage national security and that this damage outweighs any legal rights Masri may have. … The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District agreed with the government in May. … If they have their way this time, the pale Justice Department lawyers swaying back in their chairs before the three judges of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit would prohibit any judge and any jury anywhere from ever hearing the arguments in Masri's six legal pleadings and 40 exhibits, more than 1,000 pages in all. Much of the evidence was unearthed by German prosecutors and European Parliament investigators."

Democrats Hope For Bipartisan Support To Limit NSA Surveillance. Bloomberg (11/29, Rowley) reports, "Democrats, about to take control of Congress, say they will forge a bipartisan compromise to put limits on President George W. Bush's program of domestic eavesdropping of suspected terrorists." Bloomberg continues, "Democrats say they already have a starting point for a compromise, noting that bipartisan proposals this year require court warrants for eavesdropping. At the same time, party leaders will be treading carefully in an effort to assure Americans that they can protect privacy without sacrificing vigilance, and to discredit Republican charges they are weak on national security. … 'How will the Democrats proceed? I think gingerly,' said Steven Aftergood, who directs a government secrecy project for the Federation of American Scientists in Washington. 'They can no longer function as a protest group.'" Bloomberg adds, "After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without getting court warrants on communications between suspected al-Qaeda operatives in the U.S. and overseas. … While disclosure of the program triggered criticism from both parties, there is practically no chance the Republican- controlled Congress that returns to Washington next week will act on the issue, leaving it for the next Congress that convenes in January. … West Virginia Democrat Jay Rockefeller, who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in an interview Congress may be able to pass bipartisan legislation in six months."

Columnist Lauds IG Review Of NSA Surveillance Program. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (11/29), Dale McFeatters writes, "The Bush administration would deny it, but the impending Democratic takeover of Congress seems to be already affecting how it does business. … After a year of refusing to do so, the Justice Department has announced a narrow review of President Bush's secret domestic eavesdropping program. The surveillance program, which monitors international communications to and from the United States, has been controversial since it was first disclosed _ and the subject of a preliminarily successful court challenge _ because the president had decreed that the National Security Agency need not obtain warrants." McFeatters continues, "Congressional Democrats had asked the department to review the program a year ago, but plans for even a preliminary investigation were derailed when Bush blocked security clearances for Justice investigators. Now, the White House has told the department it will approve the required clearances. … The review will be headed by Justice's respected watchdog, Inspector General Glenn Fine. But the review will be confined to examining whether department lawyers met all the legal requirements in dealing with the NSA and making use of any information obtained from intercepts. Fine will not weigh in on the key issue -- whether the warrantless eavesdropping is legal and constitutional." Mcfeatters adds, "The administration has been notoriously hostile to any questioning, criticism or skepticism of its national-security initiatives, and for six years a compliant Republican-run Congress neglected its vital oversight function. … Better late than never -- that seems about to change, although it took a political earthquake to do it."

EU Report Finds Countries Abetted CIA's Extraordinary Renditions. The New York Times (11/29, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports a report from the European Parliament "bluntly rejected the assertions by several European countries that they were unaware of a C.I.A. program to secretly abduct, transport and detain terror suspects. 'Many governments cooperated passively or actively' with the Central Intelligence Agency, said Giovanni Claudio Fava, who led a special inquiry." The report "said that 11 European countries, including Britain, Italy and Germany, knew of the agency's activities" and "offered new confirmation of the United States' practice of so-called extraordinary renditions. … Mr. Fava's draft report asserted that at least 1,245 C.I.A.-operated flights flew through Europe's airspace or stopped at its airports, and listed Poland as among the countries least cooperative with its inquiry." The Washington Post (11/29, Whitlock, 690K) reports John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "called the European Parliament report 'hysterical in its hyperbole.' He said the committee was leaping to conclusions about the missions of the CIA flights and improperly assuming that they all had a 'nefarious' intent." The European Parliament "accused Poland of blocking the probe, saying that high-ranking Polish officials refused to meet with the panel. It also accused the Polish government of withholding or destroying flight logs pertaining to CIA flights at Szymany and other airports."

German Mistakenly Detained By CIA Appeals Federal Judge's Ruling. The New York Times (11/29, Lewis, 1.16M) reports ACLU lawyer Benjamin Wizner, representing Khaled el-Masri, "a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured" by the CIA "urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons." In May Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria "said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets." Wizner "told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened."

US Citizen In Texas Pleads Guilty To Conspiring To Fight For Taliban. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29, Stinebaker) reports, "A Houston man pleaded guilty after he and a Pakistani living illegally in the United States were charged with conspiring to join the Taliban and fight against U.S. forces, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." US citizen Kobie Diallo Williams and Pakistan national Adnan Babar Mirza "underwent training in guns and reconnaissance in the Houston area in preparation for joining up with the Taliban, prosecutors said." Williams surrendered Tuesday to members of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to the conspiracy charge. Mirza was already in custody on immigration violations. 'While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with the 9-11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East,' said Roderick Beverly, the head of the FBI's Houston office." ABC News' The Blotter (11/28, Ryan, 6:27 p.m.) noted, "In addition to the alleged firearms training, the men also agreed to provide financial support to the Taliban and their families, the indictment alleges. According to the indictment, Williams sent $350 to Taliban members and their family members on two occasions. 'The expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East,' said…Beverly."

KHOU-TV Houston (11/28, McShan) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Mirza was attending Houston Community College and working as an accountant at a small business." Williams "attended U of H downtown and was working part time at Rice University in its engineering department." KHOU added, "How did the government learn about them? 'It was a referral from the border patrol as far as suspicious activity that they noted,' said Rod Beverly, head of the Houston FBI office. Beverly would not get into specifics, but Senator John Cornyn was quick to point out to us that Mirza was here illegally. 'Whether you provided aid to the Taliban or simply overstayed your visa, we ought to be enforcing our immigration laws,' said Sen. Cornyn." The Houston Chronicle (11/29, A1, George, Hassan, Lezon, 530K) also notes Beverly said in a statement yesterday, "While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with Sept. 11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Tennessee White Supremacist Sentenced To 30 Years In Prison For Bomb Plot. WPTY-TV Memphis (11/28, Hartley) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Federal authorities say a white supremacist will spend the next three decades behind bars for attempting to acquire nerve gas and explosives in a plot to destroy government buildings. A judge sentenced Demetrius 'Van' Crocker to 30 years in prison and lifetime supervised release. Crocker was arrested in 2004 after he tried to buy the weapons from undercover agents," telling "agents his dream was to set off a dirty bomb in Washington, D.C. while the House and the Senate were in session." The AP (11/29) notes, "The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation and the FBI started investigating him after an informant alerted the agencies to his anti-government rants. Crocker also told an agent he wanted a helicopter license so he could spray or bomb black neighborhoods in Jackson with poison gas and spike drugs with poison to kill black people."

Air Marshals Concerned Racism Fears Could Endanger Security. The Washington Times (11/29, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Air marshals, pilots and security officials yesterday expressed concern that airline passengers and crews will be reluctant to report suspicious behavior aboard for fear of being called 'racists,' after several Muslim imams made that charge in a press conference Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport." Following an incident last week in which they were removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis, six imams "urged Congress to enact laws to prohibit ethnic and religious 'profiling.'" One federal air marshal in Las Vegas, who asked that his name not be used, said that terrorists could use public fears of being labeled a racist "to their advantage in future aviation attacks."

Fox Special Report (11/28, story 10, 0:45, Hume) noted a report in Tuesday's Washington Times that said "passengers and flight attendants said the men switched from their assigned seats to a pattern associated with the September 11 terror attacks two in the very first row two in the middle next to the exit and two in the rear. The Times quotes an unidentified federal air marshal as explaining that pattern would enable a group to control the most important areas in the cabin. The imams yesterday staged a protest at Washington's Reagan Airport and have characterized their removal as an act of Islamophobia."

WPost Says More Information Needed To Explain Imams' Removal. The Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) editorializes that US Airways "and the authorities who detained the imams have questions to answer publicly about the incident. Were they switching seats suspiciously? Did the imams have round-trip or one-way tickets? Did the men ask for seat-belt extenders, and if so did they give any reason? Answers to these questions might help explain the airline and official actions, even if they do not end up justifying those actions."

Chertoff Announces First Responder Interoperability Deadlines. Long Island Newsday (11/29, Eisenberg, 414K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told a gathering of state and local homeland security officials in Washington yesterday "that the nation's 35 highest-risk cities must have systems enabling first responders to communicate in a disaster by the end of next year. Every state must have such a system by the end of 2008, he said." The announcement came "five weeks before the start of a new Congress controlled by Democrats, many of whom have expressed frustration about the slow pace of progress on first-responder communications and pledged tougher oversight of his department. The secretary said public scorecards would be issued in the next few weeks to the highest-risk cities -- including Boston, Houston and Chicago -- to help them prioritize needed improvements. The focus, he said, would be regional because 'threats are region-based.'"

Bush Expected To Promote FEMA's Paulison. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that the "buzz" at FEMA is that Undersecretary R. David Paulison "will be nominated by President Bush for promotion to the deputy secretary level." Kamen notes that Congress "recently passed legislation raising the status of the FEMA administrator, effective March 31, mandating that he report directly to the secretary of the Homeland Security Department and advise the president and the White House Homeland Security Council during disasters."

Judge Rules In Favor Of Policyholders On Katrina Flood Claims. The New York Times (11/29, Treaster, 1.16M) reports, "A federal judge offered a glimmer of hope to the tens of thousands of people whose homes and businesses in New Orleans were flooded in Hurricane Katrina, ruling that insurance companies should pay for the widespread water damage." The ruling "could cost the insurers billions of dollars more than the $41 billion they have already paid to storm victims. But the insurers insist that their policies do not cover flooding, and they said yesterday that they expected an appeals court to reverse the decision. A final ruling could take months, if not years." Citing levee failures, the judge said the insurance policies on flood coverage "did not 'clearly exclude man-made' flood disasters."

WAR NEWS:

Leaked Hadley Memo To Bush Casts Doubt On Maliki's Ability To Stem Violence. As President Bush prepares to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Malaki in Jordan today, the Administration is trying to send the message that it remains supportive of Maliki. As NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "White House officials" told NBC "the President will send a blunt but supportive message" at the summit: "One advisor said it will boil down to this -- 'We are in this together, we'll get out of this together.'" However, the leak of a classified memo to the President written by his national security advisor appears to have undermined the White House's message. Under the headline "Bush Adviser's Memo Cites Doubts About Iraqi Leader," the New York Times (11/29, Gordon, 1.16M) reports "a classified memorandum by…Bush's national security adviser expressed serious doubts about whether…Maliki had the capacity to control the sectarian violence in Iraq and recommended that the United States take new steps to strengthen the Iraqi leader's position. The Nov. 8 memo was prepared for Mr. Bush and his top deputies by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and senior aides on the staff of the National Security Council after a trip by Mr. Hadley to Baghdad." The Times adds, "An administration official made a copy of the document available to a New York Times reporter seeking information on the administration's policy review. The Times read and transcribed the memo," and this morning makes it available to its readers in its entirety. The White House, says the Times, "has sought to avoid public criticism of Mr. Maliki." A "senior administration official discussed the memorandum in general terms after being told The New York Times was preparing an article on the subject." The official "stressed that the administration retains confidence in the Iraqi leader. 'What we are seeing is that he had the right intentions and is willing to act,' the senior official said. 'Our own review has opened a consultative process on where Maliki wants to take the government. A successful strategy has to be one that is driven by the Iraqis.'" In its front page article on Bush's meeting with Maliki, the Washington Post (11/29, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) mentions the memo "obtained by the New York Times," and says it "laid bare the doubts about Maliki," noting that the Bush-Maliki relationship "has grown fractious as repeated efforts to curb violence in Baghdad have failed."

In addition to the memo, a number of media stories suggest US officials and commentators, even the President, hold a dim view of the Iraqi leader's performance. The Washington Post (11/29, Abramowitz, 690K), in fact, reports Bush "hinted at the US government's growing impatience with Maliki" yesterday, "when he said he would query the prime minister about his 'strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself.'" ABC World News (11/28, lead story, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), meanwhile, said "US officials more and more express doubt Maliki can stop the violence. … In fact, a senior Defense official tells ABC News the Iraq government could collapse within weeks if there are more spectacular attacks like the Thanksgiving Day bombings that killed more than 200 civilians." The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Zavis, Wallsten, 850K) says Maliki feels "frustrated by US accusations that he isn't doing enough," and USA Today (11/29, Soriano, Nichols, 2.27M), in a story titled "Some Question Whether Al-Maliki Strong Enough," reports "analysts say there is growing evidence that al-Maliki is not up to the formidable task of bringing stability to his country." Wayne White, "head of the State Department's Iraq intelligence desk during the US invasion in 2003," is quoted saying Maliki "probably has neither the will nor the ability to address certain core issues, such as widespread abuses on the part of (Shiite) militias and the police. … He is beholden to the forces behind the militias for his political survival." Jeffrey White, a former Defense Intelligence Agency Middle East analyst, "said al-Maliki was chosen as prime minister by Shiite leaders 'because he was weak and pliable.'" Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (11/28, Baier) offered a more positive assessment of the Administration's attitude toward Maliki, reporting, "Senior aides say the President is urging flexibility and is eager to look Prime Minister Maliki in the eye and ask him what his government needs to better deal with the increased sectarian bloodshed."

More negative coverage on the summit: The New York Times (11/29, Burns, Semple, 1.16M) says that "at a time of heightened urgency in the Bush administration's quest for solutions, American military and political leverage in Iraq has fallen sharply. Dismal trends in the war…have merged with growing American opposition at home to lend a sense of crisis to the talks in Amman. But American fortunes here are ever more dependent on feuding Iraqis who seem, at times, almost heedless to American appeals, American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad say." The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Shishkin, 2.04M), in a story headlined "Why Iraq's Discord Stalls Political Solution," says "Bush is expected to press Iraq's leader when they meet this week to act decisively against the violence coursing through Iraqi neighborhoods. That may prove extremely difficult, because the sectarian discord has paralyzed the country's fragile political structure -- and with it much of the leverage at Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's disposal." The Journal adds, "Nowhere is this paralysis more evident than in Iraq's national assembly. The Parliament was cast by Washington as a solution to the nation's problems when it was elected a year ago. Instead, it embodies Mr. Maliki's biggest challenge because it mirrors the sectarian battles raging on the Iraqi streets."

NYTimes Says Bush Must Warn Maliki "Americans' Patience Has All But Run Out." The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mr. Bush needs to make clear that Americans' patience has all but run out and that he will start bringing the troops home unless Mr. Maliki moves to rein in sectarian bloodletting and Iraqi troops start shouldering more of the burden. Mr. Maliki needs to make Mr. Bush understand Iraq's full desperation -- and his own desperate political weakness. So long as Baghdad remains in chaos — and militias are better armed and more motivated than the Iraqi Army -- he has no chance of ending the blood feuds or breaking the cycle of retribution."

Bush Says Al Qaeda Behind Spike In Iraq Violence. The day before his summit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki, President Bush said the US will not withdraw its troops from Iraq "before the mission is complete." Bush also made the case that Al Qaeda is behind the recent spike in violence in that country. As NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, the President "said it's al Qaeda that needs to be defeated in Iraq and toward that end, he says he will not pull US troops out of that battlefield unless and until that job is done." Bush also declined to call the conflict in Iraq a "civil war." The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) reports that despite "pointed emphasis on the Iraqi government's role in controlling the violence," Bush Tuesday "made clear his view that Iraq has not yet fallen into civil war." The New York Times (11/29, A18, Stolberg, 1.16M) also says Bush "blamed Al Qaeda for the latest wave of sectarian violence" and vowed not to withdraw troops "until the mission is complete."

Bush's comments are receiving markedly negative media coverage. The CBS Evening News (11/28, lead story, 3:00, Axelrod, 7.66M), for example, said that "heading into the summit Mr Bush seems to be looking back as much as looking forward, recycling, old claims that outside terrorists are to blame for the chaos in Iraq." ABC World News (11/28, lead story, 2:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The problem is that it is virtually impossible for individual soldiers to tell the difference, for example, between a Sunni insurgent or an Al Qaeda terrorist. 'Anybody that is shooting at us,' said one commander recently, 'is an enemy.'" NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Gregory, 9.87M), which has officially termed the conflict a "civil war," reported, "Iraq's worsening civil war will dominate the President's meeting with…Maliki. Concluding his visit to Estonia earlier today, Mr. Bush blamed the violence not on civil war but on Sunni terrorists." Bush was shown saying, "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place, fomented in my opinion because of these attacks by al Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal. And we will work with the Maliki government to defeat these elements." NBC added, "Back in Washington, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi disagreed, warning that such rhetoric about al Qaeda will make it harder for Democrats to work with the White House." Pelosi was shown saying, "The 9/11 commission dismissed that notion a long time ago and I feel sad that the President is resorting to it again."

CNN characterized Bush's strategy on Iraq as a repetition of his past policies. CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer) said in its lead story, "Familiar words from a President now under intense pressure to change direction in Iraq, where more blood is being spilled every day." CNN correspondent Suzanne Malveaux: "Pressure is growing on…Bush to come up with a working strategy of his own." CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Malveaux) in its second segment described Bush is "using an old and familiar argument, blaming the fighting on Al Qaeda."

The New York Times (11/29, Stolberg, 1.16M) runs a similar story under the headline "Bush Declines To Call Situation In Iraq Civil War," while the Washington Post (11/29, Baker, 690K) titles its report "White House Wages War Of Words Over 'Civil' Term." The Post reports, "It is not, no matter how much it may look like it, a civil war. Forget the debate over what to do about the war in Iraq. The White House is still debating what to call the war in Iraq. With retired generals, analysts, politicians and pundits increasingly using the term 'civil war,' the Bush administration insists that the definition does not fit as part of its latest effort to control the words of war." The Post continues, "To people dying in the streets of Sadr City, it may be just semantics. But the White House fiercely resists the phrase out of fear of its impact in both Iraq and the United States." The Post adds the "risk" for the White House is that "once again it will appear out of touch with reality over there and with public perception here at home." The AP (11/29, Raum) also notes the President "portrayed the battles in both Afghanistan and Iraq as central fronts in a war 'against the extremists who desire safe havens and are willing to kill innocents anywhere to achieve their objectives.'" USA Today (11/29, Jackson, 2.27M), McClatchy (11/29, Douglas) run similar stories.

A couple of TV reports, meanwhile, suggested Bush overstated Al Qaeda's role in Iraq in his comments yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 3, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported on Bush's "claim today that Al Qaeda is behind this rising tide of violence in Iraq." NBC's Brian Williams prompted Pentagon correspondent Jim Miklaszewski "to take a closer look at that claim," asking "how serious is it?" NBC's Miklaszewski responded, "There's no question that al Qaeda still remain as serious threat in Iraq. But US military officials admit, it's not the primary threat by a long shot. … Two weeks ago, the top US military commander for the Middle East," General John Abizaid, "told Congress, sectarian violence, not Al Qaeda is the primary long-term threat in Iraq. … In fact, according to military intelligence, Al Qaeda makes up only 2% to 3% of enemy forces in Iraq." Miklaszewski added, "Whatever that Al Qaeda threat, some experts blame it directly on the US war in Iraq. … Al Qaeda is not the reason the US invaded Iraq in the first place but now the Bush Administration is clearly out to convince the American people, al Qaeda is why American forces should now stay." The CBS Evening News' Katie Couric (11/28, story 3, 2:00) asked Richard Haas, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, if he "buys" the President's contention that al Qaeda "is basically responsible for the sectarian violence in Iraq." Haas responded, "In a word, no. It's clearly responsible for some of it. It's clearly exacerbated some of it. But even if al Qaeda disappeared tomorrow…the sectarian violence would continue."

Bush Rejects Expected ISG Recommendation On Iran And Syria. The CBS Evening News (11/28, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Washington, the Baker-Hamilton commission continued its work hoping for a report by early next week." Bush, on the eve of his summit with Malaki in Jordan, "adamantly rejected what's expected to be a key recommendation -- engaging Iran and Syria for help calming Iraq. He says that's up to the Maliki government." Bush: "Iraq is a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy. They're having talks with their neighbors, and if that's what they think they ought to do, that's fine. I hope their talks yield results." Axelrod: "The results yielded today were not what the President wanted. Iraq's President Talabani was in Iran, listening to Iran's Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, blame the United States for all the chaos in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 2, 2;20, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Iran has made it clear that it is an alternative address to Washington where Middle East diplomacy can take place. Iraq's President Talabani was in Tehran today meeting with the country's supreme leader. He was also accompanied by his oil minister. Iran is also reaching out to American allies, especially Egypt and saying today that it sees Iranian cooperation with Arab states as the key to a solution. If Washington can't give a comprehensive solution to the many problems in the Middle East, Iran has made it clear, it is willing to try."

The New York Times (11/29, A16 Fattah, 1.16M) reports that when Bush arrives in Amman Wednesday, "there will be no shortage of people seeking to make him feel unwelcome with a decidedly blunt message." According to the Times, in Amman "and throughout the Arab…Iran was foremost on a lot of minds." For many, the Times says "a resurgent Iran, with or without a nuclear bomb, is a central concern. An opening with Iran, many analysts said, would amount to a loss of face for the Arabs and a striking boost for Iran." Despite "growing anti-Americanism," Arab governments have been "eager to maintain an American presence in the region, fearing Iran would step in where the United States retreated." The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Richter, 850K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bush firm on Iran, Syria talks."

NBC Criticized For "Civil War" Decision. The Washington Times (11/29, Harper, 88K) reports, "'Civil war' has joined 'terrorist' and 'undocumented immigrant' in the growing lexicon of terms that prompt press organizations to get touchy about their coverage. In the name of neutrality, print and broadcast journalists alike have declared moratoriums on words deemed inflammatory or judgmental in the years since the September 11 attacks." Neutrality "might not be the motivation behind NBC's decision to announce that Iraq is now engaged in a civil war, despite statements from the White House to the contrary. … 'News organizations claim they don't want to be political in their coverage. But this declaration strikes me as very political. This is NBC saying, "Hey, George Bush is delusional, and we're not going to play along." That's the tenor of it,' Tim Graham of the Media Research Center said yesterday." Graham added, "The pomposity of the judgment is also troubling. The network is clearly seeking a tipping point to declare that the US is losing Iraq."

WSJournal Says Iraq Conflict Not A Civil War." The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) editorializes, "The next Iraqi or American official to be asked about 'civil war' might want to reply by asking the journalist who, precisely, is fighting whom, and why Iraqi security officers of all backgrounds continue to risk their lives for the elected Baghdad government. The truth is that the enemies of Mr. Maliki's government are terrorists and thugs." Bush "could help give Mr. Maliki the confidence he needs for the tough fight ahead -- first against the Sunni terrorists, then against the Shiite revenge killers -- by assuring him that US policy will be based on this fact."

Carter Dismisses Comparisons Of Iraq With Sudan. Former President Jimmy Carter in an interview on MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews (11/28) was asked, "There is a report that 650,000 civilians have been killed. Do you think it has the potential of being as bad as Sudan?" Carter replied, "I don't think so. Because Sudan had two million people died. And it is obviously serious and I don't think American intervention, even if we wanted to exert the full power of our military force there could successfully interrupt the violence that is killing people still on the streets."

Carter Calls Iraq Invasion "One Of The Greatest Blunders" Ever Made By A President. Carter, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer), said invading Iraq "is going to prove, I believe, to be one of the greatest blunders that American presidents have ever made." Blitzer: "Bigger than Vietnam?: Carter: "I think it's going to be a close call, but perhaps much more vividly known by the rest of the world than Vietnam was. And, of course, my answer is predicated on not knowing what is going to happen in the future. I think president Bush could still salvage out of Iraq a conclusion that he could identify as victory. If he would agree that this international conference would help Iraq and if there could be an orderly withdrawal of American troops and Iraq could be sustained with the support of the rest of the world as a viable democracy, then he could say, in retrospect, this was a success -- and I think that's what he would like to see as an ultimate indication of a victory."

Gingrich Says White House Must Admit Change Of Course Needed. The Boston Globe (11/29, Pindell, 413K) reports that ex- House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R) "told a New Hampshire audience yesterday that unless the Bush administration admits that the war in Iraq is a 'failure,' it will never develop a strategy to leave the country successfully." Gingrich said that "the Bush administration needs to plan a 'third stage' in Iraq, following the military takeover stage and the recent democracy-building stage. But he says a third stage can come about only if officials admit they must change course. 'If the military, White House, and State Department continue to avoid the word 'failure,' how can you bring about a third stage?' Gingrich said." Gingrich "said a show of contrition by the White House would help the president regain the trust of the American people and avoid a quick pullout, which would be disastrous. The first goal in Iraq, Gingrich said, should be to rebuild the national military, even if it requires spending tantamount to the Marshall Plan effort in the aftermath of World War II, in which the United States spent up to 3 percent of its gross domestic product. 'We have to show we are serious about winning and that we will defeat any person, Sunni or Shi'ite, that hopes to disrupt progress,' he said. 'But we can only do that if we have Iraqi troops on the ground.'"

ISG To Set Deadline For Iraqis To Assume "Greater Responsibility" On Security Matters. The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 2, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported that the President "has repeatedly dismissed the idea of setting a schedule for withdrawing US troops," CBS "has learned the commission may have found a way around that by putting the onus on the Iraqis." CBS (Martin) added, "Sources close to the Iraq study group predict its final report will not call for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, which would almost certainly be rejected by the Bush Administration. Instead, these sources expect it to recommend a timetable for the Iraqi government to assume greater responsibility for its own security. Still unresolved is the question of what if any consequences there would be if the Iraqi government failed to meet the timetable. The study group is drafting its recommendations just as the Bush Administration is acknowledging the war has entered a new phase."

The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Ricks, Wright, 690K) reports, "Even Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the occupation say the people and government of Iraq are not doing enough to rebuild their society." The White House "is putting pressure on the government of…Maliki, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have debated how much to blame Iraqis for not performing civic duties." This "marks a shift in tone from earlier debate about the responsibility of the United States to restore order after the 2003 invasion, and it seemed to gain currency in October, when sectarian violence surged. Some see the talk of blame as the beginning of the end of US involvement."

Panel Unable To Reach Consensus On US Troop Levels. The AP (11/29, Baldor) reports the Iraq Study Group "could not reach a consensus Tuesday on how many or how long U.S. troops should remain in Iraq, forcing the group to return for a third day of debate, according to an official close to the panel's negotiations." Panel member Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff to President Clinton, "hinted at some struggles, telling reporters, 'Trying, trying to find a ... trying to find consensus. ... It goes up and down.'" A second official "has said that the commission was unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but that some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal. … The first official said Tuesday that the group was still struggling over whether to set a hard deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces or if there should be any short-term increase in troops." The AP notes the group "was initially expected to wrap up their deliberations Tuesday."

Carter Expects Bush To Adopt Most Commission Recommendations. Former President Jimmy Carter, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer), said Bush "has his own recommendations to be derived from people in his Administration. But I think it would be natural for President Bush to adopt as many of the policies that Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton recommend in their committee as he possibly can. If there is some things he disagrees in order to save face and show his independence he is still the Commander in Chief, then he'll do it. But I think the recommendations of the committee will be seriously considered by the White House."

Bush's Faith Seen As Driving His Foreign Policy. CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer) reported, "Good, evil and God-given duties. Both supporters and critics of President Bush believe they're the notions that drive the man and help shape this foreign policy. But they've also helped to put the United States, critics say, on a potential collision course with the Muslim world." CNN correspondent Zain Verjee: "When it comes to foreign policy, the President says he answers to a higher power. … Some experts say that the President's faith helps make him a decisive leader. Once he determines it's God's will to act, it's hard to sway him. They also say that could leave him less flexible and less likely to change course."

Bush Urged To Heed Saudi Officials' Advice On Iraq. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K), Nawaf Obaid, an advisor to the Saudi government, writes, "In February 2003, a month before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, warned President Bush that he would be 'solving one problem and creating five more' if he removed Saddam Hussein by force. Had Bush heeded his advice, Iraq would not now be on the brink of full-blown civil war and disintegration. One hopes he won't make the same mistake again by ignoring the counsel of Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, who said in a speech last month that 'since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited.' If it does, one of the first consequences will be massive Saudi intervention to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

More Commentary. The New York Times' Tom Friedman (11/29) writes, "We need to face our real choices in Iraq, which are: 10 months or 10 years. Either we just get out of Iraq in a phased withdrawal over 10 months, and try to stabilize it some other way, or we accept the fact that the only way it will not be a failed state is if we start over and rebuild it from the ground up, which would take 10 years. This would require reinvading Iraq, with at least 150,000 more troops, crushing the Sunni and Shiite militias, controlling borders, and building Iraq's institutions and political culture from scratch. Anyone who tells you that we can just train a few more Iraqi troops and police officers and then slip out in two or three years is either lying or a fool. The minute we would leave, Iraq would collapse."

In his column for the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K) Harold Meyerson writes that "on matters Iraqi, much of the Beltway -- and not just the administration -- remains impervious to fact. 'We've got to get the Iraqi army and police better equipped, better trained and into the fight,' retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey declared recently. 'And I think we've got 24 months.' The police, of course, are already into the fight, many of them working with Shiite militias to execute Sunnis. They are, from any dispassionate perspective, proficient enough. Train them for 24 months and they will be the terror of the Earth."

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M), author Amir Taheri writes, "While Mr. Bush should demonstrate that America remains committed to the new Iraq, he should only prepare to renew the US mission for one more year, dependent on a credible plan for transferring responsibility for security to the Maliki government. In that year, the US ought to intensify its training programs and examine options for expanding the weapons system of the new Iraqi army." The US should not "write blank checks."

Gates Criticizes Prewar Iraq Planning. The New York Times (11/29, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "In his first detailed public statement since his nomination as defense secretary, Robert M. Gates criticized the Pentagon as failing to prepare adequately for securing Iraq after the invasion in 2003. Asked in a questionnaire from the Senate Armed Services Committee what he would have done differently in Iraq…Gates responded: 'War planning should be done with the understanding that postmajor-combat phase of operations can be crucial. If confirmed, I intend to improve the department's capabilities in this area.'" The Times notes that by "criticizing the Iraq planning, however obliquely," Gates "offered a glimpse of how he might distance himself from" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. The Times adds that when asked whether the US "should engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq," Gates "shied from endorsing bilateral overtures to either country. 'Engagement with Iran might well come as part of an international conference,' he said. Talks with Damascus could 'take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference,' he added. But he also said, 'No option should be taken off the table,' noting that 'even in the worst days of the cold war, the United States maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China.'" According to the Times, Gates' reply "backed slightly from a study of which he was a co-author for the Council on Foreign Relations. The examination called for the United States to 'engage selectively' with Iran, in part to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons." In contrast to the Times, the Washington Post (11/29, A5, Ricks, 690K) describes Gates' position on engagement of Iran and Syria as "consistent with his past views," and characterizes them as appearing to be "at odds with the Bush administration's current policies." According to the Post, Gates' "position conflicts with the U.S. stance on Syria particularly."

Gates Argues Against Precipitous Withdrawal. The Washington Post (11/29, A5, Ricks, 690K) reports Gates "said he opposes a swift pullout from Iraq, arguing in written testimony submitted yesterday to Congress that 'leaving Iraq in chaos would have dangerous consequences both in the region and globally for many years to come.'"

Pentagon Reportedly Considering Abandoning Anbar Province. ABC World News (11/28, story 2, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The center for al Qaeda in Iraq is in that country's al Anbar province. More than 1,000 US troops have been killed there, more than 1 out of 3 American fatalities. And among military commanders, there's a sense that defeating the enemy there may be impossible or would come with a cost too great to bear." ABC added that it "has learned that the Pentagon is considering essentially writing off al Anbar province." US troops "will be taken out of al Anbar and move to fight what might be an even more difficult battle. The battle for Baghdad. … Under the plan now being considered by Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace, US forces would turn al Anbar over to Iraq forces." ABC noted, "Some officials oppose the move, arguing al Qaeda could turn it into a power base."

Dowd Notes Speculation On "Writing Off" Anbar. In her column for the New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) Maureen Dowd writes President Bush "vowed yesterday that 'I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete.' But his words about Iraq long ago lost their meaning. Especially the words 'mission' and 'complete.' At least in Anbar, the Pentagon may be about to pull troops off the battlefield. In another article yesterday, The Post, reporting on a classified Marine Corps intelligence report, said that 'the U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter Al Qaeda's rising popularity there.' … ABC Nightly News went even further last night, reporting that the Pentagon is 'writing off' Anbar."

Shiite, Sunni Militias Reportedly Preparing For Major Offensives. The Washington Times (11/29, Behn, 88K) reports, "Rival Shi'ite and Sunni groups are massing their militias in expectation of major confrontations. … Iraqis on both sides of their nation's sectarian divide report worrisome signs that the conflict will soon evolve into pitched battles between large armed groups.

One secular Shi'ite speaking on the telephone from Baghdad said Shi'ite militias were massing in preparation for a large offensive against Sunnis in the capital. 'They had a big militarylike ceremony today for the Mahdi militia, to show their force. They are making themselves ready for something big -- protests, fighting, killing,' said the Shi'ite. A secular Sunni in close contact with one insurgent faction, said rebel Sunnis were also trying to form alliances among militias for a big push in the city against the Shi'ites, including more raids on government buildings." The Times adds that the "emergence of pitched battles between massed groups of Sunnis and Shi'ites would largely settle a long-running argument in Washington over whether the conflict in Iraq should be described as a civil war -- a description the Bush administration has so far rejected."

US Spokesman Predicts Sadr City Attack Will Spur Increased Violence. The Washington Post (11/29, A17, Trejos, 690K) reports Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell "told reporters Tuesday that he expects to see 'elevated levels of violence' as a result of the car bombings that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite district in northeast Baghdad. The coordinated attacks set off a wave of retaliatory killings in Sunni neighborhoods. While acknowledging the sectarian conflict, Caldwell stopped short of characterizing it as a civil war." The Post goes on to report, "In the past 24 hours, 40 bodies were found in Baghdad, showing signs of torture and gunshot wounds to their heads. Among them were three beheaded bodies and two female bodies, said Col. Kareem Abdul Aziz Hussein of the Interior Ministry. Meanwhile, two car bombs exploded behind Yarmouk Hospital in west Baghdad, killing five people and wounding 11, Hussein said."

Sadr Profiled. The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 4, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) profiles Moqtada al-Sadr, describing him as "a politician and a warrior, commander of a militia called the Mahdi Army. Intelligence estimates say it's grown eight-fold in the past year alone to some 60,000 men. Al-Sadr is the thirty something heir to a religious dynasty. … He flaunts his ferociously anti-American message which boils down to 'get your troops out.'"

Mahdi Army's Burning Of Six Sunni Worshippers Described. The AP (11/29, Hurst) reports, "The attack on the small Mustafa Sunni mosque began as worshippers were finishing Friday midday prayers. About 50 unarmed men, many in black uniforms and some wearing ski masks, walked through the district chanting 'We are the Mahdi Army, shield of the Shiites.' Fifteen minutes later," four vehicles "drove up to the marchers…suspected Shiite militiamen took automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers from the vehicles. They then blasted open the front of the mosque, dragged six worshippers outside, doused them with kerosene and set them on fire."

Responding To Maliki Request, UN Security Council Extends Mandate. The AP (11/29, Lederer) reports the U.N. Security Council "voted unanimously Tuesday to extend the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq for one year. ... The council responded to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout the country but that it needs more time." The resolution drafted by the United States "extends the mandate of the multinational force for one year starting on Dec. 31 and authorizes a review of the mandate at the request of the Iraqi government or by June 15. The resolution contains the same provision as past resolutions — a commitment that the council 'will terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq.'"

Annan Endorses Regional Conference On Iraq Including Iran And Syria. The Washington Post (11/29, A17, Wright, Lynch, 690K) reports U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan "proposed an international conference…to forge reconciliation among Iraq's political parties." Annan "said that Iran and Syria should be included in efforts to stabilize Iraq. 'The two countries have a role to play, and they should become part of the solution,' he told reporters, reflecting strong international momentum behind a broader approach to Iraq's strife. 'And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue and let them assume some of the responsibility.'"

US Soldiers Kill Five Iraqi Girls During Ramadi Firefight. The AP (11/29, Wagner) reports U.S. soldiers "fought with suspected insurgents using a building as a safe house in Ramadi…killing one Iraqi man and five females, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the U.S. military said. … The battle in Ramadi began when a US patrol discovered a roadside bomb in the Hamaniyah section of the city, and two suspected insurgents fled to a house, where they took up positions on the roof, the military said. As coalition forces removed the bomb, the militants fired on the soldiers, who fought back with machine guns and tanks, the statement said." The New York Times (11/29, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "It was unclear what happened to the suspected insurgents, but the military said 'it was reported' that one was injured in the fight and carried away by other insurgents."

US Pilot Unaccounted For After F-16 Crash Near Fallujah. The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 5, 0:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "US forces are still searching for the pilot of an F-16 that crashed yesterday near Fallujah. The wreckage was immediately surrounded by insurgents and by the time American rescuers got there, the pilot was missing. Videotape shot by a local journalist appeared to show a body near the plane, but the US military can't confirm whether the pilot is alive or dead."

Bush Urges NATO To Commit To Afghanistan Mission. The AP (11/29, Kole) reports, "NATO was divided at its summit Tuesday on deploying more troops to Afghanistan's volatile south, with Germany resisting any permanently expanded presence and Canada complaining of bearing the brunt of an increasingly bloody mission. Despite the strengthening Taliban insurgency and unexpectedly high casualties, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said that by 2008, he hopes Afghan forces can begin taking over security tasks." President Bush "called the Afghanistan mission -- which has mobilized 32,800 troops -- NATO's No. 1 operation. Defeating Taliban forces, he said, 'will require the full commitment of our alliance.'" Added Bush, "The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs."

The Financial Times (11/29, Dombey, Fidler) reports France, Germany and Spain "all said this week they could relax restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan to enable them to help in the turbulent south in case of emergencies. On Tuesday James Jones, Nato's military chief, said that 10 to 15 per cent of restrictions were being lifted, a step equivalent to providing 2,000 soldiers." The Washington Times (11/29, A1, Dinan, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "NATO To Bear Afghan Burden," while the Los Angeles Times (11/29, Wallsten, 850K) says "Bush has long called the defeat of the Taliban a triumph of freedom over tyranny. But on Tuesday he tacitly acknowledged that not all is well in Afghanistan, four years after the US-led invasion, and he exhorted allies to step up their cooperation or risk failure there."

More Commentary On NATO. The Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) editorializes, "The NATO alliance has been confounding prophets of its demise ever since the Cold War ended 15 years ago. For much of that time the military pact has played an unlikely but invaluable role as mentor to the formerly communist nations of Europe, granting 10 of them membership after requiring them to build democratic institutions. For the past several years it has played an increasingly important role in Afghanistan: Since the summer, NATO has led the fight against the Taliban in the unstable south, routing a large concentration of insurgents near Kandahar in the biggest battle in its history." Bush "spelled out a U.S. aim to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO by 2008 and to work toward membership for Georgia -- a democracy that Russia is doing its best to destabilize." Scheffer "rightly pointed to the need for the alliance to step up development and reconstruction operations in Afghanistan, so that areas cleared of the Taliban will have a shot at stabilizing. If NATO's leaders can follow through on those commitments and objectives, the alliance could defy the prophets of its doom once more."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, 850K) editorializes, "The primary issue that NATO leaders hoped to address Tuesday is a shortage of troops in southern Afghanistan, where unexpectedly heavy resistance from the Taliban is endangering the alliance's most important mission. Among those not pulling their weight is France. Like Germany, Italy and Spain, France has placed caveats on the use of its 1,900 soldiers, preventing them from being shifted nimbly to the areas where they're most needed. The French also have refused to deploy a NATO strategic reserve battalion to address calls for 2,500 more combat troops." NATO's mission in Afghanistan, "unlike the war in Iraq, is a multilateral effort against a foe that presents a well-known threat to the West. A failure there would not only create a terrorist haven, it would expose NATO as a feeble, divided force."

Women In Parliament Seen As Evidence Of Afghanistan's Slow Liberalization. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Rubin, 850K) reports Zahera Sharif "is the only woman among the four members of Afghanistan's parliament from Khowst province. In a conservative area where it is possible to drive through towns without seeing a single woman on the street, she is a rarity. As a member of parliament, she represents an institution that Western observers and experts in Afghanistan say is the country's best shot at building a stable democracy after years of war and religious extremism." The Times adds, "Even among the 68 women in parliament, U.S. and United Nations officials estimate that half have militia ties, and can be counted on to keep quiet and vote as they are told."

DOJ:

Gonzales Among Those To Attend Calderon Inauguration. McClatchy Newspapers (11/29, Root) reports, "Fistfights and shoving matches broke out in the Mexican Congress Tuesday after leftist lawmakers, hoping to block the inauguration of conservative President-elect Felipe Calderon, stormed the podium and tried to seize control of the chamber. … Conservatives, surrounded by security guards, pushed back the protesting lawmakers and vowed to keep order until they formally bestow the presidential sash on Calderon in a ceremony in the Chamber of Deputies this Friday." McClatchy adds, "Calderon has promised to reach out to those who didn't support him. But his critics on the left say his Cabinet picks suggest otherwise. On Tuesday he announced that former Jalisco Gov. Francisco Ramirez Acuna, criticized for his hard-line approach in dealing with street protests, would be his new interior secretary, handling domestic security matters." McClatchy adds, "The U.S. Embassy said that former President George Bush, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez would travel to Mexico to attend the inauguration. … What they'll find when they get here is anybody's guess. Tuesday's trouble started around lunchtime, as rumors swept the chamber that PRD supporters would try to seize the chamber. PAN leaders, who have the largest bloc of votes and control the gavel, began assembling near the dais, along with a coterie of guards."

Bloomberg (11/29, Harrington) reports, "Former U.S. President George H.W. Bush will attend the swearing-in ceremony, the U.S. Embassy in Mexico said in an e- mail statement. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez will also attend, according to the statement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Business Interests Seek To Roll Back Regulation. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Johnson, 690K) reports business interests, "seizing on concerns that a law passed in the wake of the Enron scandal has overreached, are advancing a broad agenda to limit government oversight of private industry, including making it tougher for investors to sue companies and auditors for fraud." A group "that has drawn support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. plans to issue a report tomorrow that argues that the United States may be losing its preeminent position in global capital markets to foreign stock exchanges because of costly regulations and nettlesome private lawsuits." And interest groups "are trying to build political support to review long-standing rules that govern companies, as well as parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which imposed stringent responsibilities on accountants, boards of directors and corporate executives. Some key members of Congress have recently expressed concern that U.S. companies may be over-regulated."

Paulson's Call For Principle-Based Regulation Examined. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/29), Alan Murray notes Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's call for "moving from a regulatory regime based on 'rules' to one based on 'principles.'" In a speech, Paulson "complained of 'an ever-expanding rule book in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule.' He extolled 'the desirability, where practical, of moving toward a principles-based system.'" The "model for a principles-based regulatory approach, it turns out, is Britain's Financial Services Authority." Could "such a system work in the U.S.? Well, first, it would require a restaffing of the SEC: More economists, fewer lawyers. (The current count is 1,344 attorneys, 27 economists.) More importantly, it would require reining in the trial bar, which empowers corporate lawyers by creating the constant threat of lawsuits. It also would probably require curbs on state attorneys general like soon-to-be New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who was always happy to step in whenever he thought the SEC was going soft."

US May Challenge Ruling On Former Westar CEO. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (11/29, Boczkiewicz) reports from Denver, "Prosecutors may ask an appeals court to reconsider last week's decision that set aside a five-year prison sentence for David Wittig, former chief executive of Westar Energy, for bank crimes." The Capital-Journal continues, "In a new filing at the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a federal prosecutor in Topeka said attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., are evaluating whether to ask the court to rehear Wittig's appeal. … A three-judge panel of the court dealt a blow to prosecutors on Nov. 22 by setting aside Wittig's sentence and instructing U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson, of Topeka, to resentence him." The Capital-Journal adds, "The appellate judges concluded that she erred in computing his sentence under sentencing guidelines. … They pointed out that a sentence of six months is the maximum recommended in the guidelines unless she justifies a longer sentence. … Wittig's sentence is for convictions in 2003 of hiding from bank regulators a $1.5 million loan he made to former Capital City Bank president Clinton Odell 'Del' Weidner II. Wittig is serving a separate 18-year sentence for convictions in 2005 of looting Westar of millions of dollars." The Capital-Journal n otes, "In the new filing, prosecutor Richard Hathaway said prosecutors are considering asking all of the appeals court judges to consider the case, instead of only the three judges who issued last week's decision. .. .The Denver-based court seldom agrees to rehear cases, especially those in which a three-judge panel was unanimous, as it was in last week's decision. … Hathaway said Dec. 6 is the deadline for prosecutors to ask the judges to rehear Wittig's appeal. The prosecutor said lawyers of the solicitor general's staff in Washington need more time to decide whether to make the request."

Suit Claims US Firm Bribed Chinese Banking Officials. The New York Times (11/29, Barboza) reports, "The American company says it was a legitimate cost of doing business in China, the price it had to pay to help secure a large software contract with one of China's biggest banks. … But a Chinese company that says it got pushed out of the deal has a different version: executives there say it was bribery, a case of an American company secretly funneling money to powerful Chinese government officials to ensure the lucrative banking contract." The Times continues, "According to a lawsuit filed earlier this year in United States District Court in Florida, Fidelity Information Services, an American software company, paid for two Chinese banking officials and family members to travel on vacation to Hong Kong, Paris, Rome, Las Vegas and the golfing resort of Pebble Beach, Calif. … The suit contends that Fidelity arranged for these trips through a consultant in China who was reimbursed for giving the Chinese bankers and their families an array of gifts, including expensive Sony cameras, luxury outfits from Versace and Burberry, and perhaps even a $330,000 apartment here in Shanghai." The Times adds, "The lawsuit grows out of a business dispute between Grace and Digital Information Technology, a Beijing-based consulting company and Fidelity, based in Jacksonville, Fla. It accuses Fidelity of trying to avoid paying $58 million in consulting fees after Grace helped the company win a series of software contracts worth $176 million with the China Construction Bank in 2001. … The lawsuit charges that after the contract was suspended in 2002, Fidelity dumped Grace and chose instead to hire another middleman, who was a close friend of the chairman of the huge Chinese bank. Fidelity, the lawsuit contends, made large cash payments to the middleman, who then passed money and gifts on to the Chinese bank's chairman and other bank officials, possibly in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977. … That law forbids American companies from paying off foreign government officials to win or influence business deals outside the United States. … Lawyers representing Fidelity, a division of Fidelity National Financial, strongly dispute the allegations, saying company executives simply reimbursed legitimate business expenses and that Fidelity never violated its contracts or the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … 'The Justice Department says paying for typical business expenses is not against the law,' said David W. Shapiro, a lawyer for Boies & Schiller, which is defending Fidelity in the case. 'If the golf game is inappropriate, most of the companies doing business in this country are engaged in inappropriate activity.' … In government filings earlier this year, Fidelity acknowledged that the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were looking into the allegations."

Philadelphia Mayor's Brother Indicted On Corruption Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29, Dale) reports, "The older brother of Mayor John F. Street was indicted Tuesday, accused of using his last name to convince companies he could get them lucrative city contracts and failing to pay taxes on $2 million of income. Soon after Street took office in 2000, T. Milton Street Sr. began hiring himself out as a high-priced consultant to companies that thought he could help them get city contracts, the indictment charged. One firm paid Milton Street, who is a longtime hot dog vendor, a $30,000-a-month consulting fee and required him to do no work, authorities said. He and two other businessmen face charges of mail and wire fraud, filing false tax returns and related counts." The AP notes, "The wide-ranging probe, which ensnared the former city treasurer and several businessmen, became public three years ago when an FBI listening device was discovered in the mayor's office."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/29, Gelbart, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said Street made 'millions on nothing more than his last name," but "in an interview in front of his Moorestown home, Milton Street said he was 'not going to lose any sleep' over the charges, which could mean two or more years in prison if he is convicted. 'Let's face it: They didn't get John, they have to go after somebody,' Milton Street said." The Inquirer notes, "The mayor…rejected Meehan's suggestion that Milton Street tried to profit from their relationship. … The Milton Street case was handled by some of the same FBI and IRS agents who worked on the City Hall corruption cases that have led to more than 20 convictions." The Philadelphia Daily News (11/29, Davies, 106K) adds, "Milton remained upbeat yesterday when he greeted reporters in front of his…home, predicting success in his coming legal battle and saying he wasn't feeling old. 'I think I'll run for office,' he said."

Philadelphia Inquirer Says Charges "Yet Another" Taint On Street's Tenure. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/29, 385K) editorializes, "The indictment yesterday of Mayor Street's brother on tax-evasion charges seems an almost inevitable result of the crony-friendly city contracts that have defined the mayor's tenure. The charges against T. Milton Street Sr. arise from city contracts at Philadelphia International Airport, long a source of pay-to-play rewards for people with friends (or relatives) in City Hall." The Inquirer notes, "Mayor Street isn't responsible for making sure his brother pays taxes. But the final year of the mayor's tenure will be tainted by yet another criminal prosecution involving people close to him. It is no accidental legacy."

Maryland Executive Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Corruption Probe. The Washington Post (11/29, B5, Rich) reports, "A construction executive at the center of Maryland's largest public corruption investigation in years pleaded guilty yesterday to racketeering and other offenses, agreeing to testify against his codefendant, former state senator Thomas L. Bromwell." The Post continues, "As part of his plea agreement, W. David Stoffregen certified as accurate a document that outlines secret payments to Bromwell and free or steeply discounted contracting work at the lawmaker's home in exchange for Bromwell's steering of state contracts to Stoffregen's firm, commercial contractor Poole and Kent Corp." The Post adds, "The guilty plea is by far the most significant of the six such pleas that federal prosecutors have netted in their investigation of Bromwell, a Baltimore County Democrat who was one of the most powerful figures in Annapolis before he left office in 2002. … Allegations of the improper exchange of cash and favors between the two men are at the heart of the prosecution's case, and with his plea, Stoffregen immediately becomes the star witness in a trial scheduled to begin in March. … The summary, filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, largely mirrors assertions made in the original racketeering indictment and in related cases involving other defendants." The Post notes, "Bromwell and his wife, Mary Pat, who was also charged in the racketeering indictment, have pleaded not guilty. … According to the summary, Stoffregen paid more than $190,000 to Bromwell, arranged the contracting work at his house and gave the lawmaker an ownership stake in International Partners Construction, a company that Stoffregen formed in 2000 to do business in Russia. … In exchange, it says, Bromwell saw to it that Poole and Kent was awarded a $13 million contract with the University of Maryland Medical System and arranged for expedited payments for work that the company performed on a state juvenile justice center project."

Former Treasurer To California Town Sentenced For Plundering Public Coffers. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Becerra) reports, "Former South Gate Treasurer Albert Robles was sentenced today to 10 years in federal prison for plundering $12 million over five years from the small working-class city." The Times continues, "A federal judge handed down the sentence after Robles made an impassioned speech, admitting he acted 'immorally' during his year as a leader of South Gate but claiming he never broke the law. … 'There are different levels of hoodwinking, but I didn't think hoodwinking was a crime,' Robles said. 'During that period, I decided not to be a very good man every day. But I did not decide to be a criminal.'" The Times adds, "Federal Judge Stephen V. Wilson seemed incredulous at Robles' statements, at one point telling the defendant's attorney that 'what you have just said is among the most absurd things I have ever heard.' … Wilson ultimately said he found Robles to be a 'puppet master' who won control of a corrupt enterprise that preyed on the city and its residents. … In addition to prison time, Robles was ordered to pay back more than $600,000 to the struggling city." The Times notes, "A federal grand jury in 2004 indicted Robles on 39 counts of money laundering, bribery, wire fraud and public corruption, alleging that he used his elected office and political influence to funnel money from a variety of city projects to family and friends between 1998 and 2003. He was convicted last year. .. Federal officials estimated that Robles, 41, personally received $1.2 million from the various schemes. The charges come a year after voters in the predominantly Latino city about seven miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles recalled Robles and several political allies from office."

Former Tennessee Senator Reports To Prison. The AP (11/29, Baird) reports, "Former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first state lawmaker to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal, reported to a federal prison Tuesday to begin a five-year sentence. Dixon, 57, is to serve the sentence, which has no provision for parole, at the Federal Correction Complex at Oakdale about 35 miles south of Alexandria, La." The AP notes, "Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, was convicted in June of taking bribes from FBI agents posing as employees of E-Cycle Management," and "in all, the investigation has led to indictments against 11 defendants. … Dixon has vowed to appeal his conviction and has continued to argue that he was set up to take FBI money by overzealous federal agents and lying government informants."

US Charges Alabama, Florida Men With Child Pornography. The AP (11/29) reports, "A federal grand jury in Birmingham has charged two Florida men and one Alabama man on multiple charges related to an interstate child pornography business disguised as a child modeling agency." The AP continues, "An 80-count indictment was unsealed Tuesday charging 42-year-old Marc Evan Greenberg, 39-year-old Jeffrey Robert Libman and Webe Web Corporation, all of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla." The AP adds, "A two-count criminal information charging 43-year-old Jeff Pierson of Brookwood with conspiring to transport child pornography in interstate commerce using a computer was also unsealed Tuesday. … 'The indictment alleges that these defendants conspired to produce pornographic images of underage girls posing in lascivious positions for profit, under the pretense of offering professional modeling services,' said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Justice Department's Criminal Division." The AP notes, "Greenberg and Libman are charged with establishing a 'child modeling' internet business called Webe Web Corporation. The indictment says Pierson was a photographer who provided images of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct in Alabama and sent those images to Greenberg and Libman in Florida. … A statement from the Justice Department says that, from December 2002 through April 2005, Greenberg, Libman and Webe Web conspired with Pierson to 'use minors to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing visual depictions of that conduct.'"

Grand Jury Issues New Indictment In Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "Federal prosecutors have secured a new grand jury indictment against a former SBC employee who was acquitted in September of lying about her contacts with a co-worker indicted in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case. In the three-count indictment disclosed Tuesday, Joann Wiggan was charged again with perjury for allegedly telling a federal grand jury in October 2005 that she had never retrieved any voicemail messages at work from co-worker Ray Turner, who is accused of illegally accessing telephone company records for Pellicano, a Hollywood private investigator, and assisting him in his alleged wiretapping." The Times adds, "In the new indictment, the grand jury also charged Wiggan with lying to the FBI in October 2004 in saying she had not spoken to Turner in five or six years. The indictment says Wiggan and Turner, also a former SBC employee, had called each other at least 35 times between July 2001 and February 2003." Bloomberg (11/29) also reports on the new indictment.

FBI Says Jordanian Man Scammed Chicago Immigrants. The Chicago Tribune (11/29, Ahmed, 617K) reports, "A southwest suburban man allegedly preyed on immigrants by posing as a government or law enforcement official who could help them with legal problems in exchange for fees, the FBI disclosed." Omar Abbas "was charged with a felony count of extortion after he was arrested in Chicago by FBI and Department of Homeland Security special agents on Oct. 19, authorities said. Abbas, a Jordanian citizen who was working to obtain permanent U.S. residency, is accused of taking more than $25,000 from three different people since 2003." The Tribune notes, "The FBI believes there may have been additional victims and urged anyone with information to come forward. 'I would encourage anyone, regardless of their immigration status, who might have been victimized by Abbas to contact our office immediately,' said Robert D. Grant, the special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI." The Chicago Sun-Times (11/29, Korecki) also reports, "Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said. 'We want them to know they can come to us to complain,' Simon said. 'We will work with them every step of the way to make sure they're not punished for coming forward.'"

Senior ROC Official Says FBI Unresponsive To Pleas For Help With Cyber Crime. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29) reports, "A senior Taiwanese law enforcement official said Tuesday he could not get American authorities to help the island fight cyber crime -- even in cases that directly affected the United States. Lee Hsiang-chen, director of the High-tech Criminal Center of the National Police Agency, said Taiwanese requests for help from the FBI representative at the American Embassy in Tokyo routinely went unanswered. Lee made his remarks from Taipei during a video conference with Raul Roldan, acting deputy assistant director of the FBI's cyber crime division. Roldan was taking part in the conference from Hong Kong. 'We have no FBI agents in Taiwan, so when we have cyber crimes involving the U.S., we go through the American Embassy in Tokyo,' Lee said. 'But very few (of our inquiries) come back. It makes us feel very depressed.' Roldan promised he would look into the problem."

Former NASA Director Disputes Corruption Allegations Against IG. The Orlando Sentinel (11/29, Cabbage, 230K) reports, "Two former NASA officials cast doubt this week on a pair of allegations outlined in a federal probe of space agency Inspector General Robert Cobb. … In a Nov. 17 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Cobb described the report as 'replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies.' One of the allegations investigated in the report states that Cobb did former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe's 'bidding' by terminating a contract with…PricewaterhouseCoopers for the agency's annual chief financial audit," but "in an interview, O'Keefe said that the chronology in the report omitted several important details and ignored the timing of events that would have shown they had no connection." Additionally, former NASA general counsel Paul Pastorek said in an email to the Sentinel that "neither Cobb nor his office 'canceled the contract at any time.'"

Connecticut Woman Pleads Guilty To Extortion Charge. The AP (11/29) reports Pamela Boccanfuso of Fairfield "pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge that she threatened to kill a man's son if he did not pay her $197,000, federal authorities said. … She faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when she is sentenced on March 20." The AP notes, "In the letter, Boccanfuso accused the victim's son of supplying drugs to Boccanfuso's son, nearly killing him and causing significant financial hardship due to medical and rehabilitation costs associated with his drug addiction. About a week later, the victim received a second letter that directed him to place an advertisement in the Connecticut Post on Feb. 22 with a contact number. The FBI subsequently placed an advertisement in the newspaper that day listing a cellular telephone number as directed," eventually leading to Boccanfuso's arrest.

Atlanta Builder Pleads Guilty To Mortgage Fraud Charges. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (11/28, 3:47 p.m.) reported, "A metro Atlanta homebuilder and seller has pleaded guilty to selling incomplete or non-existent houses in Forsyth County, Ga., and arranging more than $5 million in fraudulent mortgage loans for the houses." Jeffery Alan Teague "pleaded guilty late Nov. 27 in federal district court to two counts of wire fraud for a scheme to defraud mortgage lenders by arranging loans to buy incomplete homes in the names of California, New York, and Florida 'investors.' Teague provided the lenders with false Certificates of Occupancy, stating the houses securing the loans were 'completed to code' and 'suitable for occupancy.' Teague was arrested by the FBI on Aug. 3 in connection with the execution of a series of search warrants on his offices and the incomplete Forsyth County houses."

Brief Questions California Execution Practices. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Weinstein) reports, "California's procedures for executing prisoners by lethal injection fall short of standards set by the veterinary profession for animal euthanasia and were formulated with less care than methods in China, the world leader in capital punishment, according to a brief filed Tuesday in San Jose federal court by attorneys for a death row inmate." The Times continues, "In addition, the brief asserts that the execution team at San Quentin State Prison is 'unlicensed, untrained, unprofessional and incompetent' to carry out their duties." The Times adds, "The brief was lodged as U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel prepares to rule on perhaps the most fiercely fought of a number of legal challenges in several states to lethal injection, the dominant U.S. method of execution. Fogel is expected to rule by the end of the year in the case of Michael Morales, who argues California's lethal injection methods create an unnecessary risk of excessive pain and as a consequence violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. … The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation 'conducts its executions in an out-dated, cramped gas chamber with an undersized and dark anteroom,' from which prison staff are supposed to assure proper administration of a three-drug protocol, the brief says. .. .The brief also emphasizes that the state uses chemicals 'mixed by untrained and unsupervised prison staff, while ensuring that there is no meaningful oversight or review.' … Earlier this month, the California Attorney General's office issued a ringing defense of the state's procedures, maintaining in its brief that 'there is no evidence that any prior execution resulted in the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.' … But the 274-page brief filed by Morales' attorneys finds fault with virtually every aspect of California's administration of capital punishment, frequently citing admissions made by state personnel during the proceedings."

Judge Delays North Carolina Execution Pending Mental Tests. The AP (11/29) reports from Albemarle, NC, "A judge ordered an execution delayed for 60 days Monday so psychiatrists can evaluate a man who wore a Superman T-shirt while representing himself at trial and pleaded with jurors to sentence him to death." The AP continues, "Guy Tobias LeGrande, 47, had been set to die Friday for the 1993 murder of Ellen Munford, whose estranged husband offered to pay him $6,500 from a $50,000 life insurance policy. … The stay of execution granted Monday by Stanly Superior Judge William R. Bell includes 45 days for psychiatrists to submit their observations and evaluations to the court." The AP adds, "Death penalty opponents argue that LeGrande is one of the nation's most extreme examples of a mentally ill person who never should have been allowed to represent himself. Prosecutors suggest his courtroom antics were parts of an elaborate act. … Defense attorney James Coleman, a Duke University law professor, says a psychiatrist who recently examined LeGrande's records concluded that he is psychotic. The defense said LeGrande believes that the governor has already pardoned him and that he will receive billions of dollars from the state once freed. … A defense attorney who represents LeGrande without his permission said he doesn't know whether LeGrande will cooperate with the doctors."

NYTimes Blasts High Court's Refusal To Stop Review Of Reporters' Records. The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "A journalist's ability to protect the identity of confidential sources has been further eroded by the Supreme Court's refusal this week to stop a prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two New York Times reporters. This is the latest legal blow to the diminishing right of journalists to shield informants who often provide information of great interest and importance but who might be punished if their identities were known."

CIVIL LAW:

Banking Case Could Give Clues To New Court's Attitude Towards Federalism. USA Today (11/29, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court today takes up a hotly contested business case with major implications for the nation's banking industry and, more broadly, for states' ability to set consumer protection and other laws that are tougher than federal standards." The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, "pits Michigan regulators, supported by consumer groups and state attorneys general, against the banking industry, federal officials and business groups such as the US Chamber of Commerce. A decision is likely by July, when the court recesses for the term."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/29, Richey, 59K) reports, "For 11 years, the conservative wing of the US Supreme Court did something decidedly unconservative. It sought to tip the balance of power between the national government and the states. This so-called federalism revolution was aimed at bolstering the status of the states as dual sovereigns in the face of an ever-expanding sphere of federal power. The justices wrote of state sovereignty and the dignity of the states in terms reminiscent of Colonial distrust of the kind of draconian central authority wielded by the British crown." But "by the time Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in 2005, the 'revolution' resembled little more than a constitutional skirmish." Now, "with two new members of the Supreme Court, it is unclear whether the justices might again take up the mantle of states' rights. Will a majority seek to boldly build on the string of federalism precedents handed down by the Rehnquist court, or will the judicial minimalism of Chief Justice John Roberts leave it to federal regulatory agencies and Congress to police the constitutional contours of federal-state power? The high court's first significant opportunity to address those questions arrives in a case set for oral argument Wednesday." At issue in Watters v. Wachovia Bank "is whether a federal agency has the power to preempt state regulations governing national mortgage companies doing business within a state's borders. Put another way, the issue is who regulates mortgage companies affiliated with national banks, state regulators or federal regulators."

WSJournal Urges High Court To Side With Bank. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "in Watters v. Wachovia states are still trying to exercise authority over federally chartered banks. … Linda Watters, the petitioner in the case, is Michigan's state banking regulator. In 2003 she tried to bar Wachovia Mortgage Corporation from making loans in Michigan unless it submitted to direct state regulation." The Journal concludes, "Supporters of state regulation cry 'federalism,' and this paper yields to no one in trying to restrict Washington to its Constitutionally delegated powers. But the Constitution contains the Commerce Clause for a reason. If banking across state lines isn't interstate commerce, it's hard to know what is. Given that the appeals courts have sided with the banks in earlier cases, one is left to hope that the Supreme Court has taken Watters in order to eliminate whatever uncertainty remains when it comes to state regulation of national banks."

US Argues Against Strike Appeal By Northwest Airlines Attendants. The St. Paul (MN) Pioneer Press (11/29) reports, "The union representing flight attendants at Northwest Airlines asked an appeals court Tuesday to overturn a judge's ruling and allow them to go on strike." The P-P continues, Arguing before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a lawyer for the Association of Flight Attendants-CWA, Edward Gilmartin, said the law allows for a strike because Northwest made unilateral changes in its employees' contract terms and working conditions, including imposing pay cuts." The P-P adds, "A focus of the argument was on the federal Railway Labor Act, which governs labor relations at U.S. airlines. … The appeals court will decide whether New York U.S. District Court Judge Victor Marrero properly overruled a bankruptcy court judge over the summer when he stopped the flight attendants from engaging in any strike activity. … Northwest is operating in bankruptcy protection, and it imposed the cuts after union members twice voted down negotiated settlements with the airline. Northwest maintains it needs the cuts to exit bankruptcy." The P-P notes, "A lawyer for Northwest, meanwhile, said that the airline wants peace with its flight attendants and urged a federal appeals court to support a judge's decision to block the workers from striking. … And the U.S. Justice Department, represented by Assistant U.S. Attorney Heidi Wendel, argued that a strike, 'would come at the expense of the public.'"

NEA, School Districts In Three States Seek To Revive NCLB Lawsuit. The AP (11/29, Kinney) reports school districts "in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to revive a lawsuit challenging the way government-mandated programs are funded." The National Education Association "and districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law, President Bush's signature education policy. They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government." The three judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "took the case under advisement and did not say when it will rule."

DOJ Settles Housing Bias Claims With Alabama Landlord. The AP (11/29) reports, "The Justice Department reached a housing discrimination case settlement Tuesday with a landlord in Saraland (AL) accused of trying to force a white renter out of an apartment after learning she had a biracial daughter." The AP continues, "The settlement, which includes a $40,000 damages payment, stems from a federal complaint alleging that Beulah Stevens violated the federal Fair Housing Act in her actions against Michele Jones, according to the Justice Department. … Although Jones is white, the complaint states that Stevens tried to force Jones out of the apartment 'upon learning that her child is biracial and that she associated with African Americans,' the agency said in a news release. It also said Stevens was accused of using racial epithets when speaking about black people." The AP adds, "According to the complaint, two fair housing tests carried out by the Mobile Fair Housing Center — now called the Center for Fair Housing, Inc. — showed that Stevens, who manages 19 rental properties, treated white testers who asked about availability of rental units more favorably than black testers. … Under the settlement, Stevens agreed to pay more than $40,000 in damages and penalties, to post a non-discriminatory rental policy, to undergo training on the requirements of the Fair Housing Act and to submit periodic reports to the Justice Department. … The settlement still needs to be approved by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama. … 'This case shows that the Department of Justice and this office believe that housing discrimination is a serious violation of the law,' said U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes of Mobile. 'We will enforce federal laws against racial discrimination.'"

DOJ Nears Decision On Probe Of NYC Police Shooting. CNN.com (11/29) reports, "New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg met Tuesday with the family of a man shot and killed by police early Saturday in an incident that has sparked community outrage and could lead to a federal investigation." CNN continues, "Sean Bell, 23, was shot to death by police officers outside a Queens nightclub hours before he was to be married to the mother of his two children. .. .Two others -- 31-year-old Joseph Guzman and 23-year-old Trent Benefield -- were seriously wounded in the incident." CNN adds, "Bloomberg told reporters he met for an hour with Bell's family and fiancee to express his condolences and discuss the investigation of the incident. … Community leaders have demanded to know why NYPD officers fired as many as 50 rounds -- one officer alone fired 31 shots -- at the unarmed group of men as they were leaving Bell's bachelor party early Saturday morning." CNN notes, "All five police officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave Sunday pending an investigation by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown. … Bloomberg said Brown's office was investigating the incident diligently and trying to determine whether a grand jury should be involved. … 'District Attorney Brown is the one who now has responsibility for trying to ascertain what happened,' Bloomberg said. … Bloomberg rejected claims that the incident was racially motivated, citing an NYPD policy against ethnic profiling." CNN adds, "Federal law enforcement officials said the Justice Department was nearing the formal opening of a federal civil rights investigation into the fatal shooting. … Justice Department officials acknowledged the matter remained under review and that federal authorities in Washington and New York continued to monitor events in the aftermath of the shooting. … Officials declined to confirm that a decision to formally investigate the case could be announced as early as Tuesday or Wednesday. … FBI officials asking not to be identified said they expected the Justice Department 'very soon' to request agents for the federal probe. … 'Until that happens, this investigation is completely in the hands of the Queens district attorney,' said one FBI official."

Undercover Officer Claims He Identified Himself Before Shooting. The New York Daily News (11/29, Gendar, Siemaszko) reports, "The undercover cop who fired the opening salvo in a 50-shot barrage that felled a Queens man on his wedding day told his story yesterday for the first time." The News continues, "The detective insisted he identified himself as a cop well before he fired on the car carrying Sean Bell and his buddies. … 'This cop screamed, "Police!" and he had his shield out,' attorney Philip Karasyk told the Daily News." The News adds, "The News is withholding the name of the Brooklyn-born detective to protect his safety and the undercover operations he has worked on. … The detective held his fire despite Bell clipping him with his Nissan Altima, said Karasyk, who refused to name his client, even as police sources confirmed his identity. … 'Once the car hit him, he jumped to the side,' Karasyk said. … But when the cop saw the man sitting in the passenger seat - whom police sources identified as Joseph Guzman - reach into his waistband, the officer fired the first of 11 rounds at the men." The News notes, "Four other officers, believing they were being shot at, also opened up on the car, Karasyk said. When the gunfire was over, Bell was dead and Guzman and another man, Trent Benefield, were badly wounded. … 'The other officers believed the shots were coming from the vehicle,' Karasyk said. 'They only did so in this case because they were in mortal fear for their lives.' … Queens District Attorney Richard Brown has vowed to get to the bottom of the Saturday morning shooting that has outraged black New Yorkers - and that Mayor Bloomberg said looked like 'excessive force.' … Karasyk, however, said the five cops involved in the shooting - none of whom ever fired his gun on the job before - had no qualms about telling their stories before a Queens grand jury. … 'That's our offer to the prosecutors - to waive immunity,' Karasyk said. … The Justice Department is monitoring the unfolding investigation, but Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslyn Mauskopf emphasized it is not independently collecting evidence or interviewing witnesses."

Marchers Protest Atlanta Police Shooting As Victim Laid To Rest. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/29, Ahmed, 379K) reports, "About 70 residents gathered outside the house of Kathryn Johnston Tuesday evening, some holding placards condemning police, others venting angrily about the botched narcotics raid that claimed the life of the elderly woman a week ago. … The rally participants marched to a church for a community meeting, bringing the crowd to about 300. Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington addressed the crowd, saying he became concerned after community response to the shooting" and noting that "he brought in the FBI to lead the investigation." The AJC adds, "Marchers to the church carried signs that mocked the police, passed around by rally organizers, the New Black Panther for Self-Defense. … As some of the attendees pumped fists into the air and shouted 'Black Power' at the exhortation of the organizers, a handful of stoic GBI and FBI agents stood by watching." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/29, Reid, Cook, 379K) reports that at Johnston's funeral Tuesday, "Friends and family…said they just want to know the truth about the drug raid that led to the elderly woman's death. … The Rev. Markel Hutchins, who has acted as spokesman for the family, said Johnston's family is encouraged by the FBI's entry into the investigation." Hutchins noted, "They had zero confidence before yesterday. Now their confidence is increased."

Reactions To Shootings Demonstrate Changing Cultural Climate. USA Today (11/29, Copeland) reports, "An 88-year-old woman killed last week in a shootout with plainclothes police who burst into her home was laid to rest Tuesday amid a burgeoning national debate over police use of deadly force." USA continues, "Kathryn Johnston was killed Nov. 21 when she fired at undercover narcotics agents who had obtained a 'no-knock' search warrant for her home after telling a judge that a confidential informant had bought drugs there earlier in the day. … The FBI is leading a probe of the incident, in which Johnston wounded three officers, after the informant told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV that he never bought drugs at the house but that a narcotics officer had instructed him to say that he had. 'I'm telling them, I never went to that house,' he says in an interview in which his face was disguised." USA adds, "Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington says the man, who has not been publicly identified, 'told us he had no knowledge of going to that house and purchasing drugs. I don't know if he's telling the truth.' … Seven narcotics investigators and a police sergeant have been placed on paid leave until the inquiry is completed, a routine procedure in such cases." USA notes, "More than 200 people rallied in Johnston's northwest Atlanta neighborhood Tuesday evening to demand answers in the shooting, one of several that have put police use of deadly force under increased scrutiny. … In New York City early Saturday, Sean Bell, 23, was killed after he left a bachelor party at a strip club that was the target of an undercover police investigation. Police fired more than 50 shots at a car carrying Bell and two friends, both of whom were wounded." USA notes, "Some criminal justice experts cautioned against over-reacting to the shootings. … 'Police departments have become far more scrupulous in training and accountability and are recruiting people to try to minimize the number of police-involved shootings,' says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a think tank in Washington, D.C. … 'There are much tighter controls on the use of force. Police departments have significantly narrowed the conditions under which police can use deadly force,' he said."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/29, Marks) reports, "Call it a tale of two shootings. In each, an unarmed black man is killed in New York in a hail of bullets fired by police, fearing, rightly or wrongly, for their lives. … But the different responses of city leaders to last weekend's shooting of Sean Bell in Queens and the 1999 death of Amadou Diallo in the Bronx tell a tale of a city's evolution and its ability to learn the importance of acknowledging a community's outrage and responding to it. Such a changed response is evident not just in New York, but in other cities across the country." The Monitor continues, "Almost as soon as Mayor Michael Bloomberg heard Saturday that police fired 50 times on three possibly unarmed black men, he began reaching out to political, religious, and community leaders, assuring them a full, fair investigation would take place. By Monday morning, the mayor, police commissioner, and dozens of black leaders - many still angry - came together at City Hall. … In the immediate aftermath of the 1999 death of Mr. Diallo, a West African immigrant shot in the entry to his apartment building, then-Mayor Rudolph Giuliani defiantly defended the police. He didn't meet with local black leaders until weeks later. Thousands of protesters poured into the streets, prompting more than 1,700 arrests." The Monitor adds, "New York's reaction is emblematic of changes in community/police relations across the country. From Cincinnati to Atlanta to Los Angeles, police departments have realized they need the cooperation and support of minority communities - those that usually felt the brunt of the 'get tough' crime initiatives of the 1990s. In each city, fumbled political reactions to a charge of police misconduct - whether it was the 1991 beating of Rodney King in Los Angeles or the 2001 shooting of a young black man in Cincinnati - have taught lessons about the importance of reaching out, urging calm, and dealing with nothing but the facts."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A18), Joseph D. McNamara, a retired NYPD deputy inspector and former police chief of Kansas City, Mo., and San Jose, Calif., is a research fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford, writes, "Inescapably, comparisons were made between Mr. Bell (who was to have been married later on Saturday) and Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant killed in a volley of 41 bullets by four NYPD plainclothes officers in February 1999. Mr. Diallo had committed no crime and was attempting to enter his own hallway when one of the undercover officers yelled, "Gun!" The four officers were acquitted in a trial held outside the city, based upon their defense that they reasonably believed their lives were in danger. … In both cases, the NYPD accurately cited statistics indicating that it had a comparatively low shooting rate, and that shootings by police were not rising. And in both instances, New York's black leaders and black communities reacted with understandable outrage that unarmed black men were killed with such a volume of gunfire. Both sides seemed to be talking past one another, instead of to each other." McNamara adds, "Simply put, the police culture in our country has changed. An emphasis on "officer safety" and paramilitary training pervades today's policing, in contrast to the older culture, which held that cops didn't shoot until they were about to be shot or stabbed. Police in large cities formerly carried revolvers holding six .38-caliber rounds. Nowadays, police carry semi-automatic pistols with 16 high-caliber rounds, shotguns and military assault rifles, weapons once relegated to SWAT teams facing extraordinary circumstances. Concern about such firepower in densely populated areas hitting innocent citizens has given way to an attitude that the police are fighting a war against drugs and crime and must be heavily armed." McNamara concludes, "There appear to be important differences between the killings of Mr. Diallo and Mr. Bell. Mr. Diallo was no threat to anyone. First reports are that the car occupied by Mr. Bell deliberately struck an undercover officer after he had identified himself. In addition, it is clear that the current police commissioner and mayor have established much better relations with the black community than their predecessors. Both Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Commissioner Raymond Kelly have been as critical of the current shooting as permitted under due process. Yet when all is said and done, those with official responsibility to ensure that the innocent are protected, not harmed, by the police must constantly evaluate all police training, tactics, arms and attitudes."

Los Angeles Police Commission Clears Officers In Toddler's Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "The LAPD officers who stormed a South L.A. auto shop last year, killing 19-month-old hostage Suzie Peña during a gun battle with her father, followed department rules and should not be punished, the Police Commission ruled Tuesday. But the oversight panel found problems in the way the Los Angeles Police Department field command responded and managed the crisis and singled out for potential discipline two officers who fired their weapons from the periphery very early in the 2 1/2 -hour siege. 'There was a systemic breakdown at the command and leadership level,' Commission President John Mack said." The Times notes, "Specifically, the commission wants to hold commanders managing the scene more accountable for the actions of officers on the ground. "

Wisconsin Man Pleads Guilty To Shrine Desecration. The AP (11/29) reports, "A 21-year-old man pleaded guilty Monday to desecrating one of Wisconsin's most popular religious shrines to commemorate 'Satan's birthday.'" The AP continues, "Tyler Groth pleaded guilty to felony criminal damage to religious property, and could face up to a year and a half in jail when he is sentenced Jan. 11. … Groth and his 17-year-old cousin, David J. Groth, were accused of spraying paint on statues and spray painting a devil's face at several locations in June at the Basilica of Holy Hill, National Shrine of Mary, in Erin." The AP adds, "It was to commemorate the date 06-06-06, and Tyler Groth told investigators the date is 'Satan's birthday.' In the Bible, the Book of Revelation describes triple sixes as the mark of the Antichrist. … Groth agreed to plead guilty in exchange for the dismissal of two unrelated misdemeanor graffiti charges, his attorney said."

Judge Schedules Hearing On Osceola, FL, Voting Districts. The Orlando Sentinel (11/29) reports, "A federal judge who ruled that Osceola's countywide elections for commissioners violates the U.S. Voting Rights Act on Monday ordered a hearing in the case next week." The Sentinel continues, "The announcement came just days after competing proposals by the county and the U.S. Department of Justice were submitted to the court." The Sentinel adds, "U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell set aside two hours for the 2 p.m. hearing Dec. 7 at the federal courthouse in Orlando, 80 N. Hughey Ave. He had ruled that the current countywide system penalizes Hispanics in a 'racially polarized' county. … The Justice Department, which proposed single-member-district elections for all five commission seats, asked for the hearing with its filing Wednesday." The Sentinel notes, "Federal prosecutors offered two options with slightly different district lines. .. .The county's attorneys proposed a plan that would have two commissioners elected at-large and five from single-member districts. … All three plans center on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside."

Judge Orders Treasury Department To Make Bills Recognizable To Blind. The AP (11/29, Apuzzo) reports, "By keeping all currency bills the same size and texture, the U.S. government has denied blind people meaningful access to money, a federal judge said Tuesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge James Robertson said the Treasury Department has violated the law, and he ordered the government to come up with ways for the blind to tell bills apart. … He said he wouldn't tell officials how to fix the problem, but he ordered them to begin working on it within 10 days. The American Council of the Blind has proposed several options, including printing bills of differing sizes, adding embossed dots or foil to the paper or using raised ink. … 'Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations,' Robertson wrote. 'More than 100 of the other issuers vary their bills in size according to denomination, and every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired.'" The AP adds, "Government attorneys argued that forcing the Treasury Department to change the size of the bills or add texture would make it harder to prevent counterfeiting. Robertson was not swayed. … 'The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, at least on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,' he wrote. … He said the government was violating the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability in government programs. The opinion came after a four-year legal fight."

The New York Times (11/29, Andrews) reports, "The judge pointed out that euro notes came in bigger sizes for higher denominations and had raised numerals as well as foil patches in different shapes. Japanese notes have rough patches to help identify them by touch. Swiss francs feature intaglio printing and perforated numerals, and other countries use sequences of perforated dots. … 'The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,' Judge Robertson wrote." The Times adds, "The Treasury Department refused to comment on the decision or on whether it would appeal the order, which came after a four-year court fight between the government and the American Council of the Blind. … The Treasury Department had argued that making bills identifiable by touch would create an undue financial burden for the government. It had estimated that the most expensive approach — printing different sizes for different denominations — would cost $178 million for new printing presses and as much as $50 million for new plates. … Judge Robertson said that cost would be small compared with the $4.2 billion that the government spent on currency production in the past 10 years."

The Washington Times (11/29, Haberkorn) reports, "Government attorneys argued that adding texture or changing the size of bills would be costly and make it harder to prevent counterfeiting." The Times notes, "The American Council of the Blind, which filed the suit in 2002, proposed a number of solutions that are used in other countries. … In Britain, each denomination is a different size, said Melanie Brunson, the Washington association's executive director. In Canada, currency has a series of dots in its corners, differentiated by denomination. And other countries use different patterns of raised dots or lines. … 'Our intent was to get Treasury to focus enough attention to incorporate those [ideas] or come up with something else to meet the needs of people who can't read them visually,' Mrs. Brunson said."

Florida Charges Eight In Youth Boot Camp Death. The Tallahassee Democrat (11/29, Price, 50K) reports, "Eleven months after 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson died, a protest march on the state Capitol and complaints that the investigation took too long, State Attorney Mark Ober on Tuesday charged seven drill instructors and a nurse with felony aggravated manslaughter of a child in the teen's death. For Anderson's parents the charges were late but an answer to their prayers. … Gov. Jeb Bush, who spoke with Anderson's parents Tuesday, said he, too, was glad the investigation had concluded." The Democrat notes, "Charged are Henry Dickens, Charles Enfinger, Patrick Garrett, Raymond Hauck, Charles Helms Jr., Henry McFadden Jr., Kristin Schmidt and Joseph Walsh II, according to a filing by Ober. If convicted, the defendants could receive up to 30 years in prison." The AP (11/29, Nelson) adds, "The teen collapsed in the exercise yard at the camp in Panama City and died at a hospital the next day. The death sparked protests at the state Capitol and led to a shake-up in Florida's criminal justice system and the resignation of Florida's top law enforcement officer." For those charges yesterday, "bail was set at $25,000 apiece."

Virginia To Let Vermont Decide Lesbian Parent's Visitation Rights. The Washington Post/AP (11/29, A08) reports, "A Virginia appellate court sidestepped the issue of civil unions Tuesday in ruling that, because two former lesbian partners filed for their union in Vermont, that state's courts have jurisdiction in a custody battle." The AP continues, "The Court of Appeals of Virginia remanded the dispute between Janet Miller-Jenkins and Lisa Miller-Jenkins to a lower Virginia court and advised it to issue a new judgment recognizing Vermont's authority. … 'By so holding, we do not address whether Virginia law recognizes or endorses same-sex unions entered into in another state or jurisdiction,' the court wrote in its decision." The AP adds, "An attorney for Janet Miller-Jenkins called it a victory. … 'This is exactly what we have been arguing since January of 2005 -- that the Virginia trial court had no business under either Virginia or federal law interfering with the decision of the Vermont family court,' Joseph Price said. … Lisa Miller-Jenkins will continue to pursue the case, said her attorney, Erik Stanley."

Study Questions Racial Diversity At Major Law Firms. The New York Times (11/29, Liptak) reports, "Thanks to vigorous recruiting and pressure from corporate clients, black lawyers are well represented now among new associates at the nation's most prestigious law firms. But they remain far less likely to stay at the firms or to make partner than their white counterparts." The Times continues, "A recent study says grades help explain the gap. To ensure diversity among new associates, the study found, elite law firms hire minority lawyers with, on average, much lower grades than white ones. That may, the study says, set them up to fail. … The study, which was prepared by Richard H. Sander, a law professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, and was published in The North Carolina Law Review in July, has given rise to fierce and growing criticism in law review articles and in the legal press. In an opinion article in The National Law Journal this month, for instance, R. Bruce McClean, the chairman of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a major law firm, took issue with the study's 'sweeping conclusions' but not its 'detailed data analysis.'" The Times adds, "Achieving racial diversity at all levels is an urgent issue, law firms say, but they acknowledge that gains among new associates disappear by the time new partners are elected. "We've seen stagnation and even decline when it comes to race," said Meredith Moore, the director of the New York City Bar Association's diversity office. … The new study proposes an explanation. It found that the pool of black lawyers with excellent law-school grades is so small that firms must relax their standards if they are to have new associates who resemble the pool of new lawyers." The Times notes, "Professor Sander found that very few blacks graduated from top-30 law schools with high grades. … Yet grades, according to many hiring partners and law students, are a significant criterion in hiring decisions, rivaled only by the prestige of the law school in question. For instance, Professor Sander found, 'white law school graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.5 or higher are nearly 20 times as likely to be working for a large law firm as are white graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.0 or lower.'"

ANTITRUST:

Court Allows DOJ Antitrust Suit Against NAR To Proceed. Market Watch (11/29) reports, "A federal court in Chicago has allowed the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors to proceed, the department said Tuesday." Market Watch continues, "The court rejected the association's argument that last-minute changes to its policies prevented judicial scrutiny, the department said. … In denying the association's motion to dismiss the case, the court said that 'NAR has failed ... to demonstrate that this case should be dismissed at the outset,' according to the Justice Department." Market Watch adds, "In September 2005 the department's antitrust division filed a lawsuit charging that NAR rules limit competition from real-estate brokers who use the Internet to serve their customers. The lawsuit alleged that the association's policy threatened to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting. … The Realtors association denies it discriminates against discount brokers or others who use the Internet to compete with conventional brokers."

Bloomberg (11/29) reports, "The ruling by a federal judge in Chicago lets the Justice Department proceed to pretrial fact-finding to try to prove that the Realtors and member brokers engaged in an 'ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy' to restrain competition. … U.S. District Judge Mark R. Filip rejected the Realtors' argument that the government had no case after the trade association in May 2005 changed the policy that limited online access to listings by customers of brokers who operate 'virtual office Web sites.' … The Realtors' 'contention that the United States has failed even to plead a claim is unpersuasive,' Filip wrote. … The trade association 'and its members have entered into a collective action that purports to regulate how they will compete in the marketplace,' the judge said." Bloomberg adds, "The government's complaint, filed in September 2005, said the Realtors' rules limited competition by preventing customers of online brokers from receiving full access to multiple listings. The Realtors' policy lets traditional brokers block competitors from having full online access to multiple listings. … The Chicago-based Realtors' group changed its policy after the Justice Department said it planned to sue to challenge the rules as anticompetitive, according to Filip's opinion. The modified policy still contains features that the government claims are anticompetitive, the judge wrote. … The government has argued that the original policy had 'enduring effects' in some markets and that the modified rules have 'not eliminated all effects,' Filip wrote. … 'We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to presenting our case at trial,' J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy attorney general for antitrust, said in a statement released by the Justice Department."

Inman News (11/29, Roberts) reports, "Filip last month denied the Realtor group's motion to dismiss the lawsuit, which was filed in September 2005 and amended in October 2005. The lawsuit alleges that the trade group's policies governing the online display and sharing of property information are overly restrictive and can harm consumers and stifle innovation. … The National Association of Realtors in December filed the motion in U.S. District Court in Chicago in an attempt to toss out parts of the lawsuit that target the association's former online listings policy, known as the Virtual Office Website (VOW) policy and so-called 'opt-out' provisions of its policies that allow brokers to withhold online listings from other brokers." Inman continues, "Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said there 'were no surprises' in the judge's opinion. The rules of the court dictate that the judge must assume that the allegations brought by the Justice Department are true in weighing the association's motion, Janik said -- the lawsuit has not yet reached the trial phase and both sides are still gathering evidence. … 'He was very careful in his wording. I didn't view anything he had sent out as significant (to the overall case),' she added. 'We knew it was a long shot but we thought it was worth making. The sooner we can end this litigation, the better.'"

SCOTUS Hears Arguments In Antitrust Suit Against Weyerhaeuser. The AP (11/29) reports, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday questioned whether forest products giant Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller competitor out of business by paying too much for logs that Weyerhaeuser allegedly didn't need." The AP continues, "The case focuses on the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest and pits a defunct company, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., against Weyerhaeuser and the Bush administration." The AP adds, 'Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to Ross-Simmons stemming from a jury verdict that found the larger company had violated federal antitrust law. .. .Ross-Simmons accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder sawlogs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills. .. .Arguments before the Supreme Court Tuesday turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/29, Dlouhy) reports, "The lawyer for a now-defunct sawmill told the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday that timber giant Weyerhaeuser Co. broke federal antitrust laws by overpaying for more logs than it needed and then cutting its prices on the finished lumber used to make guitars and furniture. … The strategy drove the smaller timber processor, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., out of business at the same time it allowed Weyerhaeuser to strengthen its foothold in the Pacific Northwest alder saw-log market, said the lawyer, Michael Haglund. … 'Weyerhaeuser artificially increased the log market above where it otherwise would have been,' Haglund said. 'We have a situation where they warehoused large -- unprecedentedly high -- volumes of lumber because they' wanted to keep it out of competitors' hands." The P-I adds, "Ross-Simmons now wants Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser to pay nearly $80 million in damages for the business tactics, which it says were part of a ploy to monopolize the market. The Longview-based sawmill says Weyerhaeuser's tactics forced it out of business in 2001 by driving prices for saw logs higher than it could afford and by depleting the supply of the trees. … The price of alder saw logs and that of finished lumber made from the material are usually tied together. But from 1998 to 2001, Ross-Simmons argued in court filings, the price of saw logs rose even as the price of finished lumber dropped. … In its defense, Weyerhaeuser contends it was only making smart business decisions and could afford to pay more for the logs because it was more efficient at processing the wood."

Judge Restrains Sale Of Bay Area Newspapers. The AP (11/29, Kravets) reports, "A previously undisclosed internal memo prompted a federal judge Tuesday to temporarily block the consolidation of some of the San Francisco Chronicle's business operations with those of rival newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc." The AP continues, "Denver-based MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from Hearst Corp., owner of the Chronicle." The AP adds, "In July, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston let the deal go through, ruling against an antitrust lawsuit that claimed the deal would create a monopoly on readership and advertising in the region. … But in issuing Tuesday's restraining order, she said a memo had recently surfaced showing Hearst had an undisclosed motive for investing in the deal -- to consolidate its Bay Area advertising and distribution operations with those of the Chronicle's competitors -- a possible antitrust violation. … 'Such agreements would alter the court's analysis of this case as a whole,' Illston wrote, and would 'increase the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anticompetitive, and illegal.'"

The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (11/29, Richman) reports, "Evidence of talks between MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. -- the San Francisco Chronicle's owner, and a party to MediaNews' recent purchase of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times -- raises the specter of antitrust violations, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston of San Francisco wrote in Tuesday's order. .. She'll hold a hearing Dec. 6 on whether her order should become a preliminary injunction, barring any such deals at least until a lawsuit challenging MediaNews' acquisitions goes to trial in April." The Times-Star adds, "Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. this year bought the now-defunct Knight Ridder Corp.'s 32 newspapers for $6.5 billion. From among those, the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times were then sold for $736.8 million to Denver-based MediaNews Group -- which also owns this newspaper -- and the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press were sold for $263.2 million to New York City-based Hearst Corp. .. .In a separate, simultaneous pact, Hearst agreed to give the St. Paul and Monterey papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-Bay Area assets. … San Francisco businessman, political consultant and former mayoral candidate Clint Reilly sued July 14 to halt the deal, claiming it would create a Bay Area newspaper monopoly with higher subscription and advertising rates and diminished journalistic quality, jobs and union contracts. .. .Illston refused his initial plea for a TRO to prevent the sale's closing, but Reilly went back to her last week with new evidence found among documents provided by the newspaper companies."

The San Francisco Chronicle (11/29, Egelko) reports, "The restraining order will be in effect until a Dec. 6 hearing on an injunction that would keep the ban in place until April 30. That is when a lawsuit by Clint Reilly, a real estate investor, former political consultant and onetime San Francisco mayoral candidate, is scheduled to go to trial." The Chronicle adds, "Reilly is seeking to block MediaNews' purchase of the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, arguing that the deal, combined with MediaNews' financial arrangement with Hearst, would create a newspaper monopoly in the Bay Area. … Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said today's ruling could be the first step toward upsetting MediaNews' purchase. … 'This agreement (on distribution and advertising) was the knot that ties the whole package together, and when this unravels, the whole package unravels,' Alioto said. … 'They're trying to monopolize the entire Bay Area,' Alioto said of MediaNews and Hearst. 'They did it secretly ... and they got caught.'"

Justices Hear Arguments In Closely Watched Patent Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Puzzanghera, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court heard oral arguments today in an abstract case involving automobile gas pedals that could apply the brakes to the recent dramatic growth in patents issued nationwide. Frustrated justices flipped through engineering diagrams as they pondered a question at the heart of many patent disputes -- was the invention of an adjustable pedal with electronic sensors truly unique in this case, or just an 'obvious' combination of existing components that anyone with a little skill in the field could have designed?" USA Today (11/29, Biskupic, 2.27M) notes there were "unusually spirited arguments," as "several Supreme Court justices challenged the prevailing standard for when an invention is too closely tied to existing works to qualify for patent protection." However, some justices also "worried that changing the rules of 'obviousness' would throw into doubt the validity of many existing patents." Justice David Souter "asked whether there would be '100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning' if the standard used by a lower federal court that oversees patent appeals were changed. He wondered if such a change would 'produce chaos.'" The New York Times (11/29, Greenhouse, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

Justices Skeptical Of Federal Circuit's Patent Test. The Legal Times (11/29, Mauro) reports, "In surprisingly blunt terms, Supreme Court justices Tuesday made it crystal clear that they are upset with the nation's patent system, the lawyers who litigate under it and the appeals court that referees it." The Times continues, "During a lively -- bordering on raucous -- hour of arguments on what makes an invention so obvious that it does not deserve a patent, justice after justice piled on criticism of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's three-part 'teaching-suggestion-motivation' test for determining obviousness, an issue that arises in virtually every patent application and appeal. The test has been criticized as too patent-friendly, resulting in a proliferation of junk patents that stifle competition. … 'Three imponderable nouns,' is how Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the test, also calling it 'gobbledygook' for good measure. … Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. called it 'Federal Circuit jargon' that is inflexible and 'worse than meaningless.' … And when Justice Stephen Breyer said he had read the briefs in the case '15 times' and still could not understand the 'motivation' prong of the test, Scalia chimed in, 'Like Justice Breyer, I don't understand.' … The implied message to the Federal Circuit seemed to be: If two of the brainier justices on the Supreme Court don't have a clue what you are talking about, a new test might be in order. … By the end of the arguments in KSR International v. Teleflex, it seemed obvious that the Federal Circuit's three-part test for obviousness will be modified, if not scrapped altogether. But what will replace it was less clear." The Times notes, "After the argument Tuesday, the Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, defended the test in a telephone interview, asserting, 'The judges of our court are quite clear on what it is and how to apply it.' He said the test goes back decades -- since before creation of the court in 1982 -- and has been applied with flexibility and common sense. 'I wonder if some of the descriptions of the test I have seen lately are accurate.'"

Supreme Court To Consider Company's Price Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) reports, "Companies often are accused of cutting prices unfairly to drive a competitor from the market, but is raising prices for the same purpose just as unfair?" The Supreme Court "questioned whether Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller rival out of business by paying too much for logs that the Federal Way, Wash., forest-products company allegedly didn't need." Weyerhaeuser "is fighting an $80 million award to the now-defunct Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. stemming from a jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser violated federal antitrust law. Ross-Simmons, of Longview, Wash., accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder logs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills that use the wood in furniture and other products. Yesterday's oral arguments before the high court turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty."

Movie Studios Push Apple On Anti-Piracy Rules. The Financial Times (11/29, Garrahan, Birchall) reports, "Apple Computer is coming under pressure from some of Hollywood's biggest movie studios to change the operating environment of its popular iTunes platform, amid growing concern about digital piracy." The Times continues, "The studios – Universal, 20th Century Fox, Paramount and Warner Bros – are in talks with Apple about making their films available for digital download on iTunes. … After months of discussion, a sticking point has emerged over the studios' demand that Apple limit the number of devices that can use a film downloaded from iTunes." The Times adds, "The studios want to avoid the experience of the music industry, which has yet to recover from years of illegal digital piracy. Apple must introduce a 'new model' for feature film content delivery, said one studio executive involved in the talks. … With the average cost of a blockbuster film approaching $100m, movie studios had more to lose than music companies, he added. 'We're very willing to do a deal but we're keen to get some concessions from Apple that will account for the differences between the value of music and television content and feature film content.' … The talks between Apple and the studios come as retailers are scrambling to get to grips with digital delivery of film content. Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, is entering the nascent market, challenging Amazon and Apple with a different model that ties digital downloads to the sale of DVDs."

NASD, NYSE To Merge Some Oversight Functions. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, C1, Smith, Scannell) reports, "In a victory for Wall Street, the two organizations that police brokerage firms unveiled, as expected, a plan to merge some of their operations -- the latest step in a deregulatory push in U.S. markets." The Journal continues, "Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the pact, saying it would streamline Wall Street regulation and raise the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. Some investor advocates said the merger could weaken protections for individual investors by effectively removing cops from the beat. No immediate job cuts are planned, with the regulators saying any reductions would come through attrition." The Journal adds, "The National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange plan to combine routine examinations, enforcement and rule-making for the securities industry. The plan, which must still be ratified by 5,100 current NASD members, follows a campaign waged intermittently since 2000 by Wall Street's lobbying group, recently renamed the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association. … The regulatory relief for Wall Street comes as both NYSE Group and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. are bidding to acquire exchanges in Europe. Both exchanges must persuade non-U.S. investors and overseas issuers of securities that they won't suffer from the increase in U.S. regulation, notably the Sarbanes-Oxley law that was passed in 2002 after the collapse of Enron Corp. and other post-bubble scandals and added layers of regulation for public companies trading in the U.S."

USA Today (11/29, Farrell) reports, "The new group, which is yet to be named, will merge the NASD's 2,400 regulators and examiners with the 470 regulators at the NYSE. Currently, the NASD oversees about 5,100 brokerages, from small operations to big broker-dealers, while NYSE regulators focus on 180 major firms that dominate business on the Big Board." USA adds, "Some details of the merger have yet to be worked out. Then the deal will need formal approval from the SEC. But Tuesday's announcement suggests that the merger, which has been encouraged by the firms that have been regulated by both parties, is virtually a done deal. … While the new group is officially a merger of equals, NASD Chairman and CEO Mary Schapiro will emerge as CEO of the new entity, while NYSE Regulation CEO Richard Ketchum becomes chairman. Ketchum will continue to run the NYSE's market surveillance programs, which will remain separate from the merged entity."

Mack-Cali To Bid On Reckson. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, B7, Forsyth) reports, "A chief competitor of Reckson Associates Realty Corp. says it is teaming with financier Carl Icahn and New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe in their $4.6 billion competing bid to acquire Reckson, a real-estate investment trust." The Journal continues, "Mack-Cali Realty Corp. said last night it expects to be admitted as a partner with Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe. 'We believe the combined partnership will be a(n) ... enhancement, given our collective strengths,' Mack-Cali Chief Executive Mitchell Hersh said in an interview." The Journal adds, "Mack-Cali, of Edison, N.J., competes directly against Reckson, of Uniondale, N.Y., in the suburban markets of New York. Mack-Cali wasn't contacted as a possible suitor when Reckson put itself up for sale, in part because of two failed merger negotiations between the two companies. Mr. Hersh has said he would have wanted a chance to bid on Reckson's suburban assets. Reckson had no comment on Mr. Hersh's statement last night. … However, earlier yesterday, Reckson notified Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe -- via email to the partnership and a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission -- that their request to bring in additional investors to comb through Reckson's books wouldn't be allowed under the terms of the confidentiality agreement."

Iberdrola Purchase Of Scottish Power Could Spur European Energy Sector Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Johnson, Singer) reports, "Spanish power company Iberdrola SA's £11.6 billion ($22.64 billion) offer for Scottish Power PLC could jump-start a long-awaited consolidation in the European power sector, which has been hamstrung by legal and political battles. If successful, the deal, announced yesterday, would create Europe's third-largest power company by market capitalization with a combined value of about €46 billion ($60.7 billion) and ratchet up the pressure on others in the sector to bulk up." The Journal adds, "Power companies across Europe have been struggling to consolidate for the past year, as they seek to boost their size to take advantage of deregulation of the sector by the end of 2007."

The New York Times (11/29, Mclean, Timmons) says Iberdrola's purchase of Scottish Power "would create one of Europe's largest utilities."

The AP (11/28, Barr) reports, "The proposal follows others in the European utility sector, where Germany's E.On AG is trying to buy Spain's Endesa SA and Gaz de France and France's Suez are planning to combine." The AP adds, "Jack McConnell, first minister of Scotland's regional government, expressed wariness, and said he would seek assurances from the European Union that the takeover would preserve competition." He "said he would seek assurances from European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso that the EU would evaluate the takeover consistent with its competition rules."

The Financial Times (11/29, Shelley, Mulligan) reports the takeover bid "would create Europe's third largest utility – behind EdF of France and Germany's Eon – with an enterprise value of more than £43bn. But Iberdrola's successful search for a foreign tie-up, coupled with Eon's aggressive €37bn bid for Endesa, Spain's largest utility, comes as a blow for the Spanish government, which has attempted to foster the creation of national champions."

The Financial Times (11/29, Crooks) says, "Iberdrola surprised no one in launching a bid for Scottish Power. But the question many were asking was whether it would be the last of its kind for some time. A wave of mergers has swept through the European energy sector, and more consolidation has been widely expected." However, "with two of the biggest potential deals bogged down in legal and political quagmires, and this latest one viewed by the markets with a jaundiced eye, it seems enthusiasm is fading."

Dow Jones (11/28, MacDonald) says, "The deal will need approval from regulators including the European Commission, the U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and U.S. state regulatory commissions or authorities, Iberdrola said."

Novartis May Sell Off Gerber. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, A3, Berman, Whalen, Ball) reports, "Novartis AG may be prepared to sell Gerber Products Co., one of the world's largest and best-known makers of baby food, and could have a willing buyer in Nestlé SA." The Journal continues, "Novartis, a Swiss pharmaceutical concern, already is in negotiations with Nestlé, also of Switzerland, to sell a medical-nutrition business. Nestlé executives are toying with the idea of trying to make the acquisition of Gerber part of the same deal, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Novartis Chief Executive Daniel Vasella said in an interview yesterday that the company 'probably would act opportunistically' if an offer for Gerber emerged, although he added that there was no auction for Gerber under way." The Journal adds, "Gerber, of Fremont, Mich., and Novartis's medical-nutrition business together would fetch between $4 billion and $5 billion, estimate people familiar with the matter. They figure Gerber alone would be valued at more than $3 billion. … Nestlé has been hungry for Gerber for more than a decade. Even though the market for infant purées and other mushy concoctions has been relatively slow growing, the profit margin for baby food is among the highest in the prepared-food industry, at 24% in the U.S., compared with 16% for all packaged food, according to Morgan Stanley. … If Novartis decides to part with Gerber, Nestlé may have to compete with others for the business. Numico NV of the Netherlands, the maker of Nutrica baby food and other brands, is also likely to be interested, as would private-equity firms, people close to those firms say."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

High Court To Hear Arguments On Global Warming. The New York Times (11/29, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court will hear oral arguments on Wednesday on the questions of whether the federal government, particularly the Environmental Protection Agency, is authorized and obligated to take action to alleviate global warming. Massachusetts, which has been joined by 11 other states, 3 cities and 13 environmental groups, will argue that the federal agency has shirked its legal responsibility to protect the public and ignored the requirements of the Clean Air Act." The Times adds, "Federal lawyers, in tandem with those of the auto industry, are arguing that existing law is inadequate to support far-reaching regulation, and that Congress, or the foreign policy arena, or both, are the appropriate venues to produce new global warming policies."

USA Today (11/29, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The court's work on the case will focus on the scope of the federal Clean Air Act rather than the debate over emissions' impact on the climate. However, the justices' ruling could shape the US government's role in a pressing issue of the day and ultimately affect whether automakers will be required to build cleaner-running cars and trucks." The case "could have ramifications for those states because the authority to regulate emissions, even on the state level, derives from the Clean Air Act."

Writing in USA Today (11/29, 2.27M), Jonathan Adler, who teaches environmental and constitutional law at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, says that "if global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for Congress to make. … The petitioners argue that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new-vehicle tailpipes — and a superficial reading of the statutory text could suggest as much. et it is clear to all involved that the relevant statutory provisions were enacted to address local and regional pollution problems — such as soot, smog and acid rain -- not global concerns such as climate change. If global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for our elected representatives to make. … Global warming is a real concern, but global warming policy ultimately belongs to the political branches, not the judiciary."

More Commentary On EPA Cases. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A18, 2.04M) David Rivkin and Lee Casey, who "served in the departments of justice and energy under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush," write, "The Supreme Court is now considering two environmental law cases that superbly illustrate the circumstances in which judges should overturn unlawful administrative actions, and when they should affirm sensible ones. The first, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy, is one of the many enforcement actions the EPA has brought, mostly against electric utilities, under a relatively obscure part of the Clean Air Act known as 'New Source Review.'… By contrast, in Massachusetts v. EPA -- being argued today before the Supreme Court -- the court should uphold the agency's decision not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from all of the new cars and light trucks sold in the U.S."

Investment In Cleaner-Burning Coal Plants Regarded As Urgent. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) Thomas Homer-Dixon, director of the Trudeau Center for Peace and Conflict Studies at the University of Toronto, writes, "As the price of energy rises and as the planet gets hotter, we need significantly higher investment in innovation throughout society, from governments and corporations to universities. Perhaps the most urgent step, if humankind is going to return to coal as its major energy source, is to figure out ways of safely disposing of coal's harmful carbon dioxide — probably underground."

DOJ Launches Web Site On Tribal Crime. The Tulsa World (11/29) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday the launch of a Web site that will focus on crime in Indian Country. … 'I am honored to deliver the promise that I made to provide a one-stop-shop that will enhance the prevention of and response to crime and the administration of justice in Indian Country,' said Regina B. Schofield, assistant attorney general for the Office of Justice Programs. … 'This will serve as a medium for talking about promising practices across the nation. Crime knows no boundaries, and the Tribal Justice and Safety Web site is another way we are using technology to prevent crime and violence from taking root in our communities.'" The World adds, "The site's address is www.usdoj.gov/tribaljusticeandsafety. ... It is designed to serve as a single source of information about law enforcement for tribes, including crime statistics and other public safety issues, as well as a source for tribes on how the Justice Department can help them in fighting crime."

Michigan Tribal Casino Project Faces More Delays. The AP (11/29) reports, "A southwest Michigan casino project by the Gun Lake tribe faces another delay after the government pushed back its timetable for taking land into trust for the project." The AP continues, "The Justice Department said in a court filing last week that the government does not plan to take 146 acres in Wayland Township into trust for the casino before March 5, 2007. … The Interior Department was originally set to take the land into trust Jan. 5, clearing the way for the Gun Lake tribe to begin construction." The AP adds, "The delay was noted Tuesday by Station Casinos Inc. in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Las Vegas-based company said it planned to 'continue contributing significant financial support to this project, even though there can be no assurances when or if the necessary approvals will be obtained.' … Michigan Gambling Opposition, an anti-casino group, sued in 2005 to block the government from taking the land into trust. U.S. District Judge John Penn in Washington is scheduled to consider government and tribal motions for dismissal on Wednesday."

Indian Tribal Membership Cause Of More Frequent Disputes. USA Today (11/29, Bazar) reports, "Native American tribes are facing allegations of greed and racism as they purge members from their rolls and deny the applications of others." USA continues, "The expulsions have sent tremors through Indian country. Thousands of Native Americans have lost their cultural identities and access to tribal benefits, such as medical care, housing and education. Certain gaming tribes divide casino profits among members, in some cases thousands of dollars a month per person. Those expelled lose their cut." USA adds, "Tribal officials say they're protecting legitimate members by making sure everyone in the tribe is qualified. … As sovereign nations, tribes have the final say in who can — and cannot — join. Each tribe determines what degree of Indian blood is necessary for membership, a requirement that varies among the 561 federally recognized tribes." USA notes, "In California, at least 2,000 Native Americans have been taken off the rolls of their tribes since 1999, says Laura Wass, executive director of the Many Lightnings American Indian Legacy Center, an education and advocacy group in Fresno. Disenrollments have surged with the rise of Indian casinos, she says. .. Thousands of Native Americans elsewhere have lost, or may lose, their tribal status. An upcoming vote at the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma could deny citizenship to more than 1,000 of the tribe's 260,000 members. … State and federal courts do not have jurisdiction over Native American membership disputes, says Kevin Gover, law professor at Arizona State University and former assistant secretary of the Interior for Indian affairs. … 'Congress has not given individual Indians the right to sue their tribes,' he says."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Love WFO Criminal Division Chief. Under the headline "FBI Appoints Veteran For Criminal Division," The Washington Times (11/29, Seper, Cella, 88K) reports, "A veteran FBI supervisor who oversaw the investigation into the high-profile, unsolved death of a federal prosecutor in Baltimore was appointed yesterday to lead the criminal division of the bureau's Washington field office. As head of the division, Jennifer Smith Love will direct all FBI investigations in Washington and Northern Virginia focused on violent, financial and organized crime; public corruption; civil rights violations; computer crimes; and drug-related offenses. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III yesterday announced the appointment of Mrs. Love, who had been chief of the FBI's communication-exploitation section, where she led FBI efforts to disrupt the ability of terrorists to communicate with one another." The Times notes, "In May, during hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley…questioned Mrs. Love's role" in the probe of Assistant US Attorney Jonathan Luna's death, "saying she and two other agents were 'the subject of allegations' that they had conducted an unauthorized search of another agent's laptop computer. … The inspector general's review found 'credible evidence' of wrongdoing to conclude the case should have been sent through the FBI's formal disciplinary process, rather than handled as a job-performance issue."

Former FBI Clerk Pleads Guilty To Leaking Hawaii Drug Probe Information. The AP (11/29) reports, "A former clerk-secretary on the FBI's organized crime-drug squad pleaded guilty today to getting information without authorization from a computer the bureau's Honolulu office. The FBI's investigation of Charmaine Moniz led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people." The AP adds, "The FBI has said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004. In court, Moniz said she got the information to warn her husband to stay away from certain people."

Witness Discusses Role In Shooting Of Two New York Detectives. The New York Times (11/29, Brick) writes, "In walked the first member of the Stapleton Crew, described by prosecutors as a band of outlaws who shot, robbed and pummeled their way to power among the gun and drug rings of Staten Island. … His real name is Jessie Jacobus, but he gave his street handle as J-Dot." He "was summoned to …federal court in Brooklyn, in violation of what he called his principles…to testify about the murder of two undercover detectives in March 2003." On March 10, 2003 Jacobus "said, he agreed to help rob a man during a staged gun sale. The man who arrived was an undercover detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, accompanied by Detective Rodney J. Andrews, 34, whom he identified as his brother-in-law."

Report On Drug Trafficking In Afghanistan Cites Government Involvement. The AP (11/29) reports a U.N. report released Tuesday "said Afghanistan's criminal underworld has compromised key government officials who protect drug traffickers, allowing a flourishing opium trade that will not be stamped out for a generation. The fight against opium production has so far achieved only limited success, mostly because of corruption, the joint report from the World Bank and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime said. The findings show a 'probability of high-level (government) involvement' in drugs, said Doris Buddenberg, the UNODC's Afghanistan representative and co-editor of the report." The AP also notes that opium cultivation in Afghanistan "rose 59 percent this year to 6,100 tons — enough to make 610 tons of heroin, nearly a third more than is consumed by the world's drug users, according to the report." The AP story was used by the New York Times, Washington Post, and Wall Street Journal.

ATF Ends Turf War With Massachusetts Authorities Over Blast Probe. The Boston Globe (11/29) reports, "Federal and state agencies announced today that they will cooperate in the investigation into last week's chemical plant explosion in Danvers." The Globe continues, "Town and state fire officials had questioned the jurisdiction of the US Chemical Safety Board, a federal agency that investigates such incidents. A turf war erupted Saturday when investigators from the board were denied access to the blast site. … In a joint statement this afternoon, federal and state officials and Chemical Safety Board investigators are on the site today of the plant, which was shared by CAI Inc. and Arnel Co. Inc. Investigators from the State Fire Marshal's office, the Massachusetts Department of Fire Services, the Danvers Fire Department, and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives are also involved. … 'All parties have agreed to cooperate in executing their different missions,' said the statement, issued after a meeting of all the agencies this morning. 'The CSB and ATF will coordinate to ensure the integrity of the ongoing civil and criminal investigations during the access to the site.'"

Man Who Impersonated ATF Agent Sentenced To 10 Years. The AP (11/29) reports, "A man who impersonated a federal agent during an armed robbery was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in prison on charges of carrying an unregistered sawed-off shotgun and a homemade firearm silencer." The AP continues, "Prosecutors say Garfield Royes, 37 already had three felony armed robbery convictions on his record when he posed as an agent from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives during another armed home invasion. … 'Today's sentencing of Mr. Royes validates that his only career is being an authentic career criminal,' said Vanessa L. McLemore, an ATF special agent." The AP adds, "Royes donned a tank-top adorned with the letters "ATF" in 2003 while robbing a group of suspected drug dealers, said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias. .. .He was arrested in June 2003 while attempting to flee from police officers trying to search his home, prosecutors said. Police later said they found a 12-gauge sawed-off shotgun, a homemade silencer and ammunition at his home - items that Royes is banned from owning."

Man Who Skipped Out On Iowa Drug Trial Returned From Mexico. The Sioux City (IA) Journal (11/29, Hytrek, Ebaugh) reports, "It was a day later than expected, but Ryan Mathison is back on U.S. soil. … Around 6 p.m. Tuesday, Mathison and his girlfriend Janelle Rodriguez were walked halfway across a bridge into El Paso, Texas, by Mexican officials, where they were met by U.S. Marshals, said El Paso Supervisory Deputy U.S. Marshal Jerry Payan. … 'They are sitting in the El Paso County Jail awaiting extradition to Iowa,' Payan said." The Journal continues, "The pair were expelled from Mexico as "undesirables," Payan said, a faster and simpler procedure than extradition, a formal process that requires requests for extradition warrants that can take months. In expulsion, the Mexican government basically says the person in custody is not welcome. The person in custody also agrees to leave. … 'This is basically they want to leave, and Mexico wants them to leave, and they escort them to the border,' said Duane Walhof, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals Service Sioux City bureau. … 'It could be two days to two weeks before they are returned to Sioux City, depending on how fast the paperwork is processed,' Payan said." The Journal adds, "On Monday, federal officials in Sioux City announced that Mathison and Rodriguez had been located and arrested in Juarez, Mexico, Sunday afternoon. At a press conference, authorities said they expected the two to be turned over to the Marshals Service by Monday afternoon at the U.S. border at El Paso, Texas, just across the Rio Grande River from Juarez. … Mexican officials did not meet with them as expected that day. … The Sunday arrest ended a two-week search for Mathison, who, while on pretrial release, skipped town during his trial on charges that he oversaw a drug ring that transported hundreds of pounds of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico to Sioux City. The jury later found him guilty. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years in prison, a sentence that could be enhanced because he discarded his electronic monitoring device and left town. A sentencing date has not been set."

IMMIGRATION:

Migrant Latinos Turning To "Mobile Consulates" For Assistance. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A1, Millman, 2.04M) reports that a "growing number of Mexicans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans and Dominicans…working in the remote reaches of Alaska, frequently illegally… turn for help to 'mobile consulates' -- collections of diplomats from their home countries who fly from barrio to barrio around the country." These so-called "Latino circuit riders" are "experts in immigration law and lobbying" that "press schools to offer bilingual instruction" and "counsel migrant workers on the intricacies of US immigration laws." These "mobile consulates" are "doing their best to help those who make it to the US to stay here," the Journal writes. Latin American nations, it notes, have "a big incentive to keep migrants working in the US," because "they send their families at home about $50 billion a year, according to the Inter-American Development Bank."

TAX:

Rangel Calls For Scrapping AMT. The Financial Times (11/29, Guerrera) reports incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel says the "new Democrat-controlled Congress should abolish an outdated tax that could condemn up to 23m Americans to pay a total $1,000bn next year, according to the incoming head of a powerful congressional committee." Rangel said "said scrapping the alternative minimum tax (AMT) was a top priority." But his position, "presented at a meeting with New York business leaders on Tuesday, is more radical than other senior Democrats, including the incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who have talked about extending a one-year relief from AMT for middle-income taxpayers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Plan To Scrutinize Unprecedented Pentagon Spending Request. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Barnes, Spiegel, 850K) reports, "The Pentagon is preparing an emergency spending proposal that could be larger and broader than any since the Sept. 11 attacks, covering not only the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan but extending to other military operations connected to the Bush administration's war on terrorism." According to the Times, the Pentagon will request $127 billion to $150 billion in new spending next year which "may push the Defense Department into a conflict with Democrats" when they take control of Congress." The Times notes the request "stands to be larger in part because of new rules laid out in an Oct. 25 memo from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Rather than strictly limit spending to Iraq and Afghanistan costs, the memo said the services could include costs associated with military operations that are part of the larger war on terrorism. … Democratic congressional aides said the new majority on Capitol Hill was likely to push back against a request that exceeded $100 billion."

US Wearing Out $2 Billion Worth Of Equipment Every Month. USA Today (11/29, 1A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "About $2 billion worth of Army and Marine Corps equipment — from rifles to tanks — is wearing out or being destroyed every month in Iraq and Afghanistan, military leaders and outside experts say. That's equal to about a quarter of the $8 billion per month in military war costs. The wear and tear may lead to future equipment shortages and cutbacks in more advanced weapons, such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter being…says William Cohen, secretary of Defense from 1997 to 2001. … The Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to re-equip and restore units returning from Iraq, says Leon Panetta, the former Clinton White House chief of staff and member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group." USA Today notes that according to the GAO the Army and Marines "have reported using about 40% of their ground combat equipment in Iraq and Afghanistan. … A separate GAO report this month urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to investigate the Pentagon's planning for repair, maintenance and replacement of war equipment."

Bush Aides Feel Under Siege As Hearings Approach. The White House Bulletin/US News (11/28) reports, "With the new incoming Democratic House and Senate chairs of key policy committees pledging a wave of oversight hearings, White House officials say they are starting to feel under pressure as they prepare to testify starting as early as January." One key aide said, "Many of us feel under siege." The Bulletin adds aides "working in the issue areas of education, terrorism, national security and defense are especially concerned about the hearings Democrats are promising to hold." Two former aides tell the Bulletin and US News "that they are advising former colleagues to prepare to testify on their actions over the past five years." "We don't know for sure who will be going up to testify but everybody in the top offices should be prepared for an invitation," said one of the former Bush advisors.

Medicare Drug Program $13 Billion Under Budget. The Washington Times/AP (11/29) reports the Medicare prescription drug benefit "has cost nearly $13 billion less than expected this year -- a rare federal program coming in under budget -- and projections show it will cost about $200 billion less in its first decade than initially estimated." President Bush "credits competition among the dozens of private insurance companies administering the program for the cost coming in at $30 billion in 2006, about 30 percent below the projected $43 billion." But figures "provided to the Associated Press by the agency that oversees the benefit for the elderly and disabled show two other factors: lower-than-expected enrollment and drug prices that went up less than expected before the benefit kicked in."

Bush And Webb Reportedly Exchanged Heated Words At White House Reception. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Shear, 690K), in a front-page profile of Sen.-elect James Webb titled, "In Following His Own Script, Webb May Test Senate's Limits," reports that at a White House reception Webb "tried to avoid President Bush" and "declined to stand in a presidential receiving line or to have his picture taken with" Bush. According to the Post, Bush "found" Webb and asked him "How's your boy?" referring to Webb's son Jimmy who is serving with the Marines in Iraq. Webb answered, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." To which Bush responded "That's not what I asked you…How's your boy?" The Post reports Webb shot back "coldly": "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President." The Hill (11/29, Heil) reports Webb "confessed that he was so angered by this that he was tempted to slug" Bush.

Webb Expected To Operate Independently Of Other Senate Democrats. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Shear, 690K) reports Webb "was narrowly elected to the U.S. Senate this month with a brash, unpolished style that helped win over independent voters. .. If the exchange with Bush two weeks ago is any indication, Webb won't be a wallflower, especially when it comes to the war in Iraq. And he won't stick to a script drafted by top Democrats. 'I'm not particularly interested in having a picture of me and George W. Bush on my wall,' Webb said in an interview yesterday in which he confirmed the exchange between him and Bush. 'No offense to the institution of the presidency, and I'm certainly looking forward to working with him and his administration. [But] leaders do some symbolic things to try to convey who they are and what the message is.'"

Rice Sets Record For Time Without Deputy. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "will break the modern indoor record for being without a deputy secretary of state." Kamen notes that "even if Rice named someone now, there wouldn't be confirmation until early next year, so the record will be hers."

Schwab Says Bush Will Pursue Aggressive Trade Agenda. The AP (11/29, Crutsinger) reports US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said "the president still hopes to achieve bipartisan support for an aggressive trade liberalization agenda in the next Congress even with Democrats in control." Schwab said the Administration would "continue to push for the conclusion of global trade talks known as the Doha Round before negotiating authority expires on June 30. She said the administration also hopes to wrap up negotiations by early next year on free trade deals with South Korea and Malaysia and said that talks should be concluded soon with Panama." Speaking to the US Chamber of Commerce, Schwab "warned against any move to erect protectionist barriers against the flow of goods into the country, something that critics say are needed in the face of record-high trade deficits they contend are costing American jobs."

Paulson Warns Against Protectionist Sentiment. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Solomon, 2.04M) reports in a London speech to the Confederation of British Industry and in remarks to reporters, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "warned that protectionist sentiment is rising all over the world, partly because 'the benefits of trade are not spread evenly in any part of the world.' But he said it would be 'morally wrong' to give in to 'protectionist elements.'" Paulson's remarks "echo some of the themes that have been sounded by Democratic Party critics of globalization in the U.S., and like-minded people in other countries." In contrast with "those who would seek to slow the pace of globalization and prevent the completion of the current Doha round of world trade talks, Mr. Paulson argued that it is essential that globalization continue in order to assure future prosperity of developed and developing countries."

GAO Finds CIS Lost 111,000 Files. The Washington Post (11/29, A21, Hsu, 690K) reports senators released a Government Accountability Office report yesterday that found US Citizenship and Immigration Services has lost track of 111,000 alien files, or A-files, "in 14 of the agency's busiest district offices and processed as many as 30,000 citizenship applications last year without the necessary files." The GAO conducted a review "at the request of Sens. Charles E. Grassley and Susan Collins after US authorities granted citizenship in 2002 to a man without checking his primary file. The file, which was lost, indicated ties to the militant Islamic group Hezbollah." A CIS "official said workers probably checked most of the files but failed to make note of it. … Steven J. Pecinovsky, an agency liaison to the GAO, said workers are not required to note that they have checked A-files but will be in the future."

In an article appearing on more than 40 news websites, the AP (11/28) reported, "The missing files also cause delays for immigrants with no security issues from becoming U.S. citizens, the senators said. The senators said the agency agreed with the GAO to require workers to record whether an A-file was used to process a naturalization application and to use an automated file tracking system."

Pelosi Passes Over Hastings For Intelligence Chair. The AP (11/29, Shrader) reports that in a decision "that could roil Democratic unity in the new House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi passed over Rep. Alcee Hastings Tuesday for the chairmanship of the Intelligence Committee." Hastings, currently "the No. 2 Democrat on the panel, had been aggressively making a case for the top position, supported by members of the Congressional Black Caucus." But his "critics pointed out that he had been impeached when he was a federal judge and said naming him to such a sensitive post would be a mistake just as the Democrats take over House control pledging reforms."

The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Pelosi "gave no indication of who would get the post, but aides indicated that a decision could follow quickly this week in a bid to resolve the issue, which has been used by her critics to try to isolate the California Democrat and incoming House speaker." The "criticism of her leadership is striking given that no other speaker before her has had the same length of service on the intelligence panel as Ms. Pelosi. As speaker, she will have the power to single-handedly appoint the chair and members for the new Congress, but her discretion has been challenged by allies of fellow Californian, Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's ranking Democrat, who has campaigned for the post." If Pelosi "holds firm, as expected, and doesn't name Ms. Harman to the post, she has several options. One is to elevate Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D., Texas), a Vietnam veteran and former member of the U.S. Border Patrol before coming to Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Miller, 850K) reports Pelosi's "decision leaves a hole in the Democratic leadership ranks. The anticipated elevation of Hastings as chairman and the expected removal of Harman from the panel were seen as efforts to settle a debt with the Congressional Black Caucus, to which Hastings belongs: Another caucus member had been bumped from the panel in 2001 when Harman returned to Congress — and regained her seniority on the committee — after an unsuccessful run for governor of California." Democratic aides "indicated that Pelosi would probably tap someone not on the committee to become its chairman."

The New York Times (11/29, Mazzetti, Zernike, 1.16M) reports members of Pelosi's staff "had said she favored Mr. Hastings. But his position was weakened because he was impeached and removed as a federal judge in 1989 in connection with a bribery case. He was subsequently acquitted in the criminal case." For Pelosi, "who had hammered the Republicans for ethical lapses in the fall campaigns, the decision to pass over Mr. Hastings was a sign that she did not relish another battle after the Democratic caucus rejected her choice for majority leader, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania. On the other hand, her decision risked alienating the influential Congressional Black Caucus, which had strongly backed Mr. Hastings."

The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Weisman, Slevin, 690K) reports in a front page story, "The decisions came despite lobbying by conservative Democrats on Harman's behalf and a full-throttled campaign by Hastings to overcome the stigma of the 1988 impeachment that drove him from his federal judgeship." Instead of "picking Harman or Hastings, Pelosi will look for a compromise candidate, probably Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), but possibly Rep. Norman D. Dicks (Wash.), a hawkish member of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, or Rep. Sanford Bishop (Ga.), a conservative African American with experience on the intelligence committee." Hastings "took a shot at conservatives and media voices who have come out strongly against his appointment. 'Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet,' he wrote."

The Washington Times (11/29, Hurt, 88K) reports Pelosi "received intense criticism after suggestions that she would elevate Mr. Hastings to the top spot. Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argued that the former federal judge would be a poor choice for chairman because he was charged in 1981 with accepting a $150,000 bribe. A jury acquitted Mr. Hastings after a key witness refused to testify." Still, "a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives later impeached Mr. Hastings on a 413-3 vote with support from Mrs. Pelosi and others in Congress who now support Mr. Hastings. The Democrat-led Senate convicted Mr. Hastings and he was removed from office."

Capuano Describes Democrats' Transition To Majority As "Disjointed." The Hill (11/29, Bolton) reports Rep. Michael Capuano, "heading the day-to-day transition of House Democrats from minority to majority party," says the "process has become 'disjointed' and that leaders need to do a better job communicating with each other." Capuano "also said the inevitable messiness of a new party taking over the House is just part of the democratic process. … 'A lot of people have their hands in it right now but the coordination isn't where I would like it to be." The Hill continues, "Capuano said that there has been confusion over the importance of seniority. He said there is a perception that seniority is virtually the sole factor in determining committee leadership and makeup, adding that has not been true for years."

Labor, House Democrat Leaders Meet To Discuss Agenda. The Hill (11/29, Bolton) reports, "Labor union representatives, liberal leaders, and aides to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) met yesterday to begin work on a broad lobbying push to promote Pelosi's 100-legislative-hour agenda with a campaign expected to mimic the one that helped defeat President Bush's proposed reforms to Social Security." The meeting is "a signal that interest groups allied with Democrats are going on the offensive, transitioning from the defensive crouch they have held for much of Bush's time in office." The "purpose of the gathering was to ensure that party allies are unified during the first crucial weeks of the Democratic majority and that the agenda Democrats campaigned on this fall does not become entangled by interest-group squabbles and competition." Party strategists "are speculating that they will have a brief window of legislative productivity before a curtain of partisanship falls across town as Republicans and Democrats gear up for the 2008 presidential election." The "first priority of the lobbying plan is to pass a minimum-wage increase. The campaign will also focus on allowing the government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, repealing tax benefits for oil companies, and cutting the interest rate for student loans." The "strategic advantage of the 100-hour agenda is that it is made up of proposals that are broadly popular, thereby allowing the Democrats' allies to achieve consensus and work together from the start of next year. After that agenda is passed, groups are likely to go off in their own directions and clash over competing priorities."

Liberal Activists Moderate Their Influence Over Congressional Democrats. The Hill (11/29, Schor) reports, "After a long battle with conservatives on social issues and judicial nominations, Democratic-aligned interest groups are hailing the coming congressional changeover and weighing exactly how and when to exert their influence. … NARAL has aimed its recent efforts less at preserving women's right to an abortion than at making the procedure, as former President Clinton first put it, 'safe, legal and rare.' One of the family-planning packages strongly backed by NARAL and Planned Parenthood boasts as its chief sponsor new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who describes himself as pro-life." The Hill adds that on gay-rights issues, Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese "took a respectful view of the long to-do list facing his Democratic allies. 'One of the most important things we can do is be sensitive to the fact that the new leadership in this Congress…have a huge responsibility to speak to the issues the American people couldn't have been clearer about in putting them there: the war in Iraq and corruption in government."

Reid Sets Agenda For Senate's Next Session. The AP (11/29, Pickler) reports Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry Reid said "he's doing away with the 'do-nothing Congress' that Democrats campaigned against and plans to keep senators working long hours — focusing first on ethics, the minimum wage and stem cell research." Reid said he would "tackle those priorities after cleaning up the 'financial mess' the outgoing Republican Congress is leaving behind, a reference to nine long-overdue spending bills covering 13 Cabinet departments for the budget year that began Oct. 1." The "must-pass legislation totals more than $460 billion and could divert time from other items on the Democratic agenda."

McConnell Pledges Cooperation On Minimum Wage, Ethics Reform. The Washington Post (11/29, A21, Pianin, 690K) reports, "Sounding a conciliatory note, the new Senate Republican leader vowed yesterday to work with Democrats to pass a minimum-wage increase and a strong ethics reform package shortly after the new Democratic-controlled Congress begins work next year." Senate Minority Leader-elect Mitch McConnell (Ky.) "described as 'easy stuff' much of the Democrats' opening agenda, including a proposal to boost the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour and a congressional ethics package that would ban gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, as well as impose new controls on the budget deficit. These issues, however, have not proved to be easy before." McConnell said he "is urging bolder action. He challenged House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to push for a long-term solution to financing the Social Security system and for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws." In a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters, McConnell said, "One thing I hope we can do, now that we have the election out of the way, is see if we can quit kicking the can down the road on a number of significant issues. Left over from last year, I would put immigration at the top of the list. But I also share the view...that this would be the perfect time to tackle Social Security."

Fiscal Conservatives Prepare Strategy. The Washington Post (11/29, A2, Murray, 690K) in its "Political Dispatch" column reports, "In Congress, the minority life is mostly talk and little action, and yet for" conservative GOP lawmakers and "advocates of minimal spending and low taxes, that may not turn out to be so bad. It's easier to promote fiscal discipline in theory than to practice it as a party leader or committee chairman." One "chief target of the budget hawks is a group of Democratic House freshmen who won seats in conservative districts, including the Florida seat that was held by disgraced Rep. Mark Foley, and Tom DeLay's former seat in Texas. Republicans call these 'rented seats' and hope to win them back in 2008." When the GOP was in the minority in the 1980s they "sought to force Democrats to vote against small spending reductions, often fractions of a percent." And as longtime GOP aide Stuart Roy "pointed out, these little-noticed maneuvers helped Republicans build a case that Democrats' spending habits had spiraled out of control." And on taxes "fiscal conservatives will act as chief defenders of the numerous temporary tax cuts that Republicans have passed since President Bush took office." The Post notes, "The first showdown will come over the alternative minimum tax, which Democrats have vowed to address early in their tenure."

GOP Adjusting To Minority Status. The Hill (11/29, O'Connor) reports, "The Republican retreat from ornate leadership chambers and spacious committee offices has been a harsh awakening for members of the outgoing majority, but that is just one of the many difficult realities GOP members and staff must accept about life in the minority. Still stinging from their midterm defeat, leaders in the House must rewrite the party's internal rules to adapt to their diminished status and reorganize the Steering Committee to decide who will serve on each committee and who will be the ranking Republican before slinking off to the offices allocated to them."

Hensarling, Tiahrt Compete For Study Committee Post. The Hill (11/29, O'Connor) reports that a "major fight is brewing among conservatives in the House to elect the next chairman of the Republican Study Committee." Reps. Jeb Hensarling and Todd Tiahrt "have been calling members…to ask for their support in the election next Wednesday. … Many staffers consider Tiahrt, an appropriator, as the leadership-backed candidate who would mute the influence of conservative agitators as Republicans try to unite in the minority."

Senators Press For More Social Security Administration Funding. The Washington Post's (11/29, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "54 senators" -- 42 Democrats and 12 Republicans -- "have sent an appeal to the Senate leadership asking that the Social Security Administration receive adequate funding to avert workplace disruptions." The senators "called for a fiscal 2007 appropriation that would add $401 million to the agency's administrative account. Without the money, Social Security would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices for 10 days next year, the senators said." The Post adds that several agencies with the exception of DoD and DHS are bracing for possible cuts in funding as Congress has not yet passed a host of fiscal 2007 spending bills, and adds the "Senate's bill for Social Security would provide $9.1 billion for the agency's administrative expenses, $401 million less than the president requested and $54 million below what was appropriated in fiscal 2006. The House bill would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking."

Controversial State Department Official Receives Award For Service. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced this week that the recipient of this year's Edward R. Murrow Award for Excellence in Public Diplomacy is "none other than Alberto Fernandez, head of public diplomacy for the Mideast. Fernandez, who speaks Arabic fluently, is best known in this country for having told al-Jazeera television back in October that Washington had been arrogant and stupid in Iraq."

USAF Declines Food Donation From Nuns Who Damaged Silo Fence. The Washington Times (11/29, Richardson, 88K) reports, "Three nuns were thwarted yesterday in their effort to pay their debt to society with food instead of cash when officials at two Colorado Air Force bases refused to accept their donations. The Dominican sisters -- Carol Gilbert, Jackie Hudson and Ardeth Platte -- had collected thousands of cans of food in an effort to pay the military $3,082 in restitution for cutting through a chain-link fence at a Colorado missile silo in 2002. … But airmen at Buckley Air Force Base here turned away two pickup trucks loaded with thousands of cans of food yesterday, telling volunteer drivers that the facility had just received a large donation of food and had nowhere to store the nuns' delivery."

Policeman's Death Underscores Danger Caused By Presidential Motorcade. McClatchy (11/29, Thomma) reports presidential motorcades "can be dangerous. The most recent reminder: the death this week of a Honolulu motorcycle officer who was injured while escorting President Bush during a brief stop en route home from Asia. Sure, the president is safe in his limousine - so safe that no one can remember a commander in chief buckling his seat belt. But the rest of the entourage is at risk of accidents and injuries, and they happen more often than most people realize." McClatchy notes Steve Favela "suffered fatal injuries when he and two other officers crashed as the motorcade sped across Hickam Air Force Base on rain-slicked pavement."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy Remains At Risk From Inflation, Housing Slump. The AP (11/29, Aversa) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said Tuesday that risks from inflation or a worse-than-expected housing slump could further complicate things for an economy that already is in slowdown mode." Speaking to the National Italian American Foundation in New York,

DOJ_NMG_0099160

Bernanke said, "The deceleration in economic activity currently under way appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned." He added that the "slowdown in overall activity mostly reflects the housing slump, he said. As the economy cools, inflation also should continue to gradually ease over the next year or so, the Fed chief added." Overall inflation "has showed signs of improving in recent months as once surging energy prices have calmed down. However, 'core' prices - which exclude energy and food and are closely watched by the Fed - still remain 'uncomfortably high,' Bernanke said."

ABC World News (11/28, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In economic news, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke says he expects the economy to enjoy moderate growth next year despite a slowdown in the housing market but he warned that inflation is still a danger. Analysts said they heard nothing that would signal nothing if the Fed would cut interest rates soon as some on Wall Street would hope."

USA Today (11/29, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports Bernanke said "the economy is growing at a 'solid pace' outside of housing and manufacturing, but a key inflation measure remains 'uncomfortably high.'" Bernanke said "it would be 'especially troublesome' if price pressures don't moderate, as the Fed has forecast." Economists "interpreted Bernanke's comments as a sign the central bank is not likely to cut interest rates anytime soon and could be forced to raise them in coming months to keep price pressures under control."

The Wall Street Journal (11/29, lp, Gerena-Morales, Corkery, 2.04M) reports that in a "contrast with the widely held view on Wall Street that slower economic growth will lead to interest-rate cuts, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered an upbeat assessment of the nation's economy, warning that tight labor markets could put more pressure on wages and prices." Many investors "point to declining housing construction, mixed news on holiday sales and a tame reading on inflation as indications that the economy is weakening, inflation risks are fading and that the next move by the Fed will be to cut interest rates, perhaps as soon as next spring. However, Mr. Bernanke's hawkish message suggests rate cuts are unlikely in the months to come." But "stock and bond markets barely reacted -- underscoring how, in recent months, Fed officials and investors increasingly have seemed to be looking at two different economies."

The Washington Post (11/29, D2, Henderson, 690K) gives the story a positive spin with the headline, "Fed Chief Optimistic Of Soft Landing; With Eye on Inflation and Jobs, Bernanke Remains Upbeat." The Post reports "the nation's central bank is growing more confident that the U.S. economy will slow gradually in a way that should cause inflation to decline without tipping the nation into a recession, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday."

The Financial Times (11/29) reports Bernanke "appeared to head off talk of imminent US interest rate cuts by warning that inflation remained 'uncomfortably high.'" Bernanke's speech "follows days of jitters in financial markets, with investors betting that US economic weakness would force the Fed to cut interest rates next year, undermining the dollar." Bernanke's "message was reinforced by Hank Paulson, US Treasury Secretary, who told reporters in London the US economy was making a 'successful transition' to a more sustainable rate of growth, and by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which said the outlook for the world economy remained bright."

Stock Markets Rise Slightly Despite Bernanke's Inflation Worries. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Stocks edged higher despite troubling comments about interest rates from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke." The gains "erased little of Monday's steep market drop, which included a 158.46-point decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. After sliding further in early trading, the blue-chip average ended the day up 14.74 points, or 0.1%, at 12136.45, 13.2% higher for the year." The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "also opened the session lower but climbed 4.82 points for the day to end at 1386.72, up 11.1% for the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.69 points to 2412.61, up 9.4% for the year. Both were up 0.3% for the day."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today modest gains after yesterday's stock sell off. The Dow was up almost 15 points [to close at 12,136.45]. NASDAQ was up almost 7 points [to close at 2,412.61]."

Previously-Owned Home Sales Pick Up, But Prices Fall. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Gerena-Morales, Corkery, 2.04M) reports new data 'offered a mixed picture of the housing sector's condition as home sales picked up, but prices fell. Meanwhile, the first look at business investment in the fourth quarter revealed a sharp pullback, indicating that business spending won't lend as much support to economic growth as some analysts had been expecting." The National Association of Realtors "reported that previously owned home sales rose 0.5% from the previous month to a seasonably adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million units, which is up from an upwardly revised September sales pace of 6.21 million." It was the "first monthly rise in sales that the trade group has reported in eight months. But the national median home price plummeted 3.5% to $221,000 from a year ago -- the largest year-over-year price drop since the trade group began keeping records in 1968, and 'it's probably the largest price drop since World War II,'' said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 5, 0:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The housing market…is in the midst of a painful kind of correction. Sales of existing homes posted a small increase, half a percentage point, last month after seven straight months of declines. But home prices fell by a record amount, down 3.5% from a year ago. It is the biggest year-over-year price decline ever. It is also the third month in a row that prices have dropped. That's the longest stretch of price declines on record in US history. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned today that a slump in the housing market that is more severe and widespread than the experts have been predicting is indeed possible but he said, as of now, he's still on the lookout for inflation pressures and he thinks the economy will grow at a moderate pace."

The Washington Post (11/29, D1, Brubaker, 690K) reports US existing home prices "dropped a record 3.5 percent last month, compared with the same month a year earlier, while the total number of residences sold fell 11.5 percent compared with October 2005, according to an industry report released yesterday." The "largest drop in sales prices -- 7 percent, or double the national average -- came in the South, which includes the Washington area."

USA Today (11/29, Knox, 2.27M) reports, "Prices of existing homes — which fell a record 3.5% last month — will likely drop further through year's end, delivering the bitter medicine needed to restore the health of the housing market, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday." Today, "the Commerce Department will release October sales figures for new homes. Those figures are expected to show more weakness."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Sanchez, 850K) reports, "In California, October results were the opposite, with sales, excluding condominiums, slipping 0.3% from the previous month and the median sales price gaining 2% from October 2005 to $548,680, according to the California Assn. of Realtors." The "modest rebound in sales may indicate that the nationwide housing slow down might be bottoming out — but any noticeable relief for sellers probably won't come until next year, according to some housing observers." NAR economist David Lereah said in a statement, "After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007." The Times adds, "But other economists say a turnaround is still far away, with many signs pointing to a buyer's market for some time to come. For example, the inventory of unsold homes, increased 1.9% in October to 3.85 million existing homes."

Dollar Falls To 20-Month Low Versus Euro. The Washington Post (11/29, D1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) reports the US dollar "fell to a 20-month low against the euro Tuesday, the latest development in a year-long currency readjustment that could make some imported goods more expensive, but could also help American workers by boosting exports." Traders are "not entirely sure why the currency is falling, but several pointed Tuesday to signs of economic weakness in the United States and strength in Europe. That is fueling expectations that interest rates will rise in Europe relative to the United States, prompting investors to move assets out of dollars." Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. "reacted to the decline by speaking Tuesday of his support for a 'strong dollar.'" But as he "said the words, though, Paulson was preparing for a trip to China, during which he plans to press officials there to raise the value of China's currency, and thus lower the value of the dollar."

WSJournal Claims Uncertainty Over Democratic Congress Behind Dollar's Fall. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The dollar's recent weakness against the euro and other currencies has brought out the usual suspects to blame the usual suspects. That is, the crowd that has long believed the greenback needs to be devalued because of the large U.S. trade deficit is declaring that day has finally arrived. The fact that the dollar has held up well for years despite the trade deficit doesn't seem to matter to this conventional wisdom." The Journal adds, "Our view is simpler: When U.S. economic policies look like they might take a turn for the worse, dollar-denominated assets lose some of their allure. So, for example, when the new Democratic majority in Congress talks about raising taxes on capital gains and dividends, investors in U.S. financial and corporate assets get the jitters. And when U.S. monetary policy accommodates more inflation, investors also look for other places to put their marginal cash."

NRSC Letter Acknowledges Debt. The AP (11/28, Kuhnhenn) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee, "which lagged behind other national party committees in fundraising the past two years, emerged from the Nov. 7 election in debt and is soliciting donations to get out of the red." In an "urgent appeal to donors this week, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, "the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, beseeched contributors to 'help us retire our debt.'" Dole said, "If we let this debt linger, it will cripple our efforts to recruit great candidates for the next election and begin our drive to win the one additional seat we need to regain the Senate majority." The AP adds that as of "Oct. 18, the date of the last financial reports to the commission, the NRSC had $8.9 million of cash on hand. At that point in the two-year election cycle, it had raised $77.9 million and spent $70 million."

Wulsin Concedes To Schmidt In Ohio's 2nd CD. The AP (11/29) reports, "Three weeks after Election Day, Democrat Victoria Wulsin conceded to Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt on Tuesday but suggested that she might run again." Wulsin "conceded just before Clermont County reported final unofficial results that showed Schmidt with an overall total of 120,112 votes, or 50.5 percent, to 117,595 votes, or 49.5 percent for Wulsin."

Undervotes Could Determine Outcome In Florida's 13th CD. The Washington Post (11/29, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports "almost since the time the votes were tallied" in Sarasota "on election night, the race for Florida's 13th Congressional District has been surrounded by a contentious mystery: Why were there no votes for Congress recorded from more than 18,000 people who chose candidates in other races?" The answer is "central not only to the outcome of the election, which for now has been won by Republican Vern Buchanan by a mere 369 votes and is in litigation, but also to the ongoing debates over whether the electronic voting systems in use nationwide can yield reliable tallies and recounts." There are "three theories, and lots of political and legal posturing. Maybe, as scores of voters have claimed, there were glitches with the touch-screen systems and they dropped votes. Or maybe voters overlooked the congressional race simply because of a confusing ballot design. Or maybe, as some say, an astoundingly high number of Sarasota County residents decided to forgo voting in the high-profile race."

Dean's 2004 Webmaster Seeking Position With McCain Campaign. The Hill (11/29, Kaplan) reports, "Several sources said that Nicco Mele, the CEO of EchoDitto, an internet strategy firm, and Howard Dean's webmaster when Dean was running for president in the 2004 cycle, has let it be known that he wants to work for Sen. John McCain if he runs for president."

Hagel 2008 Bid Seen As More Realistic After GOP's Midterm Losses. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (11/29, A23) writes, "A month ago the idea that Sen. Chuck Hagel would make a serious run for the Republican presidential nomination would have been a non-starter. … It's a measure of the step change brought about by the Nov. 7 elections that Hagel is now seriously exploring a GOP presidential bid." Hagel "says he will make a formal decision in the next two months on whether to run." Ignatius contends that, "What would make a Hagel candidacy interesting is that he can claim to have been right about Iraq and other key issues earlier than almost any national politician, Republican or Democratic. … It strains credulity to imagine that a GOP controlled by Bush and Karl Rove could learn to love Hagel, but, as the Nebraskan says, this is a time of 'transformational politics.'"

Morris Says Women Want Democratic Presidential Candidate. In his column in The Hill (11/29), Dick Morris says, "What women want is a woman president. And their voting preferences are showing how strongly they feel." According to "the Gallup Poll of November 9-12, both Democratic and Republican women disproportionately support their party's potential female candidates. While it has not been unusual to see polls showing a bias by female voters in favor of women who run on the Democratic Party line, most of these surveys have failed to distinguish whether it is party or gender that is attracting female voters. And, until recently, Republican women have not shown a preference for a female candidate." But the Gallup Poll "tested Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a Democratic primary field and Condoleezza Rice in a Republican match-up. Among both sexes, Hillary ran first in her party with 31 percent of the vote, followed by newly hyped Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) at 19 percent, John Edwards, likely benefiting from his wife's best-selling book, at 10 percent, Al Gore at 9 percent and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), probably suffering from his foot-in-mouth disease, back at 7 percent." On the Republican side, Rudy Giuliani "led with 28 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) at 26 percent, Rice at 13 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) at 7 percent, outgoing Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney at 5 percent and soon-to-be-former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) at 4 percent." But Clinton "was favored by 38 percent of the women in the Gallup Poll's Democratic Primary match-up but got only 23 percent of the men. On the Republican side, Rice won 18 percent of the women and only 8 percent of the men. Such a dramatic gender gap, on each side of the partisan divide, illustrates the power of a woman candidate, from either party, running for president."

Organizer Of Anti-Hillary PAC Is Also Giuliani Contributor. The New York Times (11/29, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports campaign finance reports show a "leading organizer of a political action committee created to derail Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects is also a major contributor to Rudolph W. Giuliani." The organizer, Richard Collins, "a principal figure behind the group Stop Her Now, has given $10,000 to Mr. Giuliani's political action committee Solutions America over the last two years, according to campaign finance disclosure documents." On a Website "posted Monday, the Stop Her Now group says that its goals include attempting 'to shed light on the real Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America.'" While the Giuliani camp "has no direct connection to Stop Her Now, some Democrats argued yesterday that Mr. Giuliani — who seems poised for a possible presidential run of his own — should disavow the personal nature of the criticisms that the group is leveling at Mrs. Clinton." Stop Her Now "is among the newest of the so-called 527 advocacy groups whose prominence has grown in recent years." Collins, "a wealthy Texas businessman, funneled $80,000 into the group's coffers in the last few months, making him the group's single largest donor in the third quarter of 2006, according to the disclosure documents."

Christian Coalition's Designated President Resigns. The Washington Post (11/29, A13, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "For the second time in little more than a year, the Christian Coalition of America named a new leader and then removed him before he ever fully took the reins of the conservative political advocacy group. The Rev. Joel Hunter, pastor of a nondenominational megachurch in Longwood, Fla., said he resigned as the coalition's incoming president because its board of directors disagreed with his plan to broaden the organization's agenda." Hunter "wanted to take on such issues as poverty, global warming and HIV/AIDS."

Bush Supports Adding More Countries To Visa-Waiver Program. USA Today (11/29, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Tuesday that he wants more countries in a program that allows foreigners to stay in the USA without visas, despite criticism that the move could open the door to terrorists. 'We want people to come to our country,' Bush said in Tallinn, Estonia, one of several European countries that have asked to be included in the visa-waiver program, in which 27 foreign countries now participate. 'It's in our nation's interest that people be able to come and visit.'" Bush "said his administration aims to add more countries to the program, created to facilitate tourism and business travel 15 years before the 9/11 attacks increased fears of terrorism. He pledged to ensure that 'those that want to continue to kill Americans aren't able to exploit the system.'" The Washington Post/AP (11/29, A9) notes "officials did not say which other countries the administration might try adding to the program. Countries from Central and Eastern Europe have expressed interest in entering the program, which lets travelers enter the United States with only a passport."

The Washington Times (11/29, Dinan, 88K) reports "the proposed expansion would run athwart concerns that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) cannot keep up with the 27 countries already approved, as the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative branch, found in a July report. 'DHS cannot effectively monitor the law enforcement and security risks posed by visa waiver countries on a consistent, ongoing basis because it has not provided [the Office of International Enforcement] with adequate staffing and resources,' GAO investigators concluded, adding they also found 'weaknesses' in how DHS talks with overseas posts working on visa issues."

Bush Praises Estonia's Flat Tax. The AP (11/29, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush says the United States should have a simpler tax system. Apparently he has found one he likes -- Estonia's. In a brief stop in the Baltic nation on Tuesday, Bush managed to tout Estonia's flat income tax three times. 'They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple,' Bush said in Tallinn after getting a look at how Estonian citizens can file their taxes online." The AP adds, "In a toast about an hour later to Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, Bush said, 'I am amazed to be in a country that has been able to effect a flat tax in such a positive way.'" And "before fielding reporters' questions with Ilves, Bush again praised Estonia's approach to taxation. 'I appreciate the fact that you got a flat tax, you got a tax system that's transparent and simple,' he said."

Rice To Meet With Abbas In Push To Restart Talks. The AP (11/29, Daraghmeh) reports Secretary Rice "put Washington's heft behind new Mideast peace overtures on Tuesday, scheduling an unexpected meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas this week." The meeting was announced a day after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called on the Palestinians to return to peace talk, and Rice's visit "was seen as a further push to use the momentum to start new peace talks." Rice will meet Abbas Thursday in the West Bank town of Jericho, and Assistant Secretary McCormack "raised the possibility that she would also meet with an Israeli official."

Jordan's Abdullah Expected To Push For Peace Talks In Meetings With Bush. In a report from Amman previewing President Bush's visit, NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 2, 2:20, Engel, 9.87M) noted, "There are many competing agendas here in Jordan tonight. King Abdullah has said he wants the revival of the Israeli-Palestinian process to be the top agenda of his meeting with President Bush. … Also Lebanon's prime minister has said he wants his conflict with Israel and internal power struggles with Hezbollah also to be part of this agenda." However, NBC says "the problem is President Bush will be on the ground here for about less than 24 hours." Similarly, the AP (11/29, Halaby) reports King Abdullah "made clear Tuesday he will press for a renewed effort to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict when he meets with President Bush." In a speech to parliament, King Abdullah "described the Israeli-Palestinian dispute as the 'core' issue in the Middle East and indicated that in his talks with Bush, he would underline the need for the United States to push for peace."

Proposed UNSC Iran Resolution Drops Mention Of Sanctions. The New York Times (11/29, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) reports the six world powers "seeking to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions are circulating a significantly weakened draft" for a UNSC resolution against Tehran's nuclear program, "in a bid to keep their fragile coalition from falling apart." The new text under consideration has "dropped all mention of sanctions against Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr," according to European diplomats. Although the US "initially proposed including Bushehr on the list of programs to single out," Russia, which has been helping to build the plant, "balked." Meanwhile, the Times says that "complicating the matter is the steady drumbeat in Washington, from inside and outside the Bush administration, calling on President Bush to initiate talks with Iran over the worsening violence in Iraq."

Iranian Opposition Group Hindered By US Terrorist Label. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A1, Higgins, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Early this summer, as Washington fretted about Iran's nuclear program, supporters of Mujahedin-e Khalq, an Iranian opposition group, held a rally in an auditorium two blocks from the White House. Prominent members of Congress addressed the crowd, as did the State Department's recently retired ambassador-at-large for war crimes." Mujahedin-e Khalq, known as MEK, is Iran's largest exile opposition group and, "say its supporters, the best hope of bringing democracy to Iran." But with the US armed forces "bogged down in Iraq and America's military options against neighboring Iran severely limited, the MEK and its fans are lobbying hard to present the group as an ally that can help curb Tehran's growing influence." Its supporters "include lawmakers and conservative foreign-policy analysts," but "most US officials scoff at forming any alliance with the MEK and dispute its claims of having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization." Meanwhile, a senior White House official says the Bush administration continues to view the MEK as a terrorist organization and "not an advocate for democracy or human rights" in Iran.

US, North Korean Officials Meet For Second Day Of Talks. The AP (11/29, Ang) reports nuclear negotiators from the US, North Korea and China "met for a second day Wednesday, a US Embassy spokeswoman said, amid a diplomatic push to resume six-nation talks on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill met with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Chinese Vice Foreign Minister

Wu Dawai in Beijinge for a second round of talks, according to Susan Stevenson, a spokeswoman for the US Embassy in Beijing. However, she "did not have details of the discussions or whether Hill met with Wu and Kim together or separately." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the main goal of the current meetings was to "make sure that everybody, at least, has a good, solid understanding of what might happen" when six-nation talks reconvene.

Satterfield Rumored To Be Named New Ambassador To Pakistan. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that "chatter at State is that Iraq coordinator David Satterfield…may be headed to Pakistan to be ambassador, replacing Ryan Crocker, who's said to be heading to Baghdad…replacing Zalmay Khalilzad, who's said to be headed to just about every top foreign policy job."

Former Russian PM Stricken With Mysterious Illness. The Financial Times (11/29, Ostrovsky) reports former Russian prime minister, Yegor Gaidar, last week suffered "a sudden, unexplained and violent illness on a visit to Ireland, a day after Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB spy, died in London from an apparent radiation poisoning." In an interview with the Times, Gaidar, who is now in a stable condition at an undisclosed Moscow hospital, "said the doctors had so far been unable to identify the cause of the violent vomiting and bleeding that he suffered during a conference in Ireland." The Times notes that news of his illness "comes after a series of mysterious incidents involving Russian public figures over the past month."

Ally Of Poisoned Ex-Spy Finds Radioactive Traces In Office. The New York Times (11/29, A10, Cowell, 1.16M) reports Boris A. Berezovsky, "an exiled Russian billionaire and fierce opponent of the Kremlin, confirmed Tuesday that the police found radioactive traces in his office after the death last week of his close associate, Alexander V. Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radiation." Berezovsky said the traces of radiation in his office had been "discovered as part of an ongoing police investigation of all the locations visited by Alexander Litvinenko" on Nov. 1. The Times says the discovery "highlighted their close ties and offered one more clue about Mr. Litvinenko's movements on…the day he first reported feeling unwell."

Blair Pledges To Pursue Probe Of Death. The Washington Post (11/29, A14, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that "there is no diplomatic or political barrier in the way" of investigating Litvinenko's death and that he planned to speak with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the matter "at any time that is appropriate."

Pope Urges All Religions To "Utterly Refuse" Violence In The Name Of Faith. The AP (11/29, Simpson) reports, "Pope Benedict XVI urged leaders of all religions Tuesday to 'utterly refuse' to support any form of violence in the name of faith, while Turkey's top Muslim cleric complained to the pontiff of growing 'Islamophobia' in the world." In turkey, Benedict "sought a careful balance as he extended friendship and brotherhood to Muslims, hoping to end the outcry from many Muslims over his remarks linking Islam to violence. He expressed support for Turkey's efforts to join the European Union, moving away from opposition he voiced when he was a cardinal." But "the German pope also hammered away at key points of his 18-month papacy, telling diplomats that leaders of all religions must 'utterly refuse to sanction recourse to violence as a legitimate expression of faith.'" He "avoided mention of any specific religion, even as he decried terrorism and the 'disturbing conflicts across the Middle East.'"

ABC World News (11/28, story 3, 2:00, Miller, 8.78M) said, "At the Vatican embassy tonight, before an assembly of ambassadors, the Pope raised an alarm over conflicts in the Middle East. Warning they could lead to even more conflicts and spread terrorism. It was a dire warning from the Pope. He may be here on a journey of reconciliation, but he clearly sees even greater divisions erupting unless peace can be achieved in the Middle East."

The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 6, 2:00, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported, "The Pope mixed the volatile combination of politics and religion again when he told members of the diplomatic corps that religions should refuse to sanction what he called recourse to violence as an expression of religion. That risked rekindling the controversy of his use of a 14th century quote calling Islam violent, and in a country that is 99% Muslim, people here expect an apology or a show of contrition. Newspapers caught the public mood: Message to the Pope, this headline reads, 'Islam is peace.' Benedict called Turkey a bridge between religions, but it is one both he and the Turkish political leadership must cross carefully for the waters beneath it are most definitely troubled."

McClatchy (11/29, Schofield) notes the Pope also "called for an 'authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims' and praised his Turkish hosts Tuesday as he began what's surely his most controversial journey since he was elevated to lead the world's 1 billion Roman Catholics in April 2005." The New York Times (11/29, Fisher, Tavernise, 1.16M) and Washington Post (11/29, Moore, 690K) run similar reports.

More Commentary. The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "We hope that the pope's evolving stance -- coupled with his calls for Christian-Muslim dialogue -- will soothe popular anger in Turkey and across the Muslim world. ... As the pope champions the rights of Christians in Turkey and other Muslim lands, he should bear in mind that his words will be most effective if he makes clear that the West still has a long way to go in defending the rights of minorities."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/29, 850K) says the Pope "will meet in Turkey with a representative of a religious tradition whose sometimes violent differences with the Roman Catholic Church can be traced back to the Crusades. That personage is not, as one might think, a Muslim, but a Christian: Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I of the Eastern Orthodox Church. … News coverage of the pope's trip has focused on Catholic-Muslim relations, given the outrage in the Muslim world over a lecture in September in which Benedict quoted a medieval emperor who said Muhammad's teachings contained 'things only evil and inhuman.' … Yet the religious purpose of the journey is to strengthen relations between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern churches that do not recognize the authority of the bishop of Rome. Benedict's attitude toward these ancient churches could offer as many insights into his view of his role as any of his dealings with Muslims."

Report Shows India's Muslims Lag Behind. The New York Times (11/29, A4, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports an official panel in India has concluded that Muslims, the nation's largest religious minority, are "lagging behind" on "most things that matter." Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office, which is reviewing the report, summarized the panel's "biting conclusion," saying, "The community is relatively poor, more illiterate, has lower access to education, lower representation in public- and private-sector jobs and lower availability of bank credit for self-employment. In urban areas, the community mostly lives in slums characterized by poor municipal infrastructure." The Times notes that the report is expected to be made public "soon, but leaks in the last several weeks have already turned its contents into political fodder," with "a number of Muslim religious and political leaders have already begun to advocate quotas for Muslims."

Ukraine's Yushchenko Vows To Continue Democratic Reforms. Ukrainian President Victor Yushchenko writes in the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K) that since the so-called "Orange Revolution," it has been his "goal as president has been to institutionalize democracy and guarantee that it is irreversible." However, he says that "because we were preoccupied with domestic political reforms this year, we failed to communicate effectively with our international partners" about "where Ukraine stands and where we are heading." Yushchenko states that "democracy and stability" will "form the basis of [his] agenda. To this end, he vows to "continue constitutional reforms that facilitate the effective work of government and prevent a return to authoritarianism or the usurpation of power."

WPost Urges China To Rein In Its Trade Surplus. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) writes, "Two months after a high-profile visit to China, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. is planning a December return -- this time accompanied by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke as well as a handful of fellow Cabinet members." The Post says the trip "reflects Mr. Paulson's conviction that high-level intergovernment contacts can help promote policy breakthroughs," which it calls "a worthy effort." However, the Post says "there's no certain payoff," noting that US officials have "spent the past few years urging China to rein in its trade surplus," which "has nonetheless ballooned defiantly." China's policymakers "could stoke consumption if they wanted," the Post says, "but they have not taken the step that would make the biggest difference: Raising the government's spending on social services. … Nor has China allowed its currency to rise, a move that would help to ease the trade surplus. Although the yuan has gained modestly against the dollar over the past year, it has fallen against the currencies of other trading partners."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules Parts Of Terror Listing Order Unconstitutional. The Washington Post (11/29, A12, Eggen) reports, "A Los Angeles federal judge has ruled that key portions of a presidential order blocking financial assistance to terrorist groups are unconstitutional, further complicating the Bush administration's attempts to defend its aggressive anti-terrorism tactics in federal courts." The Post continues, "U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released late Monday, found that two provisions of an executive order signed Sept. 23, 2001, are impermissibly vague because they allow the president to unilaterally designate organizations as terrorist groups and broadly prohibit association with such groups." The Post adds, "The ruling marks a victory for the Humanitarian Law Project and other plaintiffs in the case, who are seeking to provide support for the 'lawful, nonviolent activities' of two groups designated terrorist organizations by the U.S. government: the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in Turkey and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), also known as the Tamil Tigers, in Sri Lanka. … They argue that federal anti-terrorism laws put charities and individual donors at risk of prosecution for providing benign assistance to foreign groups that have been added to the government's terrorism list." The Post notes, "The Justice Department said it is too early to decide on an appeal. … 'We are pleased that the court rejected many of the constitutional arguments raised by the plaintiffs,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. 'However, we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional.'"

The New York Times (11/29, Liptak) reports that Judge Collins ruled that the "executive order violated the Constitution because it was made without any announced standards. … The order 'provides no explanation of the basis upon which these 27 groups and individuals were designated,'" Judge Collins ruled. "'The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion.' … That means, Judge Collins wrote, that 'the president's designation authority is constitutionally vague.'" The Times adds, "David Cole, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, said yesterday that Judge Collins had broken new ground. … 'It's the first decision to challenge the constitutionality of what is clearly the broadest power to blacklist individuals and groups on the statute books,' Mr. Cole said. … The designation blocks financial and other interactions with the specified groups." The Times adds, "Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the government was pleased that Judge Collins upheld the ban on providing services to terrorist organizations. … 'However,' Ms. Scolinos said, 'we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Schmitt) reports, "The ruling came in a long-running lawsuit before Collins in which humanitarian groups are seeking to support the nonviolent work of two groups that the secretary of State has designated as terrorist: the Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey; and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka. … Earlier in the case, Collins struck down portions of a law that made it a felony to provide 'material support' to terrorists, saying that language in the Patriot Act, which had amended the law, was ill-defined. The Justice Department has often used the material support law in prosecuting terrorist cases." The Times adds, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency believed that the judge erred in her decision. … Collins' latest ruling could affect another one of the administration's most widely used authorities in its war on terrorism, although the full import of the ruling was not immediately clear." The Times notes, "U.S. officials have used the power to freeze the assets of hundreds of organizations and individuals around the world to try to choke off financing for what it views as illicit operations. … But Collins also said that many of the designations, especially those made by the Treasury Department rather than by Bush, were valid because they followed detailed procedures."

Civil Liberties Board Impressed By Bank-Data Monitoring Controls. The New York Times (11/29, Lichtblau) reports, "A civil liberties panel appointed by the White House received a classified briefing Tuesday on the Bush administration's program to monitor international banking transactions, and several members said they had come away impressed with the privacy controls in place to prevent abuses against Americans." The Times continues, "The program, which gives American intelligence officials access to large volumes of banking data through a Brussels consortium known as Swift, has been attacked by regulators in Europe, who view it as illegal and have threatened sanctions. But the administration gave no indication at Tuesday's briefing that it was rethinking the program, defending it as a vital tool in tracking terrorist financing. … The briefing, lasting nearly two hours, was held at the Treasury Department for the five members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, created at Congress's direction in 2004 to examine privacy issues related to the war on terror. The board received a similar classified briefing last week on the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program, created by President Bush soon after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times adds, "The board's only Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, who was a senior aide to President Bill Clinton, said that before the latest briefing he had had doubts about the Swift banking program. But 'I was impressed with the lengths to which these people have gone to avoid infringing on people's civil rights,' Mr. Davis said in an interview. 'It was less of a concern than I expected.' … Democrats in Congress, however, have questioned the independence and resources of the board and its ability to inquire deeply into highly classified programs. Until last month the White House had resisted allowing the board to be briefed on the Swift and N.S.A. programs."

El-Masri Seeks Redress After Being Mistakenly Abducted By CIA. The New York Times (11/29, Lewis) reports from Richmond, VA, "A lawyer for a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured while in C.I.A. custody in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons." The Times continues, "In May, a federal trial judge threw out the suit brought by Khaled el-Masri, who said he was an innocent victim of the Central Intelligence Agency's program of transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation. Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets." The Times adds, "Benjamin Wizner, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened. … Gregory G. Katsas, a senior Justice Department lawyer, told the judges that courts must defer to the executive branch when it invokes the state secrets doctrine, which was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953."

WWBT-TV, NBC 12, Richmond, VA (11/29, Garrity) reports, "Journalists from around the world packed a Richmond courtroom today, as three federal judges considered whether a German man who says he was tortured by the CIA should have his case heard in U.S. Court. Today, attorneys representing the German man named Khaled El-Masri, argued the U.S. government made a mistake that it now does not want to admit." WWBT-TV continues, "Khaled El-Masri used an interpreter to speak to a crowd of journalists from as a far away as Russia and Germany outside Richmond's U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. 'I was humiliated, I was beaten, and I was drugged, and I was taken to Afghanistan against my will,' says El-Masri through his interpreter. … Attorney's representing El-Masri claim that back in December 2003, the CIA kidnapped him while he was on vacation in Macedonia. They say the CIA mistook El-Masri for a terrorist with a similar name. They say the CIA flew El-Masri to Afghanistan, tortured him, and held him in a prison for months. Eventually, they say El-Masri was released and left stranded on a mountain top in Albania, a country he had never been to. … But when El-Masri tried to bring a case against the CIA in U.S. District Court this May, a judge dismissed his case. So today, El-Masri's lawyers asked for an appeal."

The Washington Post (11/29, C1, Priest) reports, "Khaled al-Masri was supposed to have been disappeared by black-hooded CIA paramilitaries in the dead of night. One minute he was riding a bus in Macedonia, the next -- poof -- gone. Grabbed by Macedonian agents, handed off to junior CIA operatives in Skopje and then secretly flown to a prison in Afghanistan that didn't officially exist, to be interrogated with rough measures that weren't officially on the books. And then never to be heard from again -- one fewer terrorist in the post-9/11 world. … Instead, on Tuesday, Masri finds himself sitting in an American courtroom so elegant that even his experienced lawyers are commenting on its beautiful dark wood and graceful chandeliers. Dressed in white shirt sleeves and a modest maroon vest, Masri is waiting to see if the judges will allow the CIA to disappear him again." The Post adds, "This time, it's not the physical, flesh-and-blood, burly, ponytailed German citizen with six kids whom the U.S. government wants to make vanish from the face of the Earth. It's his legal case, his very right to have his argument heard in open court, that the CIA is seeking to have disappeared. They argue, citing the state-secrets privilege, that to proceed with the case would damage national security and that this damage outweighs any legal rights Masri may have. … The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District agreed with the government in May. … If they have their way this time, the pale Justice Department lawyers swaying back in their chairs before the three judges of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit would prohibit any judge and any jury anywhere from ever hearing the arguments in Masri's six legal pleadings and 40 exhibits, more than 1,000 pages in all. Much of the evidence was unearthed by German prosecutors and European Parliament investigators."

Democrats Hope For Bipartisan Support To Limit NSA Surveillance. Bloomberg (11/29, Rowley) reports, "Democrats, about to take control of Congress, say they will forge a bipartisan compromise to put limits on President George W. Bush's program of domestic eavesdropping of suspected terrorists." Bloomberg continues, "Democrats say they already have a starting point for a compromise, noting that bipartisan proposals this year require court warrants for eavesdropping. At the same time, party leaders will be treading carefully in an effort to assure Americans that they can protect privacy without sacrificing vigilance, and to discredit Republican charges they are weak on national security. … 'How will the Democrats proceed? I think gingerly,' said Steven Aftergood, who directs a government secrecy project for the Federation of American Scientists in Washington. 'They can no longer function as a protest group.'" Bloomberg adds, "After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without getting court warrants on communications between suspected al-Qaeda operatives in the U.S. and overseas. … While disclosure of the program triggered criticism from both parties, there is practically no chance the Republican- controlled Congress that returns to Washington next week will act on the issue, leaving it for the next Congress that convenes in January. … West Virginia Democrat Jay Rockefeller, who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in an interview Congress may be able to pass bipartisan legislation in six months."

Columnist Lauds IG Review Of NSA Surveillance Program. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (11/29), Dale McFeatters writes, "The Bush administration would deny it, but the impending Democratic takeover of Congress seems to be already affecting how it does business. … After a year of refusing to do so, the Justice Department has announced a narrow review of President Bush's secret domestic eavesdropping program. The surveillance program, which monitors international communications to and from the United States, has been controversial since it was first disclosed _ and the subject of a preliminarily successful court challenge _ because the president had decreed that the National Security Agency need not obtain warrants." McFeatters continues, "Congressional Democrats had asked the department to review the program a year ago, but plans for even a preliminary investigation were derailed when Bush blocked security clearances for Justice investigators. Now, the White House has told the department it will approve the required clearances. … The review will be headed by Justice's respected watchdog, Inspector General Glenn Fine. But the review will be confined to examining whether department lawyers met all the legal requirements in dealing with the NSA and making use of any information obtained from intercepts. Fine will not weigh in on the key issue -- whether the warrantless eavesdropping is legal and constitutional." Mcfeatters adds, "The administration has been notoriously hostile to any questioning, criticism or skepticism of its national-security initiatives, and for six years a compliant Republican-run Congress neglected its vital oversight function. … Better late than never -- that seems about to change, although it took a political earthquake to do it."

EU Report Finds Countries Abetted CIA's Extraordinary Renditions. The New York Times (11/29, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports a report from the European Parliament "bluntly rejected the assertions by several European countries that they were unaware of a C.I.A. program to secretly abduct, transport and detain terror suspects. 'Many governments cooperated passively or actively' with the Central Intelligence Agency, said Giovanni Claudio Fava, who led a special inquiry." The report "said that 11 European countries, including Britain, Italy and Germany, knew of the agency's activities" and "offered new confirmation of the United States' practice of so-called extraordinary renditions. … Mr. Fava's draft report asserted that at least 1,245 C.I.A.-operated flights flew through Europe's airspace or stopped at its airports, and listed Poland as among the countries least cooperative with its inquiry." The Washington Post (11/29, Whitlock, 690K) reports John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "called the European Parliament report 'hysterical in its hyperbole.' He said the committee was leaping to conclusions about the missions of the CIA flights and improperly assuming that they all had a 'nefarious' intent." The European Parliament "accused Poland of blocking the probe, saying that high-ranking Polish officials refused to meet with the panel. It also accused the Polish government of withholding or destroying flight logs pertaining to CIA flights at Szymany and other airports."

German Mistakenly Detained By CIA Appeals Federal Judge's Ruling. The New York Times (11/29, Lewis, 1.16M) reports ACLU lawyer Benjamin Wizner, representing Khaled el-Masri, "a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured" by the CIA "urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons." In May Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria "said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets." Wizner "told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened."

US Citizen In Texas Pleads Guilty To Conspiring To Fight For Taliban. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29, Stinebaker) reports, "A Houston man pleaded guilty after he and a Pakistani living illegally in the United States were charged with conspiring to join the Taliban and fight against U.S. forces, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." US citizen Kobie Diallo Williams and Pakistan national Adnan Babar Mirza "underwent training in guns and reconnaissance in the Houston area in preparation for joining up with the Taliban, prosecutors said." Williams surrendered Tuesday to members of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to the conspiracy charge. Mirza was already in custody on immigration violations. 'While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with the 9-11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East,' said Roderick Beverly, the head of the FBI's Houston office." ABC News' The Blotter (11/28, Ryan, 6:27 p.m.) noted, "In addition to the alleged firearms training, the men also agreed to provide financial support to the Taliban and their families, the indictment alleges. According to the indictment, Williams sent $350 to Taliban members and their family members on two occasions. 'The expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East,' said…Beverly."

KHOU-TV Houston (11/28, McShan) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Mirza was attending Houston Community College and working as an accountant at a small business." Williams "attended U of H downtown and was working part time at Rice University in its engineering department." KHOU added, "How did the government learn about them? 'It was a referral from the border patrol as far as suspicious activity that they noted,' said Rod Beverly, head of the Houston FBI office. Beverly would not get into specifics, but Senator John Cornyn was quick to point out to us that Mirza was here illegally. 'Whether you provided aid to the Taliban or simply overstayed your visa, we ought to be enforcing our immigration laws,' said Sen. Cornyn." The Houston Chronicle (11/29, A1, George, Hassan, Lezon, 530K) also notes Beverly said in a statement yesterday, "While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with Sept. 11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Tennessee White Supremacist Sentenced To 30 Years In Prison For Bomb Plot. WPTY-TV Memphis (11/28, Hartley) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Federal authorities say a white supremacist will spend the next three decades behind bars for attempting to acquire nerve gas and explosives in a plot to destroy government buildings. A judge sentenced Demetrius 'Van' Crocker to 30 years in prison and lifetime supervised release. Crocker was arrested in 2004 after he tried to buy the weapons from undercover agents," telling "agents his dream was to set off a dirty bomb in Washington, D.C. while the House and the Senate were in session." The AP (11/29) notes, "The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation and the FBI started investigating him after an informant alerted the agencies to his anti-government rants. Crocker also told an agent he wanted a helicopter license so he could spray or bomb black neighborhoods in Jackson with poison gas and spike drugs with poison to kill black people."

Air Marshals Concerned Racism Fears Could Endanger Security. The Washington Times (11/29, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Air marshals, pilots and security officials yesterday expressed concern that airline passengers and crews will be reluctant to report suspicious behavior aboard for fear of being called 'racists,' after several Muslim imams made that charge in a press conference Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport." Following an incident last week in which they were removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis, six imams "urged Congress to enact laws to prohibit ethnic and religious 'profiling.'" One federal air marshal in Las Vegas, who asked that his name not be used, said that terrorists could use public fears of being labeled a racist "to their advantage in future aviation attacks."

Fox Special Report (11/28, story 10, 0:45, Hume) noted a report in Tuesday's Washington Times that said "passengers and flight attendants said the men switched from their assigned seats to a pattern associated with the September 11 terror attacks two in the very first row two in the middle next to the exit and two in the rear. The Times quotes an unidentified federal air marshal as explaining that pattern would enable a group to control the most important areas in the cabin. The imams yesterday staged a protest at Washington's Reagan Airport and have characterized their removal as an act of Islamophobia."

WPost Says More Information Needed To Explain Imams' Removal. The Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) editorializes that US Airways "and the authorities who detained the imams have questions to answer publicly about the incident. Were they switching seats suspiciously? Did the imams have round-trip or one-way tickets? Did the men ask for seat-belt extenders, and if so did they give any reason? Answers to these questions might help explain the airline and official actions, even if they do not end up justifying those actions."

Chertoff Announces First Responder Interoperability Deadlines. Long Island Newsday (11/29, Eisenberg, 414K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told a gathering of state and local homeland security officials in Washington yesterday "that the nation's 35 highest-risk cities must have systems enabling first responders to communicate in a disaster by the end of next year. Every state must have such a system by the end of 2008, he said." The announcement came "five weeks before the start of a new Congress controlled by Democrats, many of whom have expressed frustration about the slow pace of progress on first-responder communications and pledged tougher oversight of his department. The secretary said public scorecards would be issued in the next few weeks to the highest-risk cities -- including Boston, Houston and Chicago -- to help them prioritize needed improvements. The focus, he said, would be regional because 'threats are region-based.'"

Bush Expected To Promote FEMA's Paulison. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that the "buzz" at FEMA is that Undersecretary R. David Paulison "will be nominated by President Bush for promotion to the deputy secretary level." Kamen notes that Congress "recently passed legislation raising the status of the FEMA administrator, effective March 31, mandating that he report directly to the secretary of the Homeland Security Department and advise the president and the White House Homeland Security Council during disasters."

Judge Rules In Favor Of Policyholders On Katrina Flood Claims. The New York Times (11/29, Treaster, 1.16M) reports, "A federal judge offered a glimmer of hope to the tens of thousands of people whose homes and businesses in New Orleans were flooded in Hurricane Katrina, ruling that insurance companies should pay for the widespread water damage." The ruling "could cost the insurers billions of dollars more than the $41 billion they have already paid to storm victims. But the insurers insist that their policies do not cover flooding, and they said yesterday that they expected an appeals court to reverse the decision. A final ruling could take months, if not years." Citing levee failures, the judge said the insurance policies on flood coverage "did not 'clearly exclude man-made' flood disasters."

WAR NEWS:

Leaked Hadley Memo To Bush Casts Doubt On Maliki's Ability To Stem Violence. As President Bush prepares to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Malaki in Jordan today, the Administration is trying to send the message that it remains supportive of Maliki. As NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "White House officials" told NBC "the President will send a blunt but supportive message" at the summit: "One advisor said it will boil down to this -- 'We are in this together, we'll get out of this together.'" However, the leak of a classified memo to the President written by his national security advisor appears to have undermined the White House's message. Under the headline "Bush Adviser's Memo Cites Doubts About Iraqi Leader," the New York Times (11/29, Gordon, 1.16M) reports "a classified memorandum by…Bush's national security adviser expressed serious doubts about whether…Maliki had the capacity to control the sectarian violence in Iraq and recommended that the United States take new steps to strengthen the Iraqi leader's position. The Nov. 8 memo was prepared for Mr. Bush and his top deputies by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and senior aides on the staff of the National Security Council after a trip by Mr. Hadley to Baghdad." The Times adds, "An administration official made a copy of the document available to a New York Times reporter seeking information on the administration's policy review. The Times read and transcribed the memo," and this morning makes it available to its readers in its entirety. The White House, says the Times, "has sought to avoid public criticism of Mr. Maliki." A "senior administration official discussed the memorandum in general terms after being told The New York Times was preparing an article on the subject." The official "stressed that the administration retains confidence in the Iraqi leader. 'What we are seeing is that he had the right intentions and is willing to act,' the senior official said. 'Our own review has opened a consultative process on where Maliki wants to take the government. A successful strategy has to be one that is driven by the Iraqis.'" In its front page article on Bush's meeting with Maliki, the Washington Post (11/29, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) mentions the memo "obtained by the New York Times," and says it "laid bare the doubts about Maliki," noting that the Bush-Maliki relationship "has grown fractious as repeated efforts to curb violence in Baghdad have failed."

In addition to the memo, a number of media stories suggest US officials and commentators, even the President, hold a dim view of the Iraqi leader's performance. The Washington Post (11/29, Abramowitz, 690K), in fact, reports Bush "hinted at the US government's growing impatience with Maliki" yesterday, "when he said he would query the prime minister about his 'strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself.'" ABC World News (11/28, lead story, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), meanwhile, said "US officials more and more express doubt Maliki can stop the violence. … In fact, a senior Defense official tells ABC News the Iraq government could collapse within weeks if there are more spectacular attacks like the Thanksgiving Day bombings that killed more than 200 civilians." The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Zavis, Wallsten, 850K) says Maliki feels "frustrated by US accusations that he isn't doing enough," and USA Today (11/29, Soriano, Nichols, 2.27M), in a story titled "Some Question Whether Al-Maliki Strong Enough," reports "analysts say there is growing evidence that al-Maliki is not up to the formidable task of bringing stability to his country." Wayne White, "head of the State Department's Iraq intelligence desk during the US invasion in 2003," is quoted saying Maliki "probably has neither the will nor the ability to address certain core issues, such as widespread abuses on the part of (Shiite) militias and the police. … He is beholden to the forces behind the militias for his political survival." Jeffrey White, a former Defense Intelligence Agency Middle East analyst, "said al-Maliki was chosen as prime minister by Shiite leaders 'because he was weak and pliable.'" Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (11/28, Baier) offered a more positive assessment of the Administration's attitude toward Maliki, reporting, "Senior aides say the President is urging flexibility and is eager to look Prime Minister Maliki in the eye and ask him what his government needs to better deal with the increased sectarian bloodshed."

More negative coverage on the summit: The New York Times (11/29, Burns, Semple, 1.16M) says that "at a time of heightened urgency in the Bush administration's quest for solutions, American military and political leverage in Iraq has fallen sharply. Dismal trends in the war…have merged with growing American opposition at home to lend a sense of crisis to the talks in Amman. But American fortunes here are ever more dependent on feuding Iraqis who seem, at times, almost heedless to American appeals, American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad say." The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Shishkin, 2.04M), in a story headlined "Why Iraq's Discord Stalls Political Solution," says "Bush is expected to press Iraq's leader when they meet this week to act decisively against the violence coursing through Iraqi neighborhoods. That may prove extremely difficult, because the sectarian discord has paralyzed the country's fragile political structure -- and with it much of the leverage at Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's disposal." The Journal adds, "Nowhere is this paralysis more evident than in Iraq's national assembly. The Parliament was cast by Washington as a solution to the nation's problems when it was elected a year ago. Instead, it embodies Mr. Maliki's biggest challenge because it mirrors the sectarian battles raging on the Iraqi streets."

NYTimes Says Bush Must Warn Maliki "Americans' Patience Has All But Run Out." The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mr. Bush needs to make clear that Americans' patience has all but run out and that he will start bringing the troops home unless Mr. Maliki moves to rein in sectarian bloodletting and Iraqi troops start shouldering more of the burden. Mr. Maliki needs to make Mr. Bush understand Iraq's full desperation -- and his own desperate political weakness. So long as Baghdad remains in chaos — and militias are better armed and more motivated than the Iraqi Army -- he has no chance of ending the blood feuds or breaking the cycle of retribution."

Bush Says Al Qaeda Behind Spike In Iraq Violence. The day before his summit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki, President Bush said the US will not withdraw its troops from Iraq "before the mission is complete." Bush also made the case that Al Qaeda is behind the recent spike in violence in that country. As NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, the President "said it's al Qaeda that needs to be defeated in Iraq and toward that end, he says he will not pull US troops out of that battlefield unless and until that job is done." Bush also declined to call the conflict in Iraq a "civil war." The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) reports that despite "pointed emphasis on the Iraqi government's role in controlling the violence," Bush Tuesday "made clear his view that Iraq has not yet fallen into civil war." The New York Times (11/29, A18, Stolberg, 1.16M) also says Bush "blamed Al Qaeda for the latest wave of sectarian violence" and vowed not to withdraw troops "until the mission is complete."

Bush's comments are receiving markedly negative media coverage. The CBS Evening News (11/28, lead story, 3:00, Axelrod, 7.66M), for example, said that "heading into the summit Mr Bush seems to be looking back as much as looking forward, recycling, old claims that outside terrorists are to blame for the chaos in Iraq." ABC World News (11/28, lead story, 2:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The problem is that it is virtually impossible for individual soldiers to tell the difference, for example, between a Sunni insurgent or an Al Qaeda terrorist. 'Anybody that is shooting at us,' said one commander recently, 'is an enemy.'" NBC Nightly News (11/28, lead story, 4:20, Gregory, 9.87M), which has officially termed the conflict a "civil war," reported, "Iraq's worsening civil war will dominate the President's meeting with…Maliki. Concluding his visit to Estonia earlier today, Mr. Bush blamed the violence not on civil war but on Sunni terrorists." Bush was shown saying, "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place, fomented in my opinion because of these attacks by al Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal. And we will work with the Maliki government to defeat these elements." NBC added, "Back in Washington, incoming House Speaker

Nancy Pelosi disagreed, warning that such rhetoric about al Qaeda will make it harder for Democrats to work with the White House." Pelosi was shown saying, "The 9/11 commission dismissed that notion a long time ago and I feel sad that the President is resorting to it again."

CNN characterized Bush's strategy on Iraq as a repetition of his past policies. CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer) said in its lead story, "Familiar words from a President now under intense pressure to change direction in Iraq, where more blood is being spilled every day." CNN correspondent Suzanne Malveaux: "Pressure is growing on…Bush to come up with a working strategy of his own." CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Malveaux) in its second segment described Bush is "using an old and familiar argument, blaming the fighting on Al Qaeda."

The New York Times (11/29, Stolberg, 1.16M) runs a similar story under the headline "Bush Declines To Call Situation In Iraq Civil War," while the Washington Post (11/29, Baker, 690K) titles its report "White House Wages War Of Words Over 'Civil' Term." The Post reports, "It is not, no matter how much it may look like it, a civil war. Forget the debate over what to do about the war in Iraq. The White House is still debating what to call the war in Iraq. With retired generals, analysts, politicians and pundits increasingly using the term 'civil war,' the Bush administration insists that the definition does not fit as part of its latest effort to control the words of war." The Post continues, "To people dying in the streets of Sadr City, it may be just semantics. But the White House fiercely resists the phrase out of fear of its impact in both Iraq and the United States." The Post adds the "risk" for the White House is that "once again it will appear out of touch with reality over there and with public perception here at home." The AP (11/29, Raum) also notes the President "portrayed the battles in both Afghanistan and Iraq as central fronts in a war 'against the extremists who desire safe havens and are willing to kill innocents anywhere to achieve their objectives.'" USA Today (11/29, Jackson, 2.27M), McClatchy (11/29, Douglas) run similar stories.

A couple of TV reports, meanwhile, suggested Bush overstated Al Qaeda's role in Iraq in his comments yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 3, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported on Bush's "claim today that Al Qaeda is behind this rising tide of violence in Iraq." NBC's Brian Williams prompted Pentagon correspondent Jim Miklaszewski "to take a closer look at that claim," asking "how serious is it?" NBC's Miklaszewski responded, "There's no question that al Qaeda still remain as serious threat in Iraq. But US military officials admit, it's not the primary threat by a long shot. … Two weeks ago, the top US military commander for the Middle East," General John Abizaid, "told Congress, sectarian violence, not Al Qaeda is the primary long-term threat in Iraq. … In fact, according to military intelligence, Al Qaeda makes up only 2% to 3% of enemy forces in Iraq." Miklaszewski added, "Whatever that Al Qaeda threat, some experts blame it directly on the US war in Iraq. … Al Qaeda is not the reason the US invaded Iraq in the first place but now the Bush Administration is clearly out to convince the American people, al Qaeda is why American forces should now stay." The CBS Evening News' Katie Couric (11/28, story 3, 2:00) asked Richard Haas, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, if he "buys" the President's contention that al Qaeda "is basically responsible for the sectarian violence in Iraq." Haas responded, "In a word, no. It's clearly responsible for some of it. It's clearly exacerbated some of it. But even if al Qaeda disappeared tomorrow…the sectarian violence would continue."

Bush Rejects Expected ISG Recommendation On Iran And Syria. The CBS Evening News (11/28, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Washington, the Baker-Hamilton commission continued its work hoping for a report by early next week." Bush, on the eve of his summit with Malaki in Jordan, "adamantly rejected what's expected to be a key recommendation -- engaging Iran and Syria for help calming Iraq. He says that's up to the Maliki government." Bush: "Iraq is a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy. They're having talks with their neighbors, and if that's what they think they ought to do, that's fine. I hope their talks yield results." Axelrod: "The results yielded today were not what the President wanted. Iraq's President Talabani was in Iran, listening to Iran's Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, blame the United States for all the chaos in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 2, 2;20, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Iran has made it clear that it is an alternative address to Washington where Middle East diplomacy can take place. Iraq's President Talabani was in Tehran today meeting with the country's supreme leader. He was also accompanied by his oil minister. Iran is also reaching out to American allies, especially Egypt and saying today that it sees Iranian cooperation with Arab states as the key to a solution. If Washington can't give a comprehensive solution to the many problems in the Middle East, Iran has made it clear, it is willing to try."

The New York Times (11/29, A16 Fattah, 1.16M) reports that when Bush arrives in Amman Wednesday, "there will be no shortage of people seeking to make him feel unwelcome with a decidedly blunt message." According to the Times, in Amman "and throughout the Arab…Iran was foremost on a lot of minds." For many, the Times says "a resurgent Iran, with or without a nuclear bomb, is a central concern. An opening with Iran, many analysts said, would amount to a loss of face for the Arabs and a striking boost for Iran." Despite "growing anti-Americanism," Arab governments have been "eager to maintain an American presence in the region, fearing Iran would step in where the United States retreated." The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Richter, 850K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bush firm on Iran, Syria talks."

NBC Criticized For "Civil War" Decision. The Washington Times (11/29, Harper, 88K) reports, "'Civil war' has joined 'terrorist' and 'undocumented immigrant' in the growing lexicon of terms that prompt press organizations to get touchy about their coverage. In the name of neutrality, print and broadcast journalists alike have declared moratoriums on words deemed inflammatory or judgmental in the years since the September 11 attacks." Neutrality "might not be the motivation behind NBC's decision to announce that Iraq is now engaged in a civil war, despite statements from the White House to the contrary. … 'News organizations claim they don't want to be political in their coverage. But this declaration strikes me as very political. This is NBC saying, "Hey, George Bush is delusional, and we're not going to play along." That's the tenor of it,' Tim Graham of the Media Research Center said yesterday." Graham added, "The pomposity of the judgment is also troubling. The network is clearly seeking a tipping point to declare that the US is losing Iraq."

WSJournal Says Iraq Conflict Not A Civil War." The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) editorializes, "The next Iraqi or American official to be asked about 'civil war' might want to reply by asking the journalist who, precisely, is fighting whom, and why Iraqi security officers of all backgrounds continue to risk their lives for the elected Baghdad government. The truth is that the enemies of Mr. Maliki's government are terrorists and thugs." Bush "could help give Mr. Maliki the confidence he needs for the tough fight ahead -- first against the Sunni terrorists, then against the Shiite revenge killers -- by assuring him that US policy will be based on this fact."

Carter Dismisses Comparisons Of Iraq With Sudan. Former President Jimmy Carter in an interview on MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews (11/28) was asked, "There is a report that 650,000 civilians have been killed. Do you think it has the potential of being as bad as Sudan?" Carter replied, "I don't think so. Because Sudan had two million people died. And it is obviously serious and I don't think American intervention, even if we wanted to exert the full power of our military force there could successfully interrupt the violence that is killing people still on the streets."

Carter Calls Iraq Invasion "One Of The Greatest Blunders" Ever Made By A President. Carter, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer), said invading Iraq "is going to prove, I believe, to be one of the greatest blunders that American presidents have ever made." Blitzer: "Bigger than Vietnam?: Carter: "I think it's going to be a close call, but perhaps much more vividly known by the rest of the world than Vietnam was. And, of course, my answer is predicated on not knowing what is going to happen in the future. I think president Bush could still salvage out of Iraq a conclusion that he could identify as victory. If he would agree that this international conference would help Iraq and if there could be an orderly withdrawal of American troops and Iraq could be sustained with the support of the rest of the world as a viable democracy, then he could say, in retrospect, this was a success -- and I think that's what he would like to see as an ultimate indication of a victory."

Gingrich Says White House Must Admit Change Of Course Needed. The Boston Globe (11/29, Pindell, 413K) reports that ex- House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R) "told a New Hampshire audience yesterday that unless the Bush administration admits that the war in Iraq is a 'failure,' it will never develop a strategy to leave the country successfully." Gingrich said that "the Bush administration needs to plan a 'third stage' in Iraq, following the military takeover stage and the recent democracy-building stage. But he says a third stage can come about only if officials admit they must change course. 'If the military, White House, and State Department continue to avoid the word 'failure,' how can you bring about a third stage?' Gingrich said." Gingrich "said a show of contrition by the White House would help the president regain the trust of the American people and avoid a quick pullout, which would be disastrous. The first goal in Iraq, Gingrich said, should be to rebuild the national military, even if it requires spending tantamount to the Marshall Plan effort in the aftermath of World War II, in which the United States spent up to 3 percent of its gross domestic product. 'We have to show we are serious about winning and that we will defeat any person, Sunni or Shi'ite, that hopes to disrupt progress,' he said. 'But we can only do that if we have Iraqi troops on the ground.'"

ISG To Set Deadline For Iraqis To Assume "Greater Responsibility" On Security Matters.

The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 2, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported that the President "has repeatedly dismissed the idea of setting a schedule for withdrawing US troops," CBS "has learned the commission may have found a way around that by putting the onus on the Iraqis." CBS (Martin) added, "Sources close to the Iraq study group predict its final report will not call for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, which would almost certainly be rejected by the Bush Administration. Instead, these sources expect it to recommend a timetable for the Iraqi government to assume greater responsibility for its own security. Still unresolved is the question of what if any consequences there would be if the Iraqi government failed to meet the timetable. The study group is drafting its recommendations just as the Bush Administration is acknowledging the war has entered a new phase."

The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Ricks, Wright, 690K) reports, "Even Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the occupation say the people and government of Iraq are not doing enough to rebuild their society." The White House "is putting pressure on the government of…Maliki, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have debated how much to blame Iraqis for not performing civic duties." This "marks a shift in tone from earlier debate about the responsibility of the United States to restore order after the 2003 invasion, and it seemed to gain currency in October, when sectarian violence surged. Some see the talk of blame as the beginning of the end of US involvement."

Panel Unable To Reach Consensus On US Troop Levels. The AP (11/29, Baldor) reports the Iraq Study Group "could not reach a consensus Tuesday on how many or how long U.S. troops should remain in Iraq, forcing the group to return for a third day of debate, according to an official close to the panel's negotiations." Panel member Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff to President Clinton, "hinted at some struggles, telling reporters, 'Trying, trying to find a ... trying to find consensus. ... It goes up and down.'" A second official "has said that the commission was unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but that some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal. … The first official said Tuesday that the group was still struggling over whether to set a hard deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces or if there should be any short-term increase in troops." The AP notes the group "was initially expected to wrap up their deliberations Tuesday."

Carter Expects Bush To Adopt Most Commission Recommendations. Former President Jimmy Carter, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer), said Bush "has his own recommendations to be derived from people in his Administration. But I think it would be natural for President Bush to adopt as many of the policies that Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton recommend in their committee as he possibly can. If there is some things he disagrees in order to save face and show his independence he is still the Commander in Chief, then he'll do it. But I think the recommendations of the committee will be seriously considered by the White House."

Bush's Faith Seen As Driving His Foreign Policy. CNN's The Situation Room (11/28, Blitzer) reported, "Good, evil and God-given duties. Both supporters and critics of President Bush believe they're the notions that drive the man and help shape this foreign policy. But they've also helped to put the United States, critics say, on a potential collision course with the Muslim world." CNN correspondent Zain Verjee: "When it comes to foreign policy, the President says he answers to a higher power. … Some experts say that the President's faith helps make him a decisive leader. Once he determines it's God's will to act, it's hard to sway him. They also say that could leave him less flexible and less likely to change course."

Bush Urged To Heed Saudi Officials' Advice On Iraq. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K), Nawaf Obaid, an advisor to the Saudi government, writes, "In February 2003, a month before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, warned President Bush that he would be 'solving one problem and creating five more' if he removed Saddam Hussein by force. Had Bush heeded his advice, Iraq would not now be on the brink of full-blown civil war and disintegration. One hopes he won't make the same mistake again by ignoring the counsel of Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, who said in a speech last month that 'since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited.' If it does, one of the first consequences will be massive Saudi intervention to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

More Commentary. The New York Times' Tom Friedman (11/29) writes, "We need to face our real choices in Iraq, which are: 10 months or 10 years. Either we just get out of Iraq in a phased withdrawal over 10 months, and try to stabilize it some other way, or we accept the fact that the only way it will not be a failed state is if we start over and rebuild it from the ground up, which would take 10 years. This would require reinvading Iraq, with at least 150,000 more troops, crushing the Sunni and Shiite militias, controlling borders, and building Iraq's institutions and political culture from scratch. Anyone who tells you that we can just train a few more Iraqi troops and police officers and then slip out in two or three years is either lying or a fool. The minute we would leave, Iraq would collapse."

In his column for the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K) Harold Meyerson writes that "on matters Iraqi, much of the Beltway -- and not just the administration -- remains impervious to fact. 'We've got to get the Iraqi army and police better equipped, better trained and into the fight,' retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey declared recently. 'And I think we've got 24 months.' The police, of course, are already into the fight, many of them working with Shiite militias to execute Sunnis. They are, from any dispassionate perspective, proficient enough. Train them for 24 months and they will be the terror of the Earth."

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M), author Amir Taheri writes, "While Mr. Bush should demonstrate that America remains committed to the new Iraq, he should only prepare to renew the US mission for one more year, dependent on a credible plan for transferring responsibility for security to the Maliki government. In that year, the US ought to intensify its training programs and examine options for expanding the weapons system of the new Iraqi army." The US should not "write blank checks."

Gates Criticizes Prewar Iraq Planning. The New York Times (11/29, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "In his first detailed public statement since his nomination as defense secretary, Robert M. Gates criticized the Pentagon as failing to prepare adequately for securing Iraq after the invasion in 2003. Asked in a questionnaire from the Senate Armed Services Committee what he would have done differently in Iraq…Gates responded: 'War planning should be done with the understanding that postmajor-combat phase of operations can be crucial. If confirmed, I intend to improve the department's capabilities in this area.'" The Times notes that by "criticizing the Iraq planning, however obliquely," Gates "offered a glimpse of how he might distance himself from" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. The Times adds that when asked whether the US "should engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq," Gates "shied from endorsing bilateral overtures to either country. 'Engagement with Iran might well come as part of an international conference,' he said. Talks with Damascus could 'take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference,' he added. But he also said, 'No option should be taken off the table,' noting that 'even in the worst days of the cold war, the United States maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China.'" According to the Times, Gates' reply "backed slightly from a study of which he was a co-author for the Council on Foreign Relations. The examination called for the United States to 'engage selectively' with Iran, in part to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons." In contrast to the Times, the Washington Post (11/29, A5, Ricks, 690K) describes Gates' position on engagement of Iran and Syria as "consistent with his past views," and characterizes them as appearing to be "at odds with the Bush administration's current policies." According to the Post, Gates' "position conflicts with the U.S. stance on Syria particularly."

Gates Argues Against Precipitous Withdrawal. The Washington Post (11/29, A5, Ricks, 690K) reports Gates "said he opposes a swift pullout from Iraq, arguing in written testimony submitted yesterday to Congress that 'leaving Iraq in chaos would have dangerous consequences both in the region and globally for many years to come.'"

Pentagon Reportedly Considering Abandoning Anbar Province. ABC World News (11/28, story 2, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The center for al Qaeda in Iraq is in that country's al Anbar province. More than 1,000 US troops have been killed there, more than 1 out of 3 American fatalities. And among military commanders, there's a sense that defeating the enemy there may be impossible or would come with a cost too great to bear." ABC added that it "has learned that the Pentagon is considering essentially writing off al Anbar province." US troops "will be taken out of al Anbar and move to fight what might be an even more difficult battle. The battle for Baghdad. … Under the plan now being considered by Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace, US forces would turn al Anbar over to Iraq forces." ABC noted, "Some officials oppose the move, arguing al Qaeda could turn it into a power base."

Dowd Notes Speculation On "Writing Off" Anbar. In her column for the New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) Maureen Dowd writes President Bush "vowed yesterday that 'I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete.' But his words about Iraq long ago lost their meaning. Especially the words 'mission' and 'complete.' At least in Anbar, the Pentagon may be about to pull troops off the battlefield. In another article yesterday, The Post, reporting on a classified Marine Corps intelligence report, said that 'the U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter Al Qaeda's rising popularity there.' … ABC Nightly News went even further last night, reporting that the Pentagon is 'writing off' Anbar."

Shiite, Sunni Militias Reportedly Preparing For Major Offensives. The Washington Times (11/29, Behn, 88K) reports, "Rival Shi'ite and Sunni groups are massing their militias in expectation of major confrontations. … Iraqis on both sides of their nation's sectarian divide report worrisome signs that the conflict will soon evolve into pitched battles between large armed groups. One secular Shi'ite speaking on the telephone from Baghdad said Shi'ite militias were massing in preparation for a large offensive against Sunnis in the capital. 'They had a big militarylike ceremony today for the Mahdi militia, to show their force. They are making themselves ready for something big -- protests, fighting, killing,' said the Shi'ite. A secular Sunni in close contact with one insurgent faction, said rebel Sunnis were also trying to form alliances among militias for a big push in the city against the Shi'ites, including more raids on government buildings." The Times adds that the "emergence of pitched battles between massed groups of Sunnis and Shi'ites would largely settle a long-running argument in Washington over whether the conflict in Iraq should be described as a civil war -- a description the Bush administration has so far rejected."

US Spokesman Predicts Sadr City Attack Will Spur Increased Violence. The Washington Post (11/29, A17, Trejos, 690K) reports Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell "told reporters Tuesday that he expects to see 'elevated levels of violence' as a result of the car bombings that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite district in northeast Baghdad. The coordinated attacks set off a wave of retaliatory killings in Sunni neighborhoods. While acknowledging the sectarian conflict, Caldwell stopped short of characterizing it as a civil war." The Post goes on to report, "In the past 24 hours, 40 bodies were found in Baghdad, showing signs of torture and gunshot wounds to their heads. Among them were three beheaded bodies and two female bodies, said Col. Kareem Abdul Aziz Hussein of the Interior Ministry. Meanwhile, two car bombs exploded behind Yarmouk Hospital in west Baghdad, killing five people and wounding 11, Hussein said."

Sadr Profiled. The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 4, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) profiles Moqtada al-Sadr, describing him as "a politician and a warrior, commander of a militia called the Mahdi Army. Intelligence estimates say it's grown eight-fold in the past year alone to some 60,000 men. Al-Sadr is the thirty something heir to a religious dynasty. … He flaunts his ferociously anti-American message which boils down to 'get your troops out.'"

Mahdi Army's Burning Of Six Sunni Worshippers Described. The AP (11/29, Hurst) reports, "The attack on the small Mustafa Sunni mosque began as worshippers were finishing Friday midday prayers. About 50 unarmed men, many in black uniforms and some wearing ski masks, walked through the district chanting 'We are the Mahdi Army, shield of the Shiites.' Fifteen minutes later," four vehicles "drove up to the marchers…suspected Shiite militiamen took automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers from the vehicles. They then blasted open the front of the mosque, dragged six worshippers outside, doused them with kerosene and set them on fire."

Responding To Maliki Request, UN Security Council Extends Mandate. The AP (11/29, Lederer) reports the U.N. Security Council "voted unanimously Tuesday to extend the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq for one year. ... The council responded to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout the country but that it needs more time." The resolution drafted by the United States "extends the mandate of the multinational force for one year starting on Dec. 31 and authorizes a review of the mandate at the request of the Iraqi government or by June 15. The resolution contains the same provision as past resolutions — a commitment that the council 'will terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq.'"

Annan Endorses Regional Conference On Iraq Including Iran And Syria. The Washington Post (11/29, A17, Wright, Lynch, 690K) reports U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan "proposed an international conference…to forge reconciliation among Iraq's political parties." Annan "said that Iran and Syria should be included in efforts to stabilize Iraq. 'The two countries have a role to play, and they should become part of the solution,' he told reporters, reflecting strong international momentum behind a broader approach to Iraq's strife. 'And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue and let them assume some of the responsibility.'"

US Soldiers Kill Five Iraqi Girls During Ramadi Firefight. The AP (11/29, Wagner) reports U.S. soldiers "fought with suspected insurgents using a building as a safe house in Ramadi…killing one Iraqi man and five females, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the U.S. military said. … The battle in Ramadi began when a US patrol discovered a roadside bomb in the Hamaniyah section of the city, and two suspected insurgents fled to a house, where they took up positions on the roof, the military said. As coalition forces removed the bomb, the militants fired on the soldiers, who fought back with machine guns and tanks, the statement said." The New York Times (11/29, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "It was unclear what happened to the suspected insurgents, but the military said 'it was reported' that one was injured in the fight and carried away by other insurgents."

US Pilot Unaccounted For After F-16 Crash Near Fallujah. The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 5, 0:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "US forces are still searching for the pilot of an F-16 that crashed yesterday near Fallujah. The wreckage was immediately surrounded by insurgents and by the time American rescuers got there, the pilot was missing. Videotape shot by a local journalist appeared to show a body near the plane, but the US military can't confirm whether the pilot is alive or dead."

Bush Urges NATO To Commit To Afghanistan Mission. The AP (11/29, Kole) reports, "NATO was divided at its summit Tuesday on deploying more troops to Afghanistan's volatile south, with Germany resisting any permanently expanded presence and Canada complaining of bearing the brunt of an increasingly bloody mission. Despite the strengthening Taliban insurgency and unexpectedly high casualties, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said that by 2008, he hopes Afghan forces can begin taking over security tasks." President Bush "called the Afghanistan mission -- which has mobilized 32,800 troops -- NATO's No. 1 operation. Defeating Taliban forces, he said, 'will require the full commitment of our alliance.'" Added Bush, "The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs."

The Financial Times (11/29, Dombey, Fidler) reports France, Germany and Spain "all said this week they could relax restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan to enable them to help in the turbulent south in case of emergencies. On Tuesday James Jones, Nato's military chief, said that 10 to 15 per cent of restrictions were being lifted, a step equivalent to providing 2,000 soldiers." The Washington Times (11/29, A1, Dinan, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "NATO To Bear Afghan Burden," while the Los Angeles Times (11/29, Wallsten, 850K) says "Bush has long called the defeat of the Taliban a triumph of freedom over tyranny. But on Tuesday he tacitly acknowledged that not all is well in Afghanistan, four years after the US-led invasion, and he exhorted allies to step up their cooperation or risk failure there."

More Commentary On NATO. The Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) editorializes, "The NATO alliance has been confounding prophets of its demise ever since the Cold War ended 15 years ago. For much of that time the military pact has played an unlikely but invaluable role as mentor to the formerly communist nations of Europe, granting 10 of them membership after requiring them to build democratic institutions. For the past several years it has played an increasingly important role in Afghanistan: Since the summer, NATO has led the fight against the Taliban in the unstable south, routing a large concentration of insurgents near Kandahar in the biggest battle in its history." Bush "spelled out a U.S. aim to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO by 2008 and to work toward membership for Georgia -- a democracy that Russia is doing its best to destabilize." Scheffer "rightly pointed to the need for the alliance to step up development and reconstruction operations in Afghanistan, so that areas cleared of the Taliban will have a shot at stabilizing. If NATO's leaders can follow through on those commitments and objectives, the alliance could defy the prophets of its doom once more."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, 850K) editorializes, "The primary issue that NATO leaders hoped to address Tuesday is a shortage of troops in southern Afghanistan, where unexpectedly heavy resistance from the Taliban is endangering the alliance's most important mission. Among those not pulling their weight is France. Like Germany, Italy and Spain, France has placed caveats on the use of its 1,900 soldiers, preventing them from being shifted nimbly to the areas where they're most needed. The French also have refused to deploy a NATO strategic reserve battalion to address calls for 2,500 more combat troops." NATO's mission in Afghanistan, "unlike the war in Iraq, is a multilateral effort against a foe that presents a well-known threat to the West. A failure there would not only create a terrorist haven, it would expose NATO as a feeble, divided force."

Women In Parliament Seen As Evidence Of Afghanistan's Slow Liberalization. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Rubin, 850K) reports Zahera Sharif "is the only woman among the four members of Afghanistan's parliament from Khowst province. In a conservative area where it is possible to drive through towns without seeing a single woman on the street, she is a rarity. As a member of parliament, she represents an institution that Western observers and experts in Afghanistan say is the country's best shot at building a stable democracy after years of war and religious extremism." The Times adds, "Even among the 68 women in parliament, U.S. and United Nations officials estimate that half have militia ties, and can be counted on to keep quiet and vote as they are told."

Gonzales Among Those To Attend Calderon Inauguration. McClatchy Newspapers (11/29, Root) reports, "Fistfights and shoving matches broke out in the Mexican Congress Tuesday after leftist lawmakers, hoping to block the inauguration of conservative President-elect Felipe Calderon, stormed the podium and tried to seize control of the chamber. … Conservatives, surrounded by security guards, pushed back the protesting lawmakers and vowed to keep order until they formally bestow the presidential sash on Calderon in a ceremony in the Chamber of Deputies this Friday." McClatchy adds, "Calderon has promised to reach out to those who didn't support him. But his critics on the left say his Cabinet picks suggest otherwise. On Tuesday he announced that former Jalisco Gov. Francisco Ramirez Acuna, criticized for his hard-line approach in dealing with street protests, would be his new interior secretary, handling domestic security matters." McClatchy adds, "The U.S. Embassy said that former President George Bush, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez would travel to Mexico to attend the inauguration. … What they'll find when they get here is anybody's guess. Tuesday's trouble started around lunchtime, as rumors swept the chamber that PRD supporters would try to seize the chamber. PAN leaders, who have the largest bloc of votes and control the gavel, began assembling near the dais, along with a coterie of guards."

Bloomberg (11/29, Harrington) reports, "Former U.S. President George H.W. Bush will attend the swearing-in ceremony, the U.S. Embassy in Mexico said in an e- mail statement. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez will also attend, according to the statement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Business Interests Seek To Roll Back Regulation. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Johnson, 690K) reports business interests, "seizing on concerns that a law passed in the wake of the Enron scandal has overreached, are advancing a broad agenda to limit government oversight of private industry, including making it tougher for investors to sue companies and auditors for fraud." A group "that has drawn support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. plans to issue a report tomorrow that argues that the United States may be losing its preeminent position in global capital markets to foreign stock exchanges because of costly regulations and nettlesome private lawsuits." And interest groups "are trying to build political support to review long-standing rules that govern companies, as well as parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which imposed stringent responsibilities on accountants, boards of directors and corporate executives. Some key members of Congress have recently expressed concern that U.S. companies may be over-regulated."

Paulson's Call For Principle-Based Regulation Examined. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/29), Alan Murray notes Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's call for "moving from a regulatory regime based on 'rules' to one based on 'principles.'" In a speech, Paulson "complained of 'an ever-expanding rule book in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule.' He extolled 'the desirability, where practical, of moving toward a principles-based system.'" The "model for a principles-based regulatory approach, it turns out, is Britain's Financial Services Authority." Could "such a system work in the U.S.? Well, first, it would require a restaffing of the SEC: More economists, fewer lawyers. (The current count is 1,344 attorneys, 27 economists.) More importantly, it would require reining in the trial bar, which empowers corporate lawyers by creating the constant threat of lawsuits. It also would probably require curbs on state attorneys general like soon-to-be New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who was always happy to step in whenever he thought the SEC was going soft."

US May Challenge Ruling On Former Westar CEO. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (11/29, Boczkiewicz) reports from Denver, "Prosecutors may ask an appeals court to reconsider last week's decision that set aside a five-year prison sentence for David Wittig, former chief executive of Westar Energy, for bank crimes." The Capital-Journal continues, "In a new filing at the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a federal prosecutor in Topeka said attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., are evaluating whether to ask the court to rehear Wittig's appeal. … A three-judge panel of the court dealt a blow to prosecutors on Nov. 22 by setting aside Wittig's sentence and instructing U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson, of Topeka, to resentence him." The Capital-Journal adds, "The appellate judges concluded that she erred in computing his sentence under sentencing guidelines. … They pointed out that a sentence of six months is the maximum recommended in the guidelines unless she justifies a longer sentence. … Wittig's sentence is for convictions in 2003 of hiding from bank regulators a $1.5 million loan he made to former Capital City Bank president Clinton Odell 'Del' Weidner II. Wittig is serving a separate 18-year sentence for convictions in 2005 of looting Westar of millions of dollars." The Capital-Journal n otes, "In the new filing, prosecutor Richard Hathaway said prosecutors are considering asking all of the appeals court judges to consider the case, instead of only the three judges who issued last week's decision. .. .The Denver-based court seldom agrees to rehear cases, especially those in which a three-judge panel was unanimous, as it was in last week's decision. … Hathaway said Dec. 6 is the deadline for prosecutors to ask the judges to rehear Wittig's appeal. The prosecutor said lawyers of the solicitor general's staff in Washington need more time to decide whether to make the request."

Suit Claims US Firm Bribed Chinese Banking Officials. The New York Times (11/29, Barboza) reports, "The American company says it was a legitimate cost of doing business in China, the price it had to pay to help secure a large software contract with one of China's biggest banks. … But a Chinese company that says it got pushed out of the deal has a different version: executives there say it was bribery, a case of an American company secretly funneling money to powerful Chinese government officials to ensure the lucrative banking contract." The Times continues, "According to a lawsuit filed earlier this year in United States District Court in Florida, Fidelity Information Services, an American software company, paid for two Chinese banking officials and family members to travel on vacation to Hong Kong, Paris, Rome, Las Vegas and the golfing resort of Pebble Beach, Calif. … The suit contends that Fidelity arranged for these trips through a consultant in China who was reimbursed for giving the Chinese bankers and their families an array of gifts, including expensive Sony cameras, luxury outfits from Versace and Burberry, and perhaps even a $330,000 apartment here in Shanghai." The Times adds, "The lawsuit grows out of a business dispute between Grace and Digital Information Technology, a Beijing-based consulting company and Fidelity, based in Jacksonville, Fla. It accuses Fidelity of trying to avoid paying $58 million in consulting fees after Grace helped the company win a series of software contracts worth $176 million with the China Construction Bank in 2001. … The lawsuit charges that after the contract was suspended in 2002, Fidelity dumped Grace and chose instead to hire another middleman, who was a close friend of the chairman of the huge Chinese bank. Fidelity, the lawsuit contends, made large cash payments to the middleman, who then passed money and gifts on to the Chinese bank's chairman and other bank officials, possibly in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977. … That law forbids American companies from paying off foreign government officials to win or influence business deals outside the United States. … Lawyers representing Fidelity, a division of Fidelity National Financial, strongly dispute the allegations, saying company executives simply reimbursed legitimate business expenses and that Fidelity never violated its contracts or the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … 'The Justice Department says paying for typical business expenses is not against the law,' said David W. Shapiro, a lawyer for Boies & Schiller, which is defending Fidelity in the case. 'If the golf game is inappropriate, most of the companies doing business in this country are engaged in inappropriate activity.' … In government filings earlier this year, Fidelity acknowledged that the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were looking into the allegations."

Philadelphia Mayor's Brother Indicted On Corruption Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29, Dale) reports, "The older brother of Mayor John F. Street was indicted Tuesday, accused of using his last name to convince companies he could get them lucrative city contracts and failing to pay taxes on $2 million of income. Soon after Street took office in 2000, T. Milton Street Sr. began hiring himself out as a high-priced consultant to companies that thought he could help them get city contracts, the indictment charged. One firm paid Milton Street, who is a longtime hot dog vendor, a $30,000-a-month consulting fee and required him to do no work, authorities said. He and two other businessmen face charges of mail and wire fraud, filing false tax returns and related counts." The AP notes, "The wide-ranging probe, which ensnared the former city treasurer and several businessmen, became public three years ago when an FBI listening device was discovered in the mayor's office."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/29, Gelbart, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said Street made 'millions on nothing more than his last name," but "in an interview in front of his Moorestown home, Milton Street said he was 'not going to lose any sleep' over the charges, which could mean two or more years in prison if he is convicted. 'Let's face it: They didn't get John, they have to go after somebody,' Milton Street said." The Inquirer notes, "The mayor…rejected Meehan's suggestion that Milton Street tried to profit from their relationship. … The Milton Street case was handled by some of the same FBI and IRS agents who worked on the City Hall corruption cases that have led to more than 20 convictions." The Philadelphia Daily News (11/29, Davies, 106K) adds, "Milton remained upbeat yesterday when he greeted reporters in front of his…home, predicting success in his coming legal battle and saying he wasn't feeling old. 'I think I'll run for office,' he said."

Philadelphia Inquirer Says Charges "Yet Another" Taint On Street's Tenure. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/29, 385K) editorializes, "The indictment yesterday of Mayor Street's brother on tax-evasion charges seems an almost inevitable result of the crony-friendly city contracts that have defined the mayor's tenure. The charges against T. Milton Street Sr. arise from city contracts at Philadelphia International Airport, long a source of pay-to-play rewards for people with friends (or relatives) in City Hall." The Inquirer notes, "Mayor Street isn't responsible for making sure his brother pays taxes. But the final year of the mayor's tenure will be tainted by yet another criminal prosecution involving people close to him. It is no accidental legacy."

Maryland Executive Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Corruption Probe. The Washington Post (11/29, B5, Rich) reports, "A construction executive at the center of Maryland's largest public corruption investigation in years pleaded guilty yesterday to racketeering and other offenses, agreeing to testify against his codefendant, former state senator Thomas L. Bromwell." The Post continues, "As part of his plea agreement, W. David Stoffregen certified as accurate a document that outlines secret payments to Bromwell and free or steeply discounted contracting work at the lawmaker's home in exchange for Bromwell's steering of state contracts to Stoffregen's firm, commercial contractor Poole and Kent Corp." The Post adds, "The guilty plea is by far the most significant of the six such pleas that federal prosecutors have netted in their investigation of Bromwell, a Baltimore County Democrat who was one of the most powerful figures in Annapolis before he left office in 2002. … Allegations of the improper exchange of cash and favors between the two men are at the heart of the prosecution's case, and with his plea, Stoffregen immediately becomes the star witness in a trial scheduled to begin in March. … The summary, filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, largely mirrors assertions made in the original racketeering indictment and in related cases involving other defendants." The Post notes, "Bromwell and his wife, Mary Pat, who was also charged in the racketeering indictment, have pleaded not guilty. … According to the summary, Stoffregen paid more than $190,000 to Bromwell, arranged the contracting work at his house and gave the lawmaker an ownership stake in International Partners Construction, a company that Stoffregen formed in 2000 to do business in Russia. … In exchange, it says, Bromwell saw to it that Poole and Kent was awarded a $13 million contract with the University of Maryland Medical System and arranged for expedited payments for work that the company performed on a state juvenile justice center project."

Former Treasurer To California Town Sentenced For Plundering Public Coffers. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Becerra) reports, "Former South Gate Treasurer Albert Robles was sentenced today to 10 years in federal prison for plundering $12 million over five years from the small working-class city." The Times continues, "A federal judge handed down the sentence after Robles made an impassioned speech, admitting he acted 'immorally' during his year as a leader of South Gate but claiming he never broke the law. … 'There are different levels of hoodwinking, but I didn't think hoodwinking was a crime,' Robles said. 'During that period, I decided not to be a very good man every day. But I did not decide to be a criminal.'" The Times adds, "Federal Judge Stephen V. Wilson seemed incredulous at Robles' statements, at one point telling the defendant's attorney that 'what you have just said is among the most absurd things I have ever heard.' … Wilson ultimately said he found Robles to be a 'puppet master' who won control of a corrupt enterprise that preyed on the city and its residents. … In addition to prison time, Robles was ordered to pay back more than $600,000 to the struggling city." The Times notes, "A federal grand jury in 2004 indicted Robles on 39 counts of money laundering, bribery, wire fraud and public corruption, alleging that he used his elected office and political influence to funnel money from a variety of city projects to family and friends between 1998 and 2003. He was convicted last year. .. Federal officials estimated that Robles, 41, personally received $1.2 million from the various schemes. The charges come a year after voters in the predominantly Latino city about seven miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles recalled Robles and several political allies from office."

Former Tennessee Senator Reports To Prison. The AP (11/29, Baird) reports, "Former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first state lawmaker to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal, reported to a federal prison Tuesday to begin a five-year sentence. Dixon, 57, is to serve the sentence, which has no provision for parole, at the Federal Correction Complex at Oakdale about 35 miles south of Alexandria, La." The AP notes, "Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, was convicted in June of taking bribes from FBI agents posing as employees of E-Cycle Management," and "in all, the investigation has led to indictments against 11 defendants. … Dixon has vowed to appeal his conviction and has continued to argue that he was set up to take FBI money by overzealous federal agents and lying government informants."

US Charges Alabama, Florida Men With Child Pornography. The AP (11/29) reports, "A federal grand jury in Birmingham has charged two Florida men and one Alabama man on multiple charges related to an interstate child pornography business disguised as a child modeling agency." The AP continues, "An 80-count indictment was unsealed Tuesday charging 42-year-old Marc Evan Greenberg, 39-year-old Jeffrey Robert Libman and Webe Web Corporation, all of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla." The AP adds, "A two-count criminal information charging 43-year-old Jeff Pierson of Brookwood with conspiring to transport child pornography in interstate commerce using a computer was also unsealed Tuesday. … 'The indictment alleges that these defendants conspired to produce pornographic images of underage girls posing in lascivious positions for profit, under the pretense of offering professional modeling services,' said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Justice Department's Criminal Division." The AP notes, "Greenberg and Libman are charged with establishing a 'child modeling' internet business called Webe Web Corporation. The indictment says Pierson was a photographer who provided images of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct in Alabama and sent those images to Greenberg and Libman in Florida. … A statement from the Justice Department says that, from December 2002 through April 2005, Greenberg, Libman and Webe Web conspired with Pierson to 'use minors to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing visual depictions of that conduct.'"

Grand Jury Issues New Indictment In Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "Federal prosecutors have secured a new grand jury indictment against a former SBC employee who was acquitted in September of lying about her contacts with a co-worker indicted in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case. In the three-count indictment disclosed Tuesday, Joann Wiggan was charged again with perjury for allegedly telling a federal grand jury in October 2005 that she had never retrieved any voicemail messages at work from co-worker Ray Turner, who is accused of illegally accessing telephone company records for Pellicano, a Hollywood private investigator, and assisting him in his alleged wiretapping." The Times adds, "In the new indictment, the grand jury also charged Wiggan with lying to the FBI in October 2004 in saying she had not spoken to Turner in five or six years. The indictment says Wiggan and Turner, also a former SBC employee, had called each other at least 35 times between July 2001 and February 2003." Bloomberg (11/29) also reports on the new indictment.

FBI Says Jordanian Man Scammed Chicago Immigrants. The Chicago Tribune (11/29, Ahmed, 617K) reports, "A southwest suburban man allegedly preyed on immigrants by posing as a government or law enforcement official who could help them with legal problems in exchange for fees, the FBI disclosed." Omar Abbas "was charged with a felony count of extortion after he was arrested in Chicago by FBI and Department of Homeland Security special agents on Oct. 19, authorities said. Abbas, a Jordanian citizen who was working to obtain permanent U.S. residency, is accused of taking more than $25,000 from three different people since 2003." The Tribune notes, "The FBI believes there may have been additional victims and urged anyone with information to come forward. 'I would encourage anyone, regardless of their immigration status, who might have been victimized by Abbas to contact our office immediately,' said Robert D. Grant, the special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI." The Chicago Sun-Times (11/29, Korecki) also reports, "Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said. 'We want them to know they can come to us to complain,' Simon said. 'We will work with them every step of the way to make sure they're not punished for coming forward.'"

Senior ROC Official Says FBI Unresponsive To Pleas For Help With Cyber Crime. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/29) reports, "A senior Taiwanese law enforcement official said Tuesday he could not get American authorities to help the island fight cyber crime -- even in cases that directly affected the United States. Lee Hsiang-chen, director of the High-tech Criminal Center of the National Police Agency, said Taiwanese requests for help from the FBI representative at the American Embassy in Tokyo routinely went unanswered. Lee made his remarks from Taipei during a video conference with Raul Roldan, acting deputy assistant director of the FBI's cyber crime division. Roldan was taking part in the conference from Hong Kong. 'We have no FBI agents in Taiwan, so when we have cyber crimes involving the U.S., we go through the American Embassy in Tokyo,' Lee said. 'But very few (of our inquiries) come back. It makes us feel very depressed.' Roldan promised he would look into the problem."

Former NASA Director Disputes Corruption Allegations Against IG. The Orlando Sentinel (11/29, Cabbage, 230K) reports, "Two former NASA officials cast doubt this week on a pair of allegations outlined in a federal probe of space agency Inspector General Robert Cobb. … In a Nov. 17 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Cobb described the report as 'replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies.' One of the allegations investigated in the report states that Cobb did former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe's 'bidding' by terminating a contract with…PricewaterhouseCoopers for the agency's annual chief financial audit," but "in an interview, O'Keefe said that the chronology in the report omitted several important details and ignored the timing of events that would have shown they had no connection." Additionally, former NASA general counsel Paul Pastorek said in an email to the Sentinel that "neither Cobb nor his office 'canceled the contract at any time.'"

Connecticut Woman Pleads Guilty To Extortion Charge. The AP (11/29) reports Pamela Boccanfuso of Fairfield "pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge that she threatened to kill a man's son if he did not pay her $197,000, federal authorities said. … She faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when she is sentenced on March 20." The AP notes, "In the letter, Boccanfuso accused the victim's son of supplying drugs to Boccanfuso's son, nearly killing him and causing significant financial hardship due to medical and rehabilitation costs associated with his drug addiction. About a week later, the victim received a second letter that directed him to place an advertisement in the Connecticut Post on Feb. 22 with a contact number. The FBI subsequently placed an advertisement in the newspaper that day listing a cellular telephone number as directed," eventually leading to Boccanfuso's arrest.

Atlanta Builder Pleads Guilty To Mortgage Fraud Charges. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (11/28, 3:47 p.m.) reported, "A metro Atlanta homebuilder and seller has pleaded guilty to selling incomplete or non-existent houses in Forsyth County, Ga., and arranging more than $5 million in fraudulent mortgage loans for the houses." Jeffery Alan Teague "pleaded guilty late Nov. 27 in federal district court to two counts of wire fraud for a scheme to defraud mortgage lenders by arranging loans to buy incomplete homes in the names of California, New York, and Florida 'investors.' Teague provided the lenders with false Certificates of Occupancy, stating the houses securing the loans were 'completed to code' and 'suitable for occupancy.' Teague was arrested by the FBI on Aug. 3 in connection with the execution of a series of search warrants on his offices and the incomplete Forsyth County houses."

Brief Questions California Execution Practices. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Weinstein) reports, "California's procedures for executing prisoners by lethal injection fall short of standards set by the veterinary profession for animal euthanasia and were formulated with less care than methods in China, the world leader in capital punishment, according to a brief filed Tuesday in San Jose federal court by attorneys for a death row inmate." The Times continues, "In addition, the brief asserts that the execution team at San Quentin State Prison is 'unlicensed, untrained, unprofessional and incompetent' to carry out their duties." The Times adds, "The brief was lodged as U.S. District Judge

Jeremy Fogel prepares to rule on perhaps the most fiercely fought of a number of legal challenges in several states to lethal injection, the dominant U.S. method of execution. Fogel is expected to rule by the end of the year in the case of Michael Morales, who argues California's lethal injection methods create an unnecessary risk of excessive pain and as a consequence violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. … The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation 'conducts its executions in an out-dated, cramped gas chamber with an undersized and dark anteroom,' from which prison staff are supposed to assure proper administration of a three-drug protocol, the brief says. .. .The brief also emphasizes that the state uses chemicals 'mixed by untrained and unsupervised prison staff, while ensuring that there is no meaningful oversight or review.' … Earlier this month, the California Attorney General's office issued a ringing defense of the state's procedures, maintaining in its brief that 'there is no evidence that any prior execution resulted in the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.' … But the 274-page brief filed by Morales' attorneys finds fault with virtually every aspect of California's administration of capital punishment, frequently citing admissions made by state personnel during the proceedings."

Judge Delays North Carolina Execution Pending Mental Tests. The AP (11/29) reports from Albemarle, NC, "A judge ordered an execution delayed for 60 days Monday so psychiatrists can evaluate a man who wore a Superman T-shirt while representing himself at trial and pleaded with jurors to sentence him to death." The AP continues, "Guy Tobias LeGrande, 47, had been set to die Friday for the 1993 murder of Ellen Munford, whose estranged husband offered to pay him $6,500 from a $50,000 life insurance policy. … The stay of execution granted Monday by Stanly Superior Judge William R. Bell includes 45 days for psychiatrists to submit their observations and evaluations to the court." The AP adds, "Death penalty opponents argue that LeGrande is one of the nation's most extreme examples of a mentally ill person who never should have been allowed to represent himself. Prosecutors suggest his courtroom antics were parts of an elaborate act. … Defense attorney James Coleman, a Duke University law professor, says a psychiatrist who recently examined LeGrande's records concluded that he is psychotic. The defense said LeGrande believes that the governor has already pardoned him and that he will receive billions of dollars from the state once freed. … A defense attorney who represents LeGrande without his permission said he doesn't know whether LeGrande will cooperate with the doctors."

NYTimes Blasts High Court's Refusal To Stop Review Of Reporters' Records. The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "A journalist's ability to protect the identity of confidential sources has been further eroded by the Supreme Court's refusal this week to stop a prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two New York Times reporters. This is the latest legal blow to the diminishing right of journalists to shield informants who often provide information of great interest and importance but who might be punished if their identities were known."

Banking Case Could Give Clues To New Court's Attitude Towards Federalism. USA Today (11/29, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court today takes up a hotly contested business case with major implications for the nation's banking industry and, more broadly, for states' ability to set consumer protection and other laws that are tougher than federal standards." The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, "pits Michigan regulators, supported by consumer groups and state attorneys general, against the banking industry, federal officials and business groups such as the US Chamber of Commerce. A decision is likely by July, when the court recesses for the term."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/29, Richey, 59K) reports, "For 11 years, the conservative wing of the US Supreme Court did something decidedly unconservative. It sought to tip the balance of power between the national government and the states. This so-called federalism revolution was aimed at bolstering the status of the states as dual sovereigns in the face of an ever-expanding sphere of federal power. The justices wrote of state sovereignty and the dignity of the states in terms reminiscent of Colonial distrust of the kind of draconian central authority wielded by the British crown." But "by the time Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in 2005, the 'revolution' resembled little more than a constitutional skirmish." Now, "with two new members of the Supreme Court, it is unclear whether the justices might again take up the mantle of states' rights. Will a majority seek to boldly build on the string of federalism precedents handed down by the Rehnquist court, or will the judicial minimalism of Chief Justice John Roberts leave it to federal regulatory agencies and Congress to police the constitutional contours of federal-state power? The high court's first significant opportunity to address those questions arrives in a case set for oral argument Wednesday." At issue in Watters v. Wachovia Bank "is whether a federal agency has the power to preempt state regulations governing national mortgage companies doing business within a state's borders. Put another way, the issue is who regulates mortgage companies affiliated with national banks, state regulators or federal regulators."

WSJournal Urges High Court To Side With Bank. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "in Watters v. Wachovia states are still trying to exercise authority over federally chartered banks. … Linda Watters, the petitioner in the case, is Michigan's state banking regulator. In 2003 she tried to bar Wachovia Mortgage Corporation from making loans in Michigan unless it submitted to direct state regulation." The Journal concludes, "Supporters of state regulation cry 'federalism,' and this paper yields to no one in trying to restrict Washington to its Constitutionally delegated powers. But the Constitution contains the Commerce Clause for a reason. If banking across state lines isn't interstate commerce, it's hard to know what is. Given that the appeals courts have sided with the banks in earlier cases, one is left to hope that the Supreme Court has taken Watters in order to eliminate whatever uncertainty remains when it comes to state regulation of national banks."

US Argues Against Strike Appeal By Northwest Airlines Attendants. The St. Paul (MN) Pioneer Press (11/29) reports, "The union representing flight attendants at Northwest Airlines asked an appeals court Tuesday to overturn a judge's ruling and allow them to go on strike." The P-P continues, Arguing before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a lawyer for the Association of Flight Attendants-CWA, Edward Gilmartin, said the law allows for a strike because Northwest made unilateral changes in its employees' contract terms and working conditions, including imposing pay cuts." The P-P adds, "A focus of the argument was on the federal Railway Labor Act, which governs labor relations at U.S. airlines. … The appeals court will decide whether New York U.S. District Court Judge Victor Marrero properly overruled a bankruptcy court judge over the summer when he stopped the flight attendants from engaging in any strike activity. … Northwest is operating in bankruptcy protection, and it imposed the cuts after union members twice voted down negotiated settlements with the airline. Northwest maintains it needs the cuts to exit bankruptcy." The P-P notes, "A lawyer for Northwest, meanwhile, said that the airline wants peace with its flight attendants and urged a federal appeals court to support a judge's decision to block the workers from striking. … And the U.S. Justice Department, represented by Assistant U.S. Attorney Heidi Wendel, argued that a strike, 'would come at the expense of the public.'"

NEA, School Districts In Three States Seek To Revive NCLB Lawsuit. The AP (11/29, Kinney) reports school districts "in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to revive a lawsuit challenging the way government-mandated programs are funded." The National Education Association "and districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law, President Bush's signature education policy. They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government." The three judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "took the case under advisement and did not say when it will rule."

DOJ Settles Housing Bias Claims With Alabama Landlord. The AP (11/29) reports, "The Justice Department reached a housing discrimination case settlement Tuesday with a landlord in Saraland (AL) accused of trying to force a white renter out of an apartment after learning she had a biracial daughter." The AP continues, "The settlement, which includes a $40,000 damages payment, stems from a federal complaint alleging that Beulah Stevens violated the federal Fair Housing Act in her actions against Michele Jones, according to the Justice Department. … Although Jones is white, the complaint states that Stevens tried to force Jones out of the apartment 'upon learning that her child is biracial and that she associated with African Americans,' the agency said in a news release. It also said Stevens was accused of using racial epithets when speaking about black people." The AP adds, "According to the complaint, two fair housing tests carried out by the Mobile Fair Housing Center — now called the Center for Fair Housing, Inc. — showed that Stevens, who manages 19 rental properties, treated white testers who asked about availability of rental units more favorably than black testers. … Under the settlement, Stevens agreed to pay more than $40,000 in damages and penalties, to post a non-discriminatory rental policy, to undergo training on the requirements of the Fair Housing Act and to submit periodic reports to the Justice Department. … The settlement still needs to be approved by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama. … 'This case shows that the Department of Justice and this office believe that housing discrimination is a serious violation of the law,' said U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes of Mobile. 'We will enforce federal laws against racial discrimination.'"

CNN continues, "Sean Bell, 23, was shot to death by police officers outside a Queens nightclub hours before he was to be married to the mother of his two children. .. .Two others -- 31-year-old Joseph Guzman and 23-year-old Trent Benefield -- were seriously wounded in the incident." CNN adds, "Bloomberg told reporters he met for an hour with Bell's family and fiancee to express his condolences and discuss the investigation of the incident. … Community leaders have demanded to know why NYPD officers fired as many as 50 rounds -- one officer alone fired 31 shots -- at the unarmed group of men as they were leaving Bell's bachelor party early Saturday morning." CNN notes, "All five police officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave Sunday pending an investigation by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown. … Bloomberg said Brown's office was investigating the incident diligently and trying to determine whether a grand jury should be involved. … 'District Attorney Brown is the one who now has responsibility for trying to ascertain what happened,' Bloomberg said. … Bloomberg rejected claims that the incident was racially motivated, citing an NYPD policy against ethnic profiling." CNN adds, "Federal law enforcement officials said the Justice Department was nearing the formal opening of a federal civil rights investigation into the fatal shooting. … Justice Department officials acknowledged the matter remained under review and that federal authorities in Washington and New York continued to monitor events in the aftermath of the shooting. … Officials declined to confirm that a decision to formally investigate the case could be announced as early as Tuesday or Wednesday. … FBI officials asking not to be identified said they expected the Justice Department 'very soon' to request agents for the federal probe. … 'Until that happens, this investigation is completely in the hands of the Queens district attorney,' said one FBI official."

Undercover Officer Claims He Identified Himself Before Shooting. The New York Daily News (11/29, Gendar, Siemaszko) reports, "The undercover cop who fired the opening salvo in a 50-shot barrage that felled a Queens man on his wedding day told his story yesterday for the first time." The News continues, "The detective insisted he identified himself as a cop well before he fired on the car carrying Sean Bell and his buddies. … 'This cop screamed, "Police!" and he had his shield out,' attorney Philip Karasyk told the Daily News." The News adds, "The News is withholding the name of the Brooklyn-born detective to protect his safety and the undercover operations he has worked on. … The detective held his fire despite Bell clipping him with his Nissan Altima, said Karasyk, who refused to name his client, even as police sources confirmed his identity. … 'Once the car hit him, he jumped to the side,' Karasyk said. … But when the cop saw the man sitting in the passenger seat - whom police sources identified as Joseph Guzman - reach into his waistband, the officer fired the first of 11 rounds at the men." The News notes, "Four other officers, believing they were being shot at, also opened up on the car, Karasyk said. When the gunfire was over, Bell was dead and Guzman and another man, Trent Benefield, were badly wounded. … 'The other officers believed the shots were coming from the vehicle,' Karasyk said. 'They only did so in this case because they were in mortal fear for their lives.' … Queens District Attorney Richard Brown has vowed to get to the bottom of the Saturday morning shooting that has outraged black New Yorkers - and that Mayor Bloomberg said looked like 'excessive force.' … Karasyk, however, said the five cops involved in the shooting - none of whom ever fired his gun on the job before - had no qualms about telling their stories before a Queens grand jury. … 'That's our offer to the prosecutors - to waive immunity,' Karasyk said. … The Justice Department is monitoring the unfolding investigation, but Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslyn Mauskopf emphasized it is not independently collecting evidence or interviewing witnesses."

Marchers Protest Atlanta Police Shooting As Victim Laid To Rest. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/29, Ahmed, 379K) reports, "About 70 residents gathered outside the house of Kathryn Johnston Tuesday evening, some holding placards condemning police, others venting angrily about the botched narcotics raid that claimed the life of the elderly woman a week ago. … The rally participants marched to a church for a community meeting, bringing the crowd to about 300. Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington addressed the crowd, saying he became concerned after community response to the shooting" and noting that "he brought in the FBI to lead the investigation." The AJC adds, "Marchers to the church carried signs that mocked the police, passed around by rally organizers, the New Black Panther for Self-Defense. … As some of the attendees pumped fists into the air and shouted 'Black Power' at the exhortation of the organizers, a handful of stoic GBI and FBI agents stood by watching." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/29, Reid, Cook, 379K) reports that at Johnston's funeral Tuesday, "Friends and family…said they just want to know the truth about the drug raid that led to the elderly woman's death. … The Rev. Markel Hutchins, who has acted as spokesman for the family, said Johnston's family is encouraged by the FBI's entry into the investigation." Hutchins noted, "They had zero confidence before yesterday. Now their confidence is increased."

Reactions To Shootings Demonstrate Changing Cultural Climate. USA Today (11/29, Copeland) reports, "An 88-year-old woman killed last week in a shootout with plainclothes police who burst into her home was laid to rest Tuesday amid a burgeoning national debate over police use of deadly force." USA continues, "Kathryn Johnston was killed Nov. 21 when she fired at undercover narcotics agents who had obtained a 'no-knock' search warrant for her home after telling a judge that a confidential informant had bought drugs there earlier in the day. … The FBI is leading a probe of the incident, in which Johnston wounded three officers, after the informant told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV that he never bought drugs at the house but that a narcotics officer had instructed him to say that he had. 'I'm telling them, I never went to that house,' he says in an interview in which his face was disguised." USA adds, "Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington says the man, who has not been publicly identified, 'told us he had no knowledge of going to that house and purchasing drugs. I don't know if he's telling the truth.' … Seven narcotics investigators and a police sergeant have been placed on paid leave until the inquiry is completed, a routine procedure in such cases." USA notes, "More than 200 people rallied in Johnston's northwest Atlanta neighborhood Tuesday evening to demand answers in the shooting, one of several that have put police use of deadly force under increased scrutiny. … In New York City early Saturday, Sean Bell, 23, was killed after he left a bachelor party at a strip club that was the target of an undercover police investigation. Police fired more than 50 shots at a car carrying Bell and two friends, both of whom were wounded." USA notes, "Some criminal justice experts cautioned against over-reacting to the shootings. … 'Police departments have become far more scrupulous in training and accountability and are recruiting people to try to minimize the number of police-involved shootings,' says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a think tank in Washington, D.C. … 'There are much tighter controls on the use of force. Police departments have significantly narrowed the conditions under which police can use deadly force,' he said."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/29, Marks) reports, "Call it a tale of two shootings. In each, an unarmed black man is killed in New York in a hail of bullets fired by police, fearing, rightly or wrongly, for their lives. … But the different responses of city leaders to last weekend's shooting of Sean Bell in Queens and the 1999 death of Amadou Diallo in the Bronx tell a tale of a city's evolution and its ability to learn the importance of acknowledging a community's outrage and responding to it. Such a changed response is evident not just in New York, but in other cities across the country." The Monitor continues, "Almost as soon as Mayor Michael Bloomberg heard Saturday that police fired 50 times on three possibly unarmed black men, he began reaching out to political, religious, and community leaders, assuring them a full, fair investigation would take place. By Monday morning, the mayor, police commissioner, and dozens of black leaders - many still angry - came together at City Hall. … In the immediate aftermath of the 1999 death of Mr. Diallo, a West African immigrant shot in the entry to his apartment building, then-Mayor Rudolph Giuliani defiantly defended the police. He didn't meet with local black leaders until weeks later. Thousands of protesters poured into the streets, prompting more than 1,700 arrests." The Monitor adds, "New York's reaction is emblematic of changes in community/police relations across the country. From Cincinnati to Atlanta to Los Angeles, police departments have realized they need the cooperation and support of minority communities - those that usually felt the brunt of the 'get tough' crime initiatives of the 1990s. In each city, fumbled political reactions to a charge of police misconduct - whether it was the 1991 beating of Rodney King in Los Angeles or the 2001 shooting of a young black man in Cincinnati - have taught lessons about the importance of reaching out, urging calm, and dealing with nothing but the facts."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A18), Joseph D. McNamara, a retired NYPD deputy inspector and former police chief of Kansas City, Mo., and San Jose, Calif., is a research fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford, writes, "Inescapably, comparisons were made between Mr. Bell (who was to have been married later on Saturday) and Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant killed in a volley of 41 bullets by four NYPD plainclothes officers in February 1999. Mr. Diallo had committed no crime and was attempting to enter his own hallway when one of the undercover officers yelled, "Gun!" The four officers were acquitted in a trial held outside the city, based upon their defense that they reasonably believed their lives were in danger. … In both cases, the NYPD accurately cited statistics indicating that it had a comparatively low shooting rate, and that shootings by police were not rising. And in both instances, New York's black leaders and black communities reacted with understandable outrage that unarmed black men were killed with such a volume of gunfire. Both sides seemed to be talking past one another, instead of to each other." McNamara adds, "Simply put, the police culture in our country has changed. An emphasis on "officer safety" and paramilitary training pervades today's policing, in contrast to the older culture, which held that cops didn't shoot until they were about to be shot or stabbed. Police in large cities formerly carried revolvers holding six .38-caliber rounds. Nowadays, police carry semi-automatic pistols with 16 high-caliber rounds, shotguns and military assault rifles, weapons once relegated to SWAT teams facing extraordinary circumstances. Concern about such firepower in densely populated areas hitting innocent citizens has given way to an attitude that the police are fighting a war against drugs and crime and must be heavily armed." McNamara concludes, "There appear to be important differences between the killings of Mr. Diallo and Mr. Bell. Mr. Diallo was no threat to anyone. First reports are that the car occupied by Mr. Bell deliberately struck an undercover officer after he had identified himself. In addition, it is clear that the current police commissioner and mayor have established much better relations with the black community than their predecessors.

Both Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Commissioner Raymond Kelly have been as critical of the current shooting as permitted under due process. Yet when all is said and done, those with official responsibility to ensure that the innocent are protected, not harmed, by the police must constantly evaluate all police training, tactics, arms and attitudes."

Los Angeles Police Commission Clears Officers In Toddler's Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "The LAPD officers who stormed a South L.A. auto shop last year, killing 19-month-old hostage Suzie Peña during a gun battle with her father, followed department rules and should not be punished, the Police Commission ruled Tuesday. But the oversight panel found problems in the way the Los Angeles Police Department field command responded and managed the crisis and singled out for potential discipline two officers who fired their weapons from the periphery very early in the 2 1/2 -hour siege. 'There was a systemic breakdown at the command and leadership level,' Commission President John Mack said." The Times notes, "Specifically, the commission wants to hold commanders managing the scene more accountable for the actions of officers on the ground. "

Wisconsin Man Pleads Guilty To Shrine Desecration. The AP (11/29) reports, "A 21-year-old man pleaded guilty Monday to desecrating one of Wisconsin's most popular religious shrines to commemorate 'Satan's birthday.'" The AP continues, "Tyler Groth pleaded guilty to felony criminal damage to religious property, and could face up to a year and a half in jail when he is sentenced Jan. 11. … Groth and his 17-year-old cousin, David J. Groth, were accused of spraying paint on statues and spray painting a devil's face at several locations in June at the Basilica of Holy Hill, National Shrine of Mary, in Erin." The AP adds, "It was to commemorate the date 06-06-06, and Tyler Groth told investigators the date is 'Satan's birthday.' In the Bible, the Book of Revelation describes triple sixes as the mark of the Antichrist. … Groth agreed to plead guilty in exchange for the dismissal of two unrelated misdemeanor graffiti charges, his attorney said."

Judge Schedules Hearing On Osceola, FL, Voting Districts. The Orlando Sentinel (11/29) reports, "A federal judge who ruled that Osceola's countywide elections for commissioners violates the U.S. Voting Rights Act on Monday ordered a hearing in the case next week." The Sentinel continues, "The announcement came just days after competing proposals by the county and the U.S. Department of Justice were submitted to the court." The Sentinel adds, "U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell set aside two hours for the 2 p.m. hearing Dec. 7 at the federal courthouse in Orlando, 80 N. Hughey Ave. He had ruled that the current countywide system penalizes Hispanics in a 'racially polarized' county. … The Justice Department, which proposed single-member-district elections for all five commission seats, asked for the hearing with its filing Wednesday." The Sentinel notes, "Federal prosecutors offered two options with slightly different district lines. .. .The county's attorneys proposed a plan that would have two commissioners elected at-large and five from single-member districts. … All three plans center on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside."

Judge Orders Treasury Department To Make Bills Recognizable To Blind. The AP (11/29, Apuzzo) reports, "By keeping all currency bills the same size and texture, the U.S. government has denied blind people meaningful access to money, a federal judge said Tuesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge James Robertson said the Treasury Department has violated the law, and he ordered the government to come up with ways for the blind to tell bills apart. … He said he wouldn't tell officials how to fix the problem, but he ordered them to begin working on it within 10 days. The American Council of the Blind has proposed several options, including printing bills of differing sizes, adding embossed dots or foil to the paper or using raised ink. … 'Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations,' Robertson wrote. 'More than 100 of the other issuers vary their bills in size according to denomination, and every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired.'" The AP adds, "Government attorneys argued that forcing the Treasury Department to change the size of the bills or add texture would make it harder to prevent counterfeiting. Robertson was not swayed. … 'The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, at least on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,' he wrote. … He said the government was violating the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability in government programs. The opinion came after a four-year legal fight."

The New York Times (11/29, Andrews) reports, "The judge pointed out that euro notes came in bigger sizes for higher denominations and had raised numerals as well as foil patches in different shapes. Japanese notes have rough patches to help identify them by touch. Swiss francs feature intaglio printing and perforated numerals, and other countries use sequences of perforated dots. … 'The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,' Judge Robertson wrote." The Times adds, "The Treasury Department refused to comment on the decision or on whether it would appeal the order, which came after a four-year court fight between the government and the American Council of the Blind. … The Treasury Department had argued that making bills identifiable by touch would create an undue financial burden for the government. It had estimated that the most expensive approach — printing different sizes for different denominations — would cost $178 million for new printing presses and as much as $50 million for new plates. … Judge Robertson said that cost would be small compared with the $4.2 billion that the government spent on currency production in the past 10 years."

The Washington Times (11/29, Haberkorn) reports, "Government attorneys argued that adding texture or changing the size of bills would be costly and make it harder to prevent counterfeiting." The Times notes, "The American Council of the Blind, which filed the suit in 2002, proposed a number of solutions that are used in other countries. … In Britain, each denomination is a different size, said Melanie Brunson, the Washington association's executive director. In Canada, currency has a series of dots in its corners, differentiated by denomination. And other countries use different patterns of raised dots or lines. … 'Our intent was to get Treasury to focus enough attention to incorporate those [ideas] or come up with something else to meet the needs of people who can't read them visually,' Mrs. Brunson said."

Florida Charges Eight In Youth Boot Camp Death. The Tallahassee Democrat (11/29, Price, 50K) reports, "Eleven months after 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson died, a protest march on the state Capitol and complaints that the investigation took too long, State Attorney Mark Ober on Tuesday charged seven drill instructors and a nurse with felony aggravated manslaughter of a child in the teen's death. For Anderson's parents the charges were late but an answer to their prayers. … Gov. Jeb Bush, who spoke with Anderson's parents Tuesday, said he, too, was glad the investigation had concluded." The Democrat notes, "Charged are Henry Dickens, Charles Enfinger, Patrick Garrett, Raymond Hauck, Charles Helms Jr., Henry McFadden Jr., Kristin Schmidt and Joseph Walsh II, according to a filing by Ober. If convicted, the defendants could receive up to 30 years in prison." The AP (11/29, Nelson) adds, "The teen collapsed in the exercise yard at the camp in Panama City and died at a hospital the next day. The death sparked protests at the state Capitol and led to a shake-up in Florida's criminal justice system and the resignation of Florida's top law enforcement officer." For those charges yesterday, "bail was set at $25,000 apiece."

Virginia To Let Vermont Decide Lesbian Parent's Visitation Rights. The Washington Post/AP (11/29, A08) reports, "A Virginia appellate court sidestepped the issue of civil unions Tuesday in ruling that, because two former lesbian partners filed for their union in Vermont, that state's courts have jurisdiction in a custody battle." The AP continues, "The Court of Appeals of Virginia remanded the dispute between Janet Miller-Jenkins and Lisa Miller-Jenkins to a lower Virginia court and advised it to issue a new judgment recognizing Vermont's authority. … 'By so holding, we do not address whether Virginia law recognizes or endorses same-sex unions entered into in another state or jurisdiction,' the court wrote in its decision." The AP adds, "An attorney for Janet Miller-Jenkins called it a victory. … 'This is exactly what we have been arguing since January of 2005 -- that the Virginia trial court had no business under either Virginia or federal law interfering with the decision of the Vermont family court,' Joseph Price said. … Lisa Miller-Jenkins will continue to pursue the case, said her attorney, Erik Stanley."

Study Questions Racial Diversity At Major Law Firms. The New York Times (11/29, Liptak) reports, "Thanks to vigorous recruiting and pressure from corporate clients, black lawyers are well represented now among new associates at the nation's most prestigious law firms. But they remain far less likely to stay at the firms or to make partner than their white counterparts." The Times continues, "A recent study says grades help explain the gap. To ensure diversity among new associates, the study found, elite law firms hire minority lawyers with, on average, much lower grades than white ones. That may, the study says, set them up to fail. … The study, which was prepared by Richard H. Sander, a law professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, and was published in The North Carolina Law Review in July, has given rise to fierce and growing criticism in law review articles and in the legal press. In an opinion article in The National Law Journal this month, for instance, R. Bruce McClean, the chairman of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a major law firm, took issue with the study's 'sweeping conclusions' but not its 'detailed data analysis.'" The Times adds, "Achieving racial diversity at all levels is an urgent issue, law firms say, but they acknowledge that gains among new associates disappear by the time new partners are elected. "We've seen stagnation and even decline when it comes to race," said Meredith Moore, the director of the New York City Bar Association's diversity office. … The new study proposes an explanation. It found that the pool of black lawyers with excellent law-school grades is so small that firms must relax their standards if they are to have new associates who resemble the pool of new lawyers." The Times notes, "Professor Sander found that very few blacks graduated from top-30 law schools with high grades. … Yet grades, according to many hiring partners and law students, are a significant criterion in hiring decisions, rivaled only by the prestige of the law school in question. For instance, Professor Sander found, 'white law school graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.5 or higher are nearly 20 times as likely to be working for a large law firm as are white graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.0 or lower.'"

ANTITRUST:

Court Allows DOJ Antitrust Suit Against NAR To Proceed. Market Watch (11/29) reports, "A federal court in Chicago has allowed the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors to proceed, the department said Tuesday." Market Watch continues, "The court rejected the association's argument that last-minute changes to its policies prevented judicial scrutiny, the department said. … In denying the association's motion to dismiss the case, the court said that 'NAR has failed ... to demonstrate that this case should be dismissed at the outset,' according to the Justice Department." Market Watch adds, "In September 2005 the department's antitrust division filed a lawsuit charging that NAR rules limit competition from real-estate brokers who use the Internet to serve their customers. The lawsuit alleged that the association's policy threatened to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting. … The Realtors association denies it discriminates against discount brokers or others who use the Internet to compete with conventional brokers."

Bloomberg (11/29) reports, "The ruling by a federal judge in Chicago lets the Justice Department proceed to pretrial fact-finding to try to prove that the Realtors and member brokers engaged in an 'ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy' to restrain competition. … U.S. District Judge Mark R. Filip rejected the Realtors' argument that the government had no case after the trade association in May 2005 changed the policy that limited online access to listings by customers of brokers who operate 'virtual office Web sites.' … The Realtors' 'contention that the United States has failed even to plead a claim is unpersuasive,' Filip wrote. … The trade association 'and its members have entered into a collective action that purports to regulate how they will compete in the marketplace,' the judge said." Bloomberg adds, "The government's complaint, filed in September 2005, said the Realtors' rules limited competition by preventing customers of online brokers from receiving full access to multiple listings. The Realtors' policy lets traditional brokers block competitors from having full online access to multiple listings. … The Chicago-based Realtors' group changed its policy after the Justice Department said it planned to sue to challenge the rules as anticompetitive, according to Filip's opinion. The modified policy still contains features that the government claims are anticompetitive, the judge wrote. … The government has argued that the original policy had 'enduring effects' in some markets and that the modified rules have 'not eliminated all effects,' Filip wrote. … 'We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to presenting our case at trial,' J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy attorney general for antitrust, said in a statement released by the Justice Department."

Inman News (11/29, Roberts) reports, "Filip last month denied the Realtor group's motion to dismiss the lawsuit, which was filed in September 2005 and amended in October 2005. The lawsuit alleges that the trade group's policies governing the online display and sharing of property information are overly restrictive and can harm consumers and stifle innovation. … The National Association of Realtors in December filed the motion in U.S. District Court in Chicago in an attempt to toss out parts of the lawsuit that target the association's former online listings policy, known as the Virtual Office Website (VOW) policy and so-called 'opt-out' provisions of its policies that allow brokers to withhold online listings from other brokers." Inman continues, "Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said there 'were no surprises' in the judge's opinion. The rules of the court dictate that the judge must assume that the allegations brought by the Justice Department are true in weighing the association's motion, Janik said -- the lawsuit has not yet reached the trial phase and both sides are still gathering evidence. … 'He was very careful in his wording. I didn't view anything he had sent out as significant (to the overall case),' she added. 'We knew it was a long shot but we thought it was worth making. The sooner we can end this litigation, the better.'"

SCOTUS Hears Arguments In Antitrust Suit Against Weyerhaeuser. The AP (11/29) reports, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday questioned whether forest products giant Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller competitor out of business by paying too much for logs that Weyerhaeuser allegedly didn't need." The AP continues, "The case focuses on the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest and pits a defunct company, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., against Weyerhaeuser and the Bush administration." The AP adds, 'Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to Ross-Simmons stemming from a jury verdict that found the larger company had violated federal antitrust law. .. .Ross-Simmons accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder sawlogs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills. .. .Arguments before the Supreme Court Tuesday turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/29, Dlouhy) reports, "The lawyer for a now-defunct sawmill told the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday that timber giant Weyerhaeuser Co. broke federal antitrust laws by overpaying for more logs than it needed and then cutting its prices on the finished lumber used to make guitars and furniture. … The strategy drove the smaller timber processor, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., out of business at the same time it allowed Weyerhaeuser to strengthen its foothold in the Pacific Northwest alder saw-log market, said the lawyer, Michael Haglund. … 'Weyerhaeuser artificially increased the log market above where it otherwise would have been,' Haglund said. 'We have a situation where they warehoused large -- unprecedentedly high -- volumes of lumber because they' wanted to keep it out of competitors' hands." The P-I adds, "Ross-Simmons now wants Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser to pay nearly $80 million in damages for the business tactics, which it says were part of a ploy to monopolize the market. The Longview-based sawmill says Weyerhaeuser's tactics forced it out of business in 2001 by driving prices for saw logs higher than it could afford and by depleting the supply of the trees. … The price of alder saw logs and that of finished lumber made from the material are usually tied together. But from 1998 to 2001, Ross-Simmons argued in court filings, the price of saw logs rose even as the price of finished lumber dropped. … In its defense, Weyerhaeuser contends it was only making smart business decisions and could afford to pay more for the logs because it was more efficient at processing the wood."

Judge Restrains Sale Of Bay Area Newspapers. The AP (11/29, Kravets) reports, "A previously undisclosed internal memo prompted a federal judge Tuesday to temporarily block the consolidation of some of the San Francisco Chronicle's business operations with those of rival newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc." The AP continues, "Denver-based MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from Hearst Corp., owner of the Chronicle." The AP adds, "In July, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston let the deal go through, ruling against an antitrust lawsuit that claimed the deal would create a monopoly on readership and advertising in the region. … But in issuing Tuesday's restraining order, she said a memo had recently surfaced showing Hearst had an undisclosed motive for investing in the deal -- to consolidate its Bay Area advertising and distribution operations with those of the Chronicle's competitors -- a possible antitrust violation. … 'Such agreements would alter the court's analysis of this case as a whole,' Illston wrote, and would 'increase the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anticompetitive, and illegal.'"

The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (11/29, Richman) reports, "Evidence of talks between MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. -- the San Francisco Chronicle's owner, and a party to MediaNews' recent purchase of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times -- raises the specter of antitrust violations, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston of San Francisco wrote in Tuesday's order. .. She'll hold a hearing Dec. 6 on whether her order should become a preliminary injunction, barring any such deals at least until a lawsuit challenging MediaNews' acquisitions goes to trial in April." The Times-Star adds, "Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. this year bought the now-defunct Knight Ridder Corp.'s 32 newspapers for $6.5 billion. From among those, the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times were then sold for $736.8 million to Denver-based MediaNews Group -- which also owns this newspaper -- and the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press were sold for $263.2 million to New York City-based Hearst Corp. .. .In a separate, simultaneous pact, Hearst agreed to give the St. Paul and Monterey papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-Bay Area assets. … San Francisco businessman, political consultant and former mayoral candidate Clint Reilly sued July 14 to halt the deal, claiming it would create a Bay Area newspaper monopoly with higher subscription and advertising rates and diminished journalistic quality, jobs and union contracts. .. .Illston refused his initial plea for a TRO to prevent the sale's closing, but Reilly went back to her last week with new evidence found among documents provided by the newspaper companies."

The San Francisco Chronicle (11/29, Egelko) reports, "The restraining order will be in effect until a Dec. 6 hearing on an injunction that would keep the ban in place until April 30. That is when a lawsuit by Clint Reilly, a real estate investor, former political consultant and onetime San Francisco mayoral candidate, is scheduled to go to trial." The Chronicle adds, "Reilly is seeking to block MediaNews' purchase of the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, arguing that the deal, combined with MediaNews' financial arrangement with Hearst, would create a newspaper monopoly in the Bay Area. … Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said today's ruling could be the first step toward upsetting MediaNews' purchase. … 'This agreement (on distribution and advertising) was the knot that ties the whole package together, and when this unravels, the whole package unravels,' Alioto said. … 'They're trying to monopolize the entire Bay Area,' Alioto said of MediaNews and Hearst. 'They did it secretly ... and they got caught.'"

Justices Hear Arguments In Closely Watched Patent Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/29,

Puzzanghera, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court heard oral arguments today in an abstract case involving automobile gas pedals that could apply the brakes to the recent dramatic growth in patents issued nationwide. Frustrated justices flipped through engineering diagrams as they pondered a question at the heart of many patent disputes -- was the invention of an adjustable pedal with electronic sensors truly unique in this case, or just an 'obvious' combination of existing components that anyone with a little skill in the field could have designed?" USA Today (11/29, Biskupic, 2.27M) notes there were "unusually spirited arguments," as "several Supreme Court justices challenged the prevailing standard for when an invention is too closely tied to existing works to qualify for patent protection." However, some justices also "worried that changing the rules of 'obviousness' would throw into doubt the validity of many existing patents." Justice David Souter "asked whether there would be '100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning' if the standard used by a lower federal court that oversees patent appeals were changed. He wondered if such a change would 'produce chaos.'" The New York Times (11/29, Greenhouse, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

Justices Skeptical Of Federal Circuit's Patent Test. The Legal Times (11/29, Mauro) reports, "In surprisingly blunt terms, Supreme Court justices Tuesday made it crystal clear that they are upset with the nation's patent system, the lawyers who litigate under it and the appeals court that referees it." The Times continues, "During a lively -- bordering on raucous -- hour of arguments on what makes an invention so obvious that it does not deserve a patent, justice after justice piled on criticism of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's three-part 'teaching-suggestion-motivation' test for determining obviousness, an issue that arises in virtually every patent application and appeal. The test has been criticized as too patent-friendly, resulting in a proliferation of junk patents that stifle competition. … 'Three imponderable nouns,' is how Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the test, also calling it 'gobbledygook' for good measure. … Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. called it 'Federal Circuit jargon' that is inflexible and 'worse than meaningless.' … And when Justice Stephen Breyer said he had read the briefs in the case '15 times' and still could not understand the 'motivation' prong of the test, Scalia chimed in, 'Like Justice Breyer, I don't understand.' … The implied message to the Federal Circuit seemed to be: If two of the brainier justices on the Supreme Court don't have a clue what you are talking about, a new test might be in order. … By the end of the arguments in KSR International v. Teleflex, it seemed obvious that the Federal Circuit's three-part test for obviousness will be modified, if not scrapped altogether. But what will replace it was less clear." The Times notes, "After the argument Tuesday, the Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, defended the test in a telephone interview, asserting, 'The judges of our court are quite clear on what it is and how to apply it.' He said the test goes back decades -- since before creation of the court in 1982 -- and has been applied with flexibility and common sense. 'I wonder if some of the descriptions of the test I have seen lately are accurate.'"

Supreme Court To Consider Company's Price Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) reports, "Companies often are accused of cutting prices unfairly to drive a competitor from the market, but is raising prices for the same purpose just as unfair?" The Supreme Court "questioned whether Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller rival out of business by paying too much for logs that the Federal Way, Wash., forest-products company allegedly didn't need." Weyerhaeuser "is fighting an $80 million award to the now-defunct Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. stemming from a jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser violated federal antitrust law. Ross-Simmons, of Longview, Wash., accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder logs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills that use the wood in furniture and other products. Yesterday's oral arguments before the high court turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty."

Movie Studios Push Apple On Anti-Piracy Rules. The Financial Times (11/29, Garrahan, Birchall) reports, "Apple Computer is coming under pressure from some of Hollywood's biggest movie studios to change the operating environment of its popular iTunes platform, amid growing concern about digital piracy." The Times continues, "The studios – Universal, 20th Century Fox, Paramount and Warner Bros – are in talks with Apple about making their films available for digital download on iTunes. … After months of discussion, a sticking point has emerged over the studios' demand that Apple limit the number of devices that can use a film downloaded from iTunes." The Times adds, "The studios want to avoid the experience of the music industry, which has yet to recover from years of illegal digital piracy. Apple must introduce a 'new model' for feature film content delivery, said one studio executive involved in the talks. … With the average cost of a blockbuster film approaching $100m, movie studios had more to lose than music companies, he added. 'We're very willing to do a deal but we're keen to get some concessions from Apple that will account for the differences between the value of music and television content and feature film content.' … The talks between Apple and the studios come as retailers are scrambling to get to grips with digital delivery of film content. Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, is entering the nascent market, challenging Amazon and Apple with a different model that ties digital downloads to the sale of DVDs."

NASD, NYSE To Merge Some Oversight Functions. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, C1, Smith, Scannell) reports, "In a victory for Wall Street, the two organizations that police brokerage firms unveiled, as expected, a plan to merge some of their operations -- the latest step in a deregulatory push in U.S. markets." The Journal continues, "Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the pact, saying it would streamline Wall Street regulation and raise the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. Some investor advocates said the merger could weaken protections for individual investors by effectively removing cops from the beat. No immediate job cuts are planned, with the regulators saying any reductions would come through attrition." The Journal adds, "The National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange plan to combine routine examinations, enforcement and rule-making for the securities industry. The plan, which must still be ratified by 5,100 current NASD members, follows a campaign waged intermittently since 2000 by Wall Street's lobbying group, recently renamed the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association. … The regulatory relief for Wall Street comes as both NYSE Group and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. are bidding to acquire exchanges in Europe. Both exchanges must persuade non-U.S. investors and overseas issuers of securities that they won't suffer from the increase in U.S. regulation, notably the Sarbanes-Oxley law that was passed in 2002 after the collapse of Enron Corp. and other post-bubble scandals and added layers of regulation for public companies trading in the U.S."

USA Today (11/29, Farrell) reports, "The new group, which is yet to be named, will merge the NASD's 2,400 regulators and examiners with the 470 regulators at the NYSE. Currently, the NASD oversees about 5,100 brokerages, from small operations to big broker-dealers, while NYSE regulators focus on 180 major firms that dominate business on the Big Board." USA adds, "Some details of the merger have yet to be worked out. Then the deal will need formal approval from the SEC. But Tuesday's announcement suggests that the merger, which has been encouraged by the firms that have been regulated by both parties, is virtually a done deal. … While the new group is officially a merger of equals, NASD Chairman and CEO Mary Schapiro will emerge as CEO of the new entity, while NYSE Regulation CEO Richard Ketchum becomes chairman. Ketchum will continue to run the NYSE's market surveillance programs, which will remain separate from the merged entity."

Mack-Cali To Bid On Reckson. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, B7, Forsyth) reports, "A chief competitor of Reckson Associates Realty Corp. says it is teaming with financier Carl Icahn and New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe in their $4.6 billion competing bid to acquire Reckson, a real-estate investment trust." The Journal continues, "Mack-Cali Realty Corp. said last night it expects to be admitted as a partner with Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe. 'We believe the combined partnership will be a(n) ... enhancement, given our collective strengths,' Mack-Cali Chief Executive Mitchell Hersh said in an interview." The Journal adds, "Mack-Cali, of Edison, N.J., competes directly against Reckson, of Uniondale, N.Y., in the suburban markets of New York. Mack-Cali wasn't contacted as a possible suitor when Reckson put itself up for sale, in part because of two failed merger negotiations between the two companies. Mr. Hersh has said he would have wanted a chance to bid on Reckson's suburban assets. Reckson had no comment on Mr. Hersh's statement last night. … However, earlier yesterday, Reckson notified Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe -- via email to the partnership and a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission -- that their request to bring in additional investors to comb through Reckson's books wouldn't be allowed under the terms of the confidentiality agreement."

Iberdrola Purchase Of Scottish Power Could Spur European Energy Sector Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Johnson, Singer) reports, "Spanish power company Iberdrola SA's £11.6 billion ($22.64 billion) offer for Scottish Power PLC could jump-start a long-awaited consolidation in the European power sector, which has been hamstrung by legal and political battles. If successful, the deal, announced yesterday, would create Europe's third-largest power company by market capitalization with a combined value of about €46 billion ($60.7 billion) and ratchet up the pressure on others in the sector to bulk up." The Journal adds, "Power companies across Europe have been struggling to consolidate for the past year, as they seek to boost their size to take advantage of deregulation of the sector by the end of 2007."

The New York Times (11/29, Mclean, Timmons) says Iberdrola's purchase of Scottish Power "would create one of Europe's largest utilities."

The AP (11/28, Barr) reports, "The proposal follows others in the European utility sector, where Germany's E.On AG is trying to buy Spain's Endesa SA and Gaz de France and France's Suez are planning to combine." The AP adds, "Jack McConnell, first minister of Scotland's regional government, expressed wariness, and said he would seek assurances from the European Union that the takeover would preserve competition." He "said he would seek assurances from European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso that the EU would evaluate the takeover consistent with its competition rules."

DOJ_NMG_0099198

The Financial Times (11/29, Shelley, Mulligan) reports the takeover bid "would create Europe's third largest utility – behind EdF of France and Germany's Eon – with an enterprise value of more than £43bn. But Iberdrola's successful search for a foreign tie-up, coupled with Eon's aggressive €37bn bid for Endesa, Spain's largest utility, comes as a blow for the Spanish government, which has attempted to foster the creation of national champions."

The Financial Times (11/29, Crooks) says, "Iberdrola surprised no one in launching a bid for Scottish Power. But the question many were asking was whether it would be the last of its kind for some time. A wave of mergers has swept through the European energy sector, and more consolidation has been widely expected." However, "with two of the biggest potential deals bogged down in legal and political quagmires, and this latest one viewed by the markets with a jaundiced eye, it seems enthusiasm is fading."

Dow Jones (11/28, MacDonald) says, "The deal will need approval from regulators including the European Commission, the U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and U.S. state regulatory commissions or authorities, Iberdrola said."

Novartis May Sell Off Gerber. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, A3, Berman, Whalen, Ball) reports, "Novartis AG may be prepared to sell Gerber Products Co., one of the world's largest and best-known makers of baby food, and could have a willing buyer in Nestlé SA." The Journal continues, "Novartis, a Swiss pharmaceutical concern, already is in negotiations with Nestlé, also of Switzerland, to sell a medical-nutrition business. Nestlé executives are toying with the idea of trying to make the acquisition of Gerber part of the same deal, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Novartis Chief Executive Daniel Vasella said in an interview yesterday that the company 'probably would act opportunistically' if an offer for Gerber emerged, although he added that there was no auction for Gerber under way." The Journal adds, "Gerber, of Fremont, Mich., and Novartis's medical-nutrition business together would fetch between $4 billion and $5 billion, estimate people familiar with the matter. They figure Gerber alone would be valued at more than $3 billion. … Nestlé has been hungry for Gerber for more than a decade. Even though the market for infant purées and other mushy concoctions has been relatively slow growing, the profit margin for baby food is among the highest in the prepared-food industry, at 24% in the U.S., compared with 16% for all packaged food, according to Morgan Stanley. … If Novartis decides to part with Gerber, Nestlé may have to compete with others for the business. Numico NV of the Netherlands, the maker of Nutrica baby food and other brands, is also likely to be interested, as would private-equity firms, people close to those firms say."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

High Court To Hear Arguments On Global Warming. The New York Times (11/29, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court will hear oral arguments on Wednesday on the questions of whether the federal government, particularly the Environmental Protection Agency, is authorized and obligated to take action to alleviate global warming. Massachusetts, which has been joined by 11 other states, 3 cities and 13 environmental groups, will argue that the federal agency has shirked its legal responsibility to protect the public and ignored the requirements of the Clean Air Act." The Times adds, "Federal lawyers, in tandem with those of the auto industry, are arguing that existing law is inadequate to support far-reaching regulation, and that Congress, or the foreign policy arena, or both, are the appropriate venues to produce new global warming policies."

USA Today (11/29, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The court's work on the case will focus on the scope of the federal Clean Air Act rather than the debate over emissions' impact on the climate. However, the justices' ruling could shape the US government's role in a pressing issue of the day and ultimately affect whether automakers will be required to build cleaner-running cars and trucks." The case "could have ramifications for those states because the authority to regulate emissions, even on the state level, derives from the Clean Air Act."

Writing in USA Today (11/29, 2.27M), Jonathan Adler, who teaches environmental and constitutional law at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, says that "if global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for Congress to make. … The petitioners argue that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new-vehicle tailpipes — and a superficial reading of the statutory text could suggest as much. et it is clear to all involved that the relevant statutory provisions were enacted to address local and regional pollution problems — such as soot, smog and acid rain -- not global concerns such as climate change. If global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for our elected representatives to make. … Global warming is a real concern, but global warming policy ultimately belongs to the political branches, not the judiciary."

More Commentary On EPA Cases. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A18, 2.04M) David Rivkin and Lee Casey, who "served in the departments of justice and energy under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush," write, "The Supreme Court is now considering two environmental law cases that superbly illustrate the circumstances in which judges should overturn unlawful administrative actions, and when they should affirm sensible ones. The first, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy, is one of the many enforcement actions the EPA has brought, mostly against electric utilities, under a relatively obscure part of the Clean Air Act known as 'New Source Review.'… By contrast, in Massachusetts v. EPA -- being argued today before the Supreme Court -- the court should uphold the agency's decision not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from all of the new cars and light trucks sold in the U.S."

Investment In Cleaner-Burning Coal Plants Regarded As Urgent. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) Thomas Homer-Dixon, director of the Trudeau Center for Peace and Conflict Studies at the University of Toronto, writes, "As the price of energy rises and as the planet gets hotter, we need significantly higher investment in innovation throughout society, from governments and corporations to universities. Perhaps the most urgent step, if humankind is going to return to coal as its major energy source, is to figure out ways of safely disposing of coal's harmful carbon dioxide — probably underground."

DOJ Launches Web Site On Tribal Crime. The Tulsa World (11/29) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday the launch of a Web site that will focus on crime in Indian Country. … 'I am honored to deliver the promise that I made to provide a one-stop-shop that will enhance the prevention of and response to crime and the administration of justice in Indian Country,' said Regina B. Schofield, assistant attorney general for the Office of Justice Programs. … 'This will serve as a medium for talking about promising practices across the nation. Crime knows no boundaries, and the Tribal Justice and Safety Web site is another way we are using technology to prevent crime and violence from taking root in our communities.'" The World adds, "The site's address is www.usdoj.gov/tribaljusticeandsafety. ... It is designed to serve as a single source of information about law enforcement for tribes, including crime statistics and other public safety issues, as well as a source for tribes on how the Justice Department can help them in fighting crime."

Michigan Tribal Casino Project Faces More Delays. The AP (11/29) reports, "A southwest Michigan casino project by the Gun Lake tribe faces another delay after the government pushed back its timetable for taking land into trust for the project." The AP continues, "The Justice Department said in a court filing last week that the government does not plan to take 146 acres in Wayland Township into trust for the casino before March 5, 2007. … The Interior Department was originally set to take the land into trust Jan. 5, clearing the way for the Gun Lake tribe to begin construction." The AP adds, "The delay was noted Tuesday by Station Casinos Inc. in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Las Vegas-based company said it planned to 'continue contributing significant financial support to this project, even though there can be no assurances when or if the necessary approvals will be obtained.' … Michigan Gambling Opposition, an anti-casino group, sued in 2005 to block the government from taking the land into trust. U.S. District Judge John Penn in Washington is scheduled to consider government and tribal motions for dismissal on Wednesday."

Indian Tribal Membership Cause Of More Frequent Disputes. USA Today (11/29, Bazar) reports, "Native American tribes are facing allegations of greed and racism as they purge members from their rolls and deny the applications of others." USA continues, "The expulsions have sent tremors through Indian country. Thousands of Native Americans have lost their cultural identities and access to tribal benefits, such as medical care, housing and education. Certain gaming tribes divide casino profits among members, in some cases thousands of dollars a month per person. Those expelled lose their cut." USA adds, "Tribal officials say they're protecting legitimate members by making sure everyone in the tribe is qualified. … As sovereign nations, tribes have the final say in who can — and cannot — join. Each tribe determines what degree of Indian blood is necessary for membership, a requirement that varies among the 561 federally recognized tribes." USA notes, "In California, at least 2,000 Native Americans have been taken off the rolls of their tribes since 1999, says Laura Wass, executive director of the Many Lightnings American Indian Legacy Center, an education and advocacy group in Fresno. Disenrollments have surged with the rise of Indian casinos, she says. .. Thousands of Native Americans elsewhere have lost, or may lose, their tribal status. An upcoming vote at the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma could deny citizenship to more than 1,000 of the tribe's 260,000 members. … State and federal courts do not have jurisdiction over Native American membership disputes, says Kevin Gover, law professor at Arizona State University and former assistant secretary of the Interior for Indian affairs. … 'Congress has not given individual Indians the right to sue their tribes,' he says."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Love WFO Criminal Division Chief. Under the headline "FBI Appoints Veteran For Criminal Division," The Washington Times (11/29, Seper, Cella, 88K) reports, "A veteran FBI supervisor who oversaw the investigation into the high-profile, unsolved death of a federal prosecutor in Baltimore was appointed yesterday to lead the criminal division of the bureau's Washington field office. As head of the division, Jennifer Smith Love will direct all FBI investigations in Washington and Northern Virginia focused on violent, financial and organized crime; public corruption; civil rights violations; computer crimes; and drug-related offenses. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III yesterday announced the appointment of Mrs. Love, who had been chief of the FBI's communication-exploitation section, where she led FBI efforts to disrupt the ability of terrorists to communicate with one another." The Times notes, "In May, during hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley…questioned Mrs. Love's role" in the probe of Assistant US Attorney Jonathan Luna's death, "saying she and two other agents were 'the subject of allegations' that they had conducted an unauthorized search of another agent's laptop computer. … The inspector general's review found 'credible evidence' of wrongdoing to conclude the case should have been sent through the FBI's formal disciplinary process, rather than handled as a job-performance issue."

Former FBI Clerk Pleads Guilty To Leaking Hawaii Drug Probe Information. The AP (11/29) reports, "A former clerk-secretary on the FBI's organized crime-drug squad pleaded guilty today to getting information without authorization from a computer the bureau's Honolulu office. The FBI's investigation of Charmaine Moniz led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people." The AP adds, "The FBI has said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004. In court, Moniz said she got the information to warn her husband to stay away from certain people."

Witness Discusses Role In Shooting Of Two New York Detectives. The New York Times (11/29, Brick) writes, "In walked the first member of the Stapleton Crew, described by prosecutors as a band of outlaws who shot, robbed and pummeled their way to power among the gun and drug rings of Staten Island. … His real name is Jessie Jacobus, but he gave his street handle as J-Dot." He "was summoned to …federal court in Brooklyn, in violation of what he called his principles…to testify about the murder of two undercover detectives in March 2003." On March 10, 2003 Jacobus "said, he agreed to help rob a man during a staged gun sale. The man who arrived was an undercover detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, accompanied by Detective Rodney J. Andrews, 34, whom he identified as his brother-in-law."

Report On Drug Trafficking In Afghanistan Cites Government Involvement. The AP (11/29) reports a U.N. report released Tuesday "said Afghanistan's criminal underworld has compromised key government officials who protect drug traffickers, allowing a flourishing opium trade that will not be stamped out for a generation. The fight against opium production has so far achieved only limited success, mostly because of corruption, the joint report from the World Bank and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime said. The findings show a 'probability of high-level (government) involvement' in drugs, said Doris Buddenberg, the UNODC's Afghanistan representative and co-editor of the report." The AP also notes that opium cultivation in Afghanistan "rose 59 percent this year to 6,100 tons — enough to make 610 tons of heroin, nearly a third more than is consumed by the world's drug users, according to the report." The AP story was used by the New York Times, Washington Post, and Wall Street Journal.

ATF Ends Turf War With Massachusetts Authorities Over Blast Probe. The Boston Globe (11/29) reports, "Federal and state agencies announced today that they will cooperate in the investigation into last week's chemical plant explosion in Danvers." The Globe continues, "Town and state fire officials had questioned the jurisdiction of the US Chemical Safety Board, a federal agency that investigates such incidents. A turf war erupted Saturday when investigators from the board were denied access to the blast site. … In a joint statement this afternoon, federal and state officials and Chemical Safety Board investigators are on the site today of the plant, which was shared by CAI Inc. and Arnel Co. Inc. Investigators from the State Fire Marshal's office, the Massachusetts Department of Fire Services, the Danvers Fire Department, and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives are also involved. … 'All parties have agreed to cooperate in executing their different missions,' said the statement, issued after a meeting of all the agencies this morning. 'The CSB and ATF will coordinate to ensure the integrity of the ongoing civil and criminal investigations during the access to the site.'"

Man Who Impersonated ATF Agent Sentenced To 10 Years. The AP (11/29) reports, "A man who impersonated a federal agent during an armed robbery was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in prison on charges of carrying an unregistered sawed-off shotgun and a homemade firearm silencer." The AP continues, "Prosecutors say Garfield Royes, 37 already had three felony armed robbery convictions on his record when he posed as an agent from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives during another armed home invasion. … 'Today's sentencing of Mr. Royes validates that his only career is being an authentic career criminal,' said Vanessa L. McLemore, an ATF special agent." The AP adds, "Royes donned a tank-top adorned with the letters "ATF" in 2003 while robbing a group of suspected drug dealers, said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias. .. .He was arrested in June 2003 while attempting to flee from police officers trying to search his home, prosecutors said. Police later said they found a 12-gauge sawed-off shotgun, a homemade silencer and ammunition at his home - items that Royes is banned from owning."

Man Who Skipped Out On Iowa Drug Trial Returned From Mexico. The Sioux City (IA) Journal (11/29, Hytrek, Ebaugh) reports, "It was a day later than expected, but Ryan Mathison is back on U.S. soil. … Around 6 p.m. Tuesday, Mathison and his girlfriend Janelle Rodriguez were walked halfway across a bridge into El Paso, Texas, by Mexican officials, where they were met by U.S. Marshals, said El Paso Supervisory Deputy U.S. Marshal Jerry Payan. … 'They are sitting in the El Paso County Jail awaiting extradition to Iowa,' Payan said." The Journal continues, "The pair were expelled from Mexico as "undesirables," Payan said, a faster and simpler procedure than extradition, a formal process that requires requests for extradition warrants that can take months. In expulsion, the Mexican government basically says the person in custody is not welcome. The person in custody also agrees to leave. … 'This is basically they want to leave, and Mexico wants them to leave, and they escort them to the border,' said Duane Walhof, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals Service Sioux City bureau. … 'It could be two days to two weeks before they are returned to Sioux City, depending on how fast the paperwork is processed,' Payan said." The Journal adds, "On Monday, federal officials in Sioux City announced that Mathison and Rodriguez had been located and arrested in Juarez, Mexico, Sunday afternoon. At a press conference, authorities said they expected the two to be turned over to the Marshals Service by Monday afternoon at the U.S. border at El Paso, Texas, just across the Rio Grande River from Juarez. … Mexican officials did not meet with them as expected that day. … The Sunday arrest ended a two-week search for Mathison, who, while on pretrial release, skipped town during his trial on charges that he oversaw a drug ring that transported hundreds of pounds of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico to Sioux City. The jury later found him guilty. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years in prison, a sentence that could be enhanced because he discarded his electronic monitoring device and left town. A sentencing date has not been set."

IMMIGRATION:

Migrant Latinos Turning To "Mobile Consulates" For Assistance. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A1, Millman, 2.04M) reports that a "growing number of Mexicans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans and Dominicans…working in the remote reaches of Alaska, frequently illegally… turn for help to 'mobile consulates' -- collections of diplomats from their home countries who fly from barrio to barrio around the country." These so-called "Latino circuit riders" are "experts in immigration law and lobbying" that "press schools to offer bilingual instruction" and "counsel migrant workers on the intricacies of US immigration laws." These "mobile consulates" are "doing their best to help those who make it to the US to stay here," the Journal writes. Latin American nations, it notes, have "a big incentive to keep migrants working in the US," because "they send their families at home about $50 billion a year, according to the Inter-American Development Bank."

TAX:

Rangel Calls For Scrapping AMT. The Financial Times (11/29, Guerrera) reports incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel says the "new Democrat-controlled Congress should abolish an outdated tax that could condemn up to 23m Americans to pay a total $1,000bn next year, according to the incoming head of a powerful congressional committee." Rangel said "said scrapping the alternative minimum tax (AMT) was a top priority." But his position, "presented at a meeting with New York business leaders on Tuesday, is more radical than other senior Democrats, including the incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who have talked about extending a one-year relief from AMT for middle-income taxpayers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Plan To Scrutinize Unprecedented Pentagon Spending Request. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Barnes, Spiegel, 850K) reports, "The Pentagon is preparing an emergency spending proposal that could be larger and broader than any since the Sept. 11 attacks, covering not only the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan but extending to other military operations connected to the Bush administration's war on terrorism." According to the Times, the Pentagon will request $127 billion to $150 billion in new spending next year which "may push the Defense Department into a conflict with Democrats" when they take control of Congress." The Times notes the request "stands to be larger in part because of new rules laid out in an Oct. 25 memo from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Rather than strictly limit spending to Iraq and Afghanistan costs, the memo said the services could include costs associated with military operations that are part of the larger war on terrorism. … Democratic congressional aides said the new majority on Capitol Hill was likely to push back against a request that exceeded $100 billion."

US Wearing Out $2 Billion Worth Of Equipment Every Month. USA Today (11/29, 1A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "About $2 billion worth of Army and Marine Corps equipment — from rifles to tanks — is wearing out or being destroyed every month in Iraq and Afghanistan, military leaders and outside experts say. That's equal to about a quarter of the $8 billion per month in military war costs. The wear and tear may lead to future equipment shortages and cutbacks in more advanced weapons, such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter being…says William Cohen, secretary of Defense from 1997 to 2001. … The Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to re-equip and restore units returning from Iraq, says Leon Panetta, the former Clinton White House chief of staff and member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group." USA Today notes that according to the GAO the Army and Marines "have reported using about 40% of their ground combat equipment in Iraq and Afghanistan. … A separate GAO report this month urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to investigate the Pentagon's planning for repair, maintenance and replacement of war equipment."

Bush Aides Feel Under Siege As Hearings Approach. The White House Bulletin/US News (11/28) reports, "With the new incoming Democratic House and Senate chairs of key policy committees pledging a wave of oversight hearings, White House officials say they are starting to feel under pressure as they prepare to testify starting as early as January." One key aide said, "Many of us feel under siege." The Bulletin adds aides "working in the issue areas of education, terrorism, national security and defense are especially concerned about the hearings Democrats are promising to hold." Two former aides tell the Bulletin and US News "that they are advising former colleagues to prepare to testify on their actions over the past five years." "We don't know for sure who will be going up to testify but everybody in the top offices should be prepared for an invitation," said one of the former Bush advisors.

Medicare Drug Program $13 Billion Under Budget. The Washington Times/AP (11/29) reports the Medicare prescription drug benefit "has cost nearly $13 billion less than expected this year -- a rare federal program coming in under budget -- and projections show it will cost about $200 billion less in its first decade than initially estimated." President Bush "credits competition among the dozens of private insurance companies administering the program for the cost coming in at $30 billion in 2006, about 30 percent below the projected $43 billion." But figures "provided to the Associated Press by the agency that oversees the benefit for the elderly and disabled show two other factors: lower-than-expected enrollment and drug prices that went up less than expected before the benefit kicked in."

Bush And Webb Reportedly Exchanged Heated Words At White House Reception. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Shear, 690K), in a front-page profile of Sen.-elect James Webb titled, "In Following His Own Script, Webb May Test Senate's Limits," reports that at a White House reception Webb "tried to avoid President Bush" and "declined to stand in a presidential receiving line or to have his picture taken with" Bush. According to the Post, Bush "found" Webb and asked him "How's your boy?" referring to Webb's son Jimmy who is serving with the Marines in Iraq. Webb answered, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." To which Bush responded "That's not what I asked you…How's your boy?" The Post reports Webb shot back "coldly": "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President." The Hill (11/29, Heil) reports Webb "confessed that he was so angered by this that he was tempted to slug" Bush.

Webb Expected To Operate Independently Of Other Senate Democrats. The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Shear, 690K) reports Webb "was narrowly elected to the U.S. Senate this month with a brash, unpolished style that helped win over independent voters. .. If the exchange with Bush two weeks ago is any indication, Webb won't be a wallflower, especially when it comes to the war in Iraq. And he won't stick to a script drafted by top Democrats. 'I'm not particularly interested in having a picture of me and George W. Bush on my wall,' Webb said in an interview yesterday in which he confirmed the exchange between him and Bush. 'No offense to the institution of the presidency, and I'm certainly looking forward to working with him and his administration. [But] leaders do some symbolic things to try to convey who they are and what the message is.'"

Rice Sets Record For Time Without Deputy. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "will break the modern indoor record for being without a deputy secretary of state." Kamen notes that "even if Rice named someone now, there wouldn't be confirmation until early next year, so the record will be hers."

Schwab Says Bush Will Pursue Aggressive Trade Agenda. The AP (11/29, Crutsinger) reports US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said "the president still hopes to achieve bipartisan support for an aggressive trade liberalization agenda in the next Congress even with Democrats in control." Schwab said the Administration would "continue to push for the conclusion of global trade talks known as the Doha Round before negotiating authority expires on June 30. She said the administration also hopes to wrap up negotiations by early next year on free trade deals with South Korea and Malaysia and said that talks should be concluded soon with Panama." Speaking to the US Chamber of Commerce, Schwab "warned against any move to erect protectionist barriers against the flow of goods into the country, something that critics say are needed in the face of record-high trade deficits they contend are costing American jobs."

Paulson Warns Against Protectionist Sentiment. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Solomon, 2.04M) reports in a London speech to the Confederation of British Industry and in remarks to reporters, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "warned that protectionist sentiment is rising all over the world, partly because 'the benefits of trade are not spread evenly in any part of the world.' But he said it would be 'morally wrong' to give in to 'protectionist elements.'" Paulson's remarks "echo some of the themes that have been sounded by Democratic Party critics of globalization in the U.S., and like-minded people in other countries." In contrast with "those who would seek to slow the pace of globalization and prevent the completion of the current Doha round of world trade talks, Mr. Paulson argued that it is essential that globalization continue in order to assure future prosperity of developed and developing countries."

GAO Finds CIS Lost 111,000 Files. The Washington Post (11/29, A21, Hsu, 690K) reports senators released a Government Accountability Office report yesterday that found US Citizenship and Immigration Services has lost track of 111,000 alien files, or A-files, "in 14 of the agency's busiest district offices and processed as many as 30,000 citizenship applications last year without the necessary files." The GAO conducted a review "at the request of Sens. Charles E. Grassley and Susan Collins after US authorities granted citizenship in 2002 to a man without checking his primary file. The file, which was lost, indicated ties to the militant Islamic group Hezbollah." A CIS "official said workers probably checked most of the files but failed to make note of it. … Steven J. Pecinovsky, an agency liaison to the GAO, said workers are not required to note that they have checked A-files but will be in the future."

In an article appearing on more than 40 news websites, the AP (11/28) reported, "The missing files also cause delays for immigrants with no security issues from becoming U.S. citizens, the senators said. The senators said the agency agreed with the GAO to require workers to record whether an A-file was used to process a naturalization application and to use an automated file tracking system."

Pelosi Passes Over Hastings For Intelligence Chair. The AP (11/29, Shrader) reports that in a decision "that could roil Democratic unity in the new House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi passed over Rep. Alcee Hastings Tuesday for the chairmanship of the Intelligence Committee." Hastings, currently "the No. 2 Democrat on the panel, had been aggressively making a case for the top position, supported by members of the Congressional Black Caucus." But his "critics pointed out that he had been impeached when he was a federal judge and said naming him to such a sensitive post would be a mistake just as the Democrats take over House control pledging reforms."

The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Pelosi "gave no indication of who would get the post, but aides indicated that a decision could follow quickly this week in a bid to resolve the issue, which has been used by her critics to try to isolate the California Democrat and incoming House speaker." The "criticism of her leadership is striking given that no other speaker before her has had the same length of service on the intelligence panel as Ms. Pelosi. As speaker, she will have the power to single-handedly appoint the chair and members for the new Congress, but her discretion has been challenged by allies of fellow Californian, Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's ranking Democrat, who has campaigned for the post." If Pelosi "holds firm, as expected, and doesn't name Ms. Harman to the post, she has several options. One is to elevate Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D., Texas), a Vietnam veteran and former member of the U.S. Border Patrol before coming to Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Miller, 850K) reports Pelosi's "decision leaves a hole in the Democratic leadership ranks. The anticipated elevation of Hastings as chairman and the expected removal of Harman from the panel were seen as efforts to settle a debt with the Congressional Black Caucus, to which Hastings belongs: Another caucus member had been bumped from the panel in 2001 when Harman returned to Congress — and regained her seniority on the committee — after an unsuccessful run for governor of California." Democratic aides "indicated that Pelosi would probably tap someone not on the committee to become its chairman."

The New York Times (11/29, Mazzetti, Zernike, 1.16M) reports members of Pelosi's staff "had said she favored Mr. Hastings. But his position was weakened because he was impeached and removed as a federal judge in 1989 in connection with a bribery case. He was subsequently acquitted in the criminal case." For Pelosi, "who had hammered the Republicans for ethical lapses in the fall campaigns, the decision to pass over Mr. Hastings was a sign that she did not relish another battle after the Democratic caucus rejected her choice for majority leader, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania. On the other hand, her decision risked alienating the influential Congressional Black Caucus, which had strongly backed Mr. Hastings."

The Washington Post (11/29, A1, Weisman, Slevin, 690K) reports in a front page story, "The decisions came despite lobbying by conservative Democrats on Harman's behalf and a full-throttled campaign by Hastings to overcome the stigma of the 1988 impeachment that drove him from his federal judgeship." Instead of "picking Harman or Hastings, Pelosi will look for a compromise candidate, probably Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), but possibly Rep. Norman D. Dicks (Wash.), a hawkish member of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, or Rep. Sanford Bishop (Ga.), a conservative African American with experience on the intelligence committee." Hastings "took a shot at conservatives and media voices who have come out strongly against his appointment. 'Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet,' he wrote."

The Washington Times (11/29, Hurt, 88K) reports Pelosi "received intense criticism after suggestions that she would elevate Mr. Hastings to the top spot. Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argued that the former federal judge would be a poor choice for chairman because he was charged in 1981 with accepting a $150,000 bribe. A jury acquitted Mr. Hastings after a key witness refused to testify." Still, "a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives later impeached Mr. Hastings on a 413-3 vote with support from Mrs. Pelosi and others in Congress who now support Mr. Hastings. The Democrat-led Senate convicted Mr. Hastings and he was removed from office."

Capuano Describes Democrats' Transition To Majority As "Disjointed." The Hill (11/29, Bolton) reports Rep. Michael Capuano, "heading the day-to-day transition of House Democrats from minority to majority party," says the "process has become 'disjointed' and that leaders need to do a better job communicating with each other." Capuano "also said the inevitable messiness of a new party taking over the House is just part of the democratic process. … 'A lot of people have their hands in it right now but the coordination isn't where I would like it to be." The Hill continues, "Capuano said that there has been confusion over the importance of seniority. He said there is a perception that seniority is virtually the sole factor in determining committee leadership and makeup, adding that has not been true for years."

Labor, House Democrat Leaders Meet To Discuss Agenda. The Hill (11/29, Bolton) reports, "Labor union representatives, liberal leaders, and aides to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) met yesterday to begin work on a broad lobbying push to promote Pelosi's 100-legislative-hour agenda with a campaign expected to mimic the one that helped defeat President Bush's proposed reforms to Social Security." The meeting is "a signal that interest groups allied with Democrats are going on the offensive, transitioning from the defensive crouch they have held for much of Bush's time in office." The "purpose of the gathering was to ensure that party allies are unified during the first crucial weeks of the Democratic majority and that the agenda Democrats campaigned on this fall does not become entangled by interest-group squabbles and competition." Party strategists "are speculating that they will have a brief window of legislative productivity before a curtain of partisanship falls across town as Republicans and Democrats gear up for the 2008 presidential election." The "first priority of the lobbying plan is to pass a minimum-wage increase. The campaign will also focus on allowing the government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, repealing tax benefits for oil companies, and cutting the interest rate for student loans." The "strategic advantage of the 100-hour agenda is that it is made up of proposals that are broadly popular, thereby allowing the Democrats' allies to achieve consensus and work together from the start of next year. After that agenda is passed, groups are likely to go off in their own directions and clash over competing priorities."

Liberal Activists Moderate Their Influence Over Congressional Democrats. The Hill (11/29, Schor) reports, "After a long battle with conservatives on social issues and judicial nominations, Democratic-aligned interest groups are hailing the coming congressional changeover and weighing exactly how and when to exert their influence. … NARAL has aimed its recent efforts less at preserving women's right to an abortion than at making the procedure, as former President Clinton first put it, 'safe, legal and rare.' One of the family-planning packages strongly backed by NARAL and Planned Parenthood boasts as its chief sponsor new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who describes himself as pro-life." The Hill adds that on gay-rights issues, Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese "took a respectful view of the long to-do list facing his Democratic allies. 'One of the most important things we can do is be sensitive to the fact that the new leadership in this Congress…have a huge responsibility to speak to the issues the American people couldn't have been clearer about in putting them there: the war in Iraq and corruption in government."

Reid Sets Agenda For Senate's Next Session. The AP (11/29, Pickler) reports Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry Reid said "he's doing away with the 'do-nothing Congress' that Democrats campaigned against and plans to keep senators working long hours — focusing first on ethics, the minimum wage and stem cell research." Reid said he would "tackle those priorities after cleaning up the 'financial mess' the outgoing Republican Congress is leaving behind, a reference to nine long-overdue spending bills covering 13 Cabinet departments for the budget year that began Oct. 1." The "must-pass legislation totals more than $460 billion and could divert time from other items on the Democratic agenda."

McConnell Pledges Cooperation On Minimum Wage, Ethics Reform. The Washington Post (11/29, A21, Pianin, 690K) reports, "Sounding a conciliatory note, the new Senate Republican leader vowed yesterday to work with Democrats to pass a minimum-wage increase and a strong ethics reform package shortly after the new Democratic-controlled Congress begins work next year." Senate Minority Leader-elect Mitch McConnell (Ky.) "described as 'easy stuff' much of the Democrats' opening agenda, including a proposal to boost the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour and a congressional ethics package that would ban gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, as well as impose new controls on the budget deficit. These issues, however, have not proved to be easy before." McConnell said he "is urging bolder action. He challenged House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to push for a long-term solution to financing the Social Security system and for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws." In a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters, McConnell said, "One thing I hope we can do, now that we have the election out of the way, is see if we can quit kicking the can down the road on a number of significant issues. Left over from last year, I would put immigration at the top of the list. But I also share the view...that this would be the perfect time to tackle Social Security."

Fiscal Conservatives Prepare Strategy. The Washington Post (11/29, A2, Murray, 690K) in its "Political Dispatch" column reports, "In Congress, the minority life is mostly talk and little action, and yet for" conservative GOP lawmakers and "advocates of minimal spending and low taxes, that may not turn out to be so bad. It's easier to promote fiscal discipline in theory than to practice it as a party leader or committee chairman." One "chief target of the budget hawks is a group of Democratic House freshmen who won seats in conservative districts, including the Florida seat that was held by disgraced Rep. Mark Foley, and Tom DeLay's former seat in Texas. Republicans call these 'rented seats' and hope to win them back in 2008." When the GOP was in the minority in the 1980s they "sought to force Democrats to vote against small spending reductions, often fractions of a percent." And as longtime GOP aide Stuart Roy "pointed out, these little-noticed maneuvers helped Republicans build a case that Democrats' spending habits had spiraled out of control." And on taxes "fiscal conservatives will act as chief defenders of the numerous temporary tax cuts that Republicans have passed since President Bush took office." The Post notes, "The first showdown will come over the alternative minimum tax, which Democrats have vowed to address early in their tenure."

GOP Adjusting To Minority Status. The Hill (11/29, O'Connor) reports, "The Republican retreat from ornate leadership chambers and spacious committee offices has been a harsh awakening for members of the outgoing majority, but that is just one of the many difficult realities GOP members and staff must accept about life in the minority. Still stinging from their midterm defeat, leaders in the House must rewrite the party's internal rules to adapt to their diminished status and reorganize the Steering Committee to decide who will serve on each committee and who will be the ranking Republican before slinking off to the offices allocated to them."

Hensarling, Tiahrt Compete For Study Committee Post. The Hill (11/29, O'Connor) reports that a "major fight is brewing among conservatives in the House to elect the next chairman of the Republican Study Committee." Reps. Jeb Hensarling and Todd Tiahrt "have been calling members…to ask for their support in the election next Wednesday. … Many staffers consider Tiahrt, an appropriator, as the leadership-backed candidate who would mute the influence of conservative agitators as Republicans try to unite in the minority."

Senators Press For More Social Security Administration Funding. The Washington Post's (11/29, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "54 senators" -- 42 Democrats and 12 Republicans -- "have sent an appeal to the Senate leadership asking that the Social Security Administration receive adequate funding to avert workplace disruptions." The senators "called for a fiscal 2007 appropriation that would add $401 million to the agency's administrative account. Without the money, Social Security would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices for 10 days next year, the senators said." The Post adds that several agencies with the exception of DoD and DHS are bracing for possible cuts in funding as Congress has not yet passed a host of fiscal 2007 spending bills, and adds the "Senate's bill for Social Security would provide $9.1 billion for the agency's administrative expenses, $401 million less than the president requested and $54 million below what was appropriated in fiscal 2006. The House bill would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking."

Controversial State Department Official Receives Award For Service. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced this week that the recipient of this year's Edward R. Murrow Award for Excellence in Public Diplomacy is "none other than Alberto Fernandez, head of public diplomacy for the Mideast. Fernandez, who speaks Arabic fluently, is best known in this country for having told al-Jazeera television back in October that Washington had been arrogant and stupid in Iraq."

USAF Declines Food Donation From Nuns Who Damaged Silo Fence. The Washington Times (11/29, Richardson, 88K) reports, "Three nuns were thwarted yesterday in their effort to pay their debt to society with food instead of cash when officials at two Colorado Air Force bases refused to accept their donations. The Dominican sisters -- Carol Gilbert, Jackie Hudson and Ardeth Platte -- had collected thousands of cans of food in an effort to pay the military $3,082 in restitution for cutting through a chain-link fence at a Colorado missile silo in 2002. … But airmen at Buckley Air Force Base here turned away two pickup trucks loaded with thousands of cans of food yesterday, telling volunteer drivers that the facility had just received a large donation of food and had nowhere to store the nuns' delivery."

Policeman's Death Underscores Danger Caused By Presidential Motorcade. McClatchy (11/29, Thomma) reports presidential motorcades "can be dangerous. The most recent reminder: the death this week of a Honolulu motorcycle officer who was injured while escorting President Bush during a brief stop en route home from Asia. Sure, the president is safe in his limousine - so safe that no one can remember a commander in chief buckling his seat belt. But the rest of the entourage is at risk of accidents and injuries, and they happen more often than most people realize." McClatchy notes Steve Favela "suffered fatal injuries when he and two other officers crashed as the motorcade sped across Hickam Air Force Base on rain-slicked pavement."

Bernanke Says Economy Remains At Risk From Inflation, Housing Slump. The AP (11/29, Aversa) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said Tuesday that risks from inflation or a worse-than-expected housing slump could further complicate things for an economy that already is in slowdown mode." Speaking to the National Italian American Foundation in New York, Bernanke said, "The deceleration in economic activity currently under way appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned." He added that the "slowdown in overall activity mostly reflects the housing slump, he said. As the economy cools, inflation also should continue to gradually ease over the next year or so, the Fed chief added." Overall inflation "has showed signs of improving in recent months as once surging energy prices have calmed down. However, 'core' prices - which exclude energy and food and are closely watched by the Fed - still remain 'uncomfortably high,' Bernanke said."

ABC World News (11/28, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In economic news, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke says he expects the economy to enjoy moderate growth next year despite a slowdown in the housing market but he warned that inflation is still a danger. Analysts said they heard nothing that would signal nothing if the Fed would cut interest rates soon as some on Wall Street would hope."

USA Today (11/29, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports Bernanke said "the economy is growing at a 'solid pace' outside of housing and manufacturing, but a key inflation measure remains 'uncomfortably high.'" Bernanke said "it would be 'especially troublesome' if price pressures don't moderate, as the Fed has forecast." Economists "interpreted Bernanke's comments as a sign the central bank is not likely to cut interest rates anytime soon and could be forced to raise them in coming months to keep price pressures under control."

The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Ip, Gerena-Morales, Corkery, 2.04M) reports that in a "contrast with the widely held view on Wall Street that slower economic growth will lead to interest-rate cuts, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered an upbeat assessment of the nation's economy, warning that tight labor markets could put more pressure on wages and prices." Many investors "point to declining housing construction, mixed news on holiday sales and a tame reading on inflation as indications that the economy is weakening, inflation risks are fading and that the next move by the Fed will be to cut interest rates, perhaps as soon as next spring. However, Mr. Bernanke's hawkish message suggests rate cuts are unlikely in the months to come." But "stock and bond markets barely reacted -- underscoring how, in recent months, Fed officials and investors increasingly have seemed to be looking at two different economies."

The Washington Post (11/29, D2, Henderson, 690K) gives the story a positive spin with the headline, "Fed Chief Optimistic Of Soft Landing; With Eye on Inflation and Jobs, Bernanke Remains Upbeat." The Post reports "the nation's central bank is growing more confident that the U.S. economy will slow gradually in a way that should cause inflation to decline without tipping the nation into a recession, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday."

The Financial Times (11/29) reports Bernanke "appeared to head off talk of imminent US interest rate cuts by warning that inflation remained 'uncomfortably high.'" Bernanke's speech "follows days of jitters in financial markets, with investors betting that US economic weakness would force the Fed to cut interest rates next year, undermining the dollar." Bernanke's "message was reinforced by Hank Paulson, US Treasury Secretary, who told reporters in London the US economy was making a 'successful transition' to a more sustainable rate of growth, and by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which said the outlook for the world economy remained bright."

Stock Markets Rise Slightly Despite Bernanke's Inflation Worries. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Stocks edged higher despite troubling comments about interest rates from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke." The gains "erased little of Monday's steep market drop, which included a 158.46-point decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. After sliding further in early trading, the blue-chip average ended the day up 14.74 points, or 0.1%, at 12136.45, 13.2% higher for the year." The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "also opened the session lower but climbed 4.82 points for the day to end at 1386.72, up 11.1% for the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.69 points to 2412.61, up 9.4% for the year. Both were up 0.3% for the day."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today modest gains after yesterday's stock sell off. The Dow was up almost 15 points [to close at 12,136.45]. NASDAQ was up almost 7 points [to close at 2,412.61]."

Previously-Owned Home Sales Pick Up, But Prices Fall. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, Gerena-Morales, Corkery, 2.04M) reports new data 'offered a mixed picture of the housing sector's condition as home sales picked up, but prices fell. Meanwhile, the first look at business investment in the fourth quarter revealed a sharp pullback, indicating that business spending won't lend as much support to economic growth as some analysts had been expecting." The National Association of Realtors "reported that previously owned home sales rose 0.5% from the previous month to a seasonably adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million units, which is up from an upwardly revised September sales pace of 6.21 million." It was the "first monthly rise in sales that the trade group has reported in eight months. But the national median home price plummeted 3.5% to $221,000 from a year ago -- the largest year-over-year price drop since the trade group began keeping records in 1968, and 'it's probably the largest price drop since World War II,'' said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist."

NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 5, 0:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The housing market…is in the midst of a painful kind of correction. Sales of existing homes posted a small increase, half a percentage point, last month after seven straight months of declines. But home prices fell by a record amount, down 3.5% from a year ago. It is the biggest year-over-year price decline ever. It is also the third month in a row that prices have dropped. That's the longest stretch of price declines on record in US history. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned today that a slump in the housing market that is more severe and widespread than the experts have been predicting is indeed possible but he said, as of now, he's still on the lookout for inflation pressures and he thinks the economy will grow at a moderate pace."

The Washington Post (11/29, D1, Brubaker, 690K) reports US existing home prices "dropped a record 3.5 percent last month, compared with the same month a year earlier, while the total number of residences sold fell 11.5 percent compared with October 2005, according to an industry report released yesterday." The "largest drop in sales prices -- 7 percent, or double the national average -- came in the South, which includes the Washington area."

USA Today (11/29, Knox, 2.27M) reports, "Prices of existing homes — which fell a record 3.5% last month — will likely drop further through year's end, delivering the bitter medicine needed to restore the health of the housing market, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday." Today, "the Commerce Department will release October sales figures for new homes. Those figures are expected to show more weakness."

The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Sanchez, 850K) reports, "In California, October results were the opposite, with sales, excluding condominiums, slipping 0.3% from the previous month and the median sales price gaining 2% from October 2005 to $548,680, according to the California Assn. of Realtors." The "modest rebound in sales may indicate that the nationwide housing slow down might be bottoming out — but any noticeable relief for sellers probably won't come until next year, according to some housing observers." NAR economist David Lereah said in a statement, "After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007." The Times adds, "But other economists say a turnaround is still far away, with many signs pointing to a buyer's market for some time to come. For example, the inventory of unsold homes, increased 1.9% in October to 3.85 million existing homes."

Dollar Falls To 20-Month Low Versus Euro. The Washington Post (11/29, D1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) reports the US dollar "fell to a 20-month low against the euro Tuesday, the latest development in a year-long currency readjustment that could make some imported goods more expensive, but could also help American workers by boosting exports." Traders are "not entirely sure why the currency is falling, but several pointed Tuesday to signs of economic weakness in the United States and strength in Europe. That is fueling expectations that interest rates will rise in Europe relative to the United States, prompting investors to move assets out of dollars." Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. "reacted to the decline by speaking Tuesday of his support for a 'strong dollar.'" But as he "said the words, though, Paulson was preparing for a trip to China, during which he plans to press officials there to raise the value of China's currency, and thus lower the value of the dollar."

WSJournal Claims Uncertainty Over Democratic Congress Behind Dollar's Fall. The Wall Street Journal (11/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The dollar's recent weakness against the euro and other currencies has brought out the usual suspects to blame the usual suspects. That is, the crowd that has long believed the greenback needs to be devalued because of the large U.S. trade deficit is declaring that day has finally arrived. The fact that the dollar has held up well for years despite the trade deficit doesn't seem to matter to this conventional wisdom." The Journal adds, "Our view is simpler: When U.S. economic policies look like they might take a turn for the worse, dollar-denominated assets lose some of their allure. So, for example, when the new Democratic majority in Congress talks about raising taxes on capital gains and dividends, investors in U.S. financial and corporate assets get the jitters. And when U.S. monetary policy accommodates more inflation, investors also look for other places to put their marginal cash."

NRSC Letter Acknowledges Debt. The AP (11/28, Kuhnhenn) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee, "which lagged behind other national party committees in fundraising the past two years, emerged from the Nov. 7 election in debt and is soliciting donations to get out of the red." In an "urgent appeal to donors this week, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, "the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, beseeched contributors to 'help us retire our debt.'" Dole said, "If we let this debt linger, it will cripple our efforts to recruit great candidates for the next election and begin our drive to win the one additional seat we need to regain the Senate majority." The AP adds that as of "Oct. 18, the date of the last financial reports to the commission, the NRSC had $8.9 million of cash on hand. At that point in the two-year election cycle, it had raised $77.9 million and spent $70 million."

Wulsin Concedes To Schmidt In Ohio's 2nd CD. The AP (11/29) reports, "Three weeks after Election Day, Democrat Victoria Wulsin conceded to Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt on Tuesday but suggested that she might run again." Wulsin "conceded just before Clermont County reported final unofficial results that showed Schmidt with an overall total of 120,112 votes, or 50.5 percent, to 117,595 votes, or 49.5 percent for Wulsin."

Undervotes Could Determine Outcome In Florida's 13th CD. The Washington Post (11/29, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports "almost since the time the votes were tallied" in Sarasota "on election night, the race for Florida's 13th Congressional District has been surrounded by a contentious mystery: Why were there no votes for Congress recorded from more than 18,000 people who chose candidates in other races?" The answer is "central not only to the outcome of the election, which for now has been won by Republican Vern Buchanan by a mere 369 votes and is in litigation, but also to the ongoing debates over whether the electronic voting systems in use nationwide can yield reliable tallies and recounts." There are "three theories, and lots of political and legal posturing. Maybe, as scores of voters have claimed, there were glitches with the touch-screen systems and they dropped votes. Or maybe voters overlooked the congressional race simply because of a confusing ballot design. Or maybe, as some say, an astoundingly high number of Sarasota County residents decided to forgo voting in the high-profile race."

Dean's 2004 Webmaster Seeking Position With McCain Campaign. The Hill (11/29, Kaplan) reports, "Several sources said that Nicco Mele, the CEO of EchoDitto, an internet strategy firm, and Howard Dean's webmaster when Dean was running for president in the 2004 cycle, has let it be known that he wants to work for Sen. John McCain if he runs for president."

Hagel 2008 Bid Seen As More Realistic After GOP's Midterm Losses. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (11/29, A23) writes, "A month ago the idea that Sen. Chuck Hagel would make a serious run for the Republican presidential nomination would have been a non-starter. … It's a measure of the step change brought about by the Nov. 7 elections that Hagel is now seriously exploring a GOP presidential bid." Hagel "says he will make a formal decision in the next two months on whether to run." Ignatius contends that, "What would make a Hagel candidacy interesting is that he can claim to have been right about Iraq and other key issues earlier than almost any national politician, Republican or Democratic. … It strains credulity to imagine that a GOP controlled by Bush and Karl Rove could learn to love Hagel, but, as the Nebraskan says, this is a time of 'transformational politics.'"

Morris Says Women Want Democratic Presidential Candidate. In his column in The Hill (11/29), Dick Morris says, "What women want is a woman president. And their voting preferences are showing how strongly they feel." According to "the Gallup Poll of November 9-12, both Democratic and Republican women disproportionately support their party's potential female candidates. While it has not been unusual to see polls showing a bias by female voters in favor of women who run on the Democratic Party line, most of these surveys have failed to distinguish whether it is party or gender that is attracting female voters. And, until recently, Republican women have not shown a preference for a female candidate." But the Gallup Poll "tested Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-

N.Y.) in a Democratic primary field and Condoleezza Rice in a Republican match-up. Among both sexes, Hillary ran first in her party with 31 percent of the vote, followed by newly hyped Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) at 19 percent, John Edwards, likely benefiting from his wife's best-selling book, at 10 percent, Al Gore at 9 percent and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), probably suffering from his foot-in-mouth disease, back at 7 percent." On the Republican side, Rudy Giuliani "led with 28 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) at 26 percent, Rice at 13 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) at 7 percent, outgoing Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney at 5 percent and soon-to-be-former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) at 4 percent." But Clinton "was favored by 38 percent of the women in the Gallup Poll's Democratic Primary match-up but got only 23 percent of the men. On the Republican side, Rice won 18 percent of the women and only 8 percent of the men. Such a dramatic gender gap, on each side of the partisan divide, illustrates the power of a woman candidate, from either party, running for president."

Organizer Of Anti-Hillary PAC Is Also Giuliani Contributor. The New York Times (11/29, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports campaign finance reports show a "leading organizer of a political action committee created to derail Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects is also a major contributor to Rudolph W. Giuliani." The organizer, Richard Collins, "a principal figure behind the group Stop Her Now, has given $10,000 to Mr. Giuliani's political action committee Solutions America over the last two years, according to campaign finance disclosure documents." On a Website "posted Monday, the Stop Her Now group says that its goals include attempting 'to shed light on the real Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America.'" While the Giuliani camp "has no direct connection to Stop Her Now, some Democrats argued yesterday that Mr. Giuliani — who seems poised for a possible presidential run of his own — should disavow the personal nature of the criticisms that the group is leveling at Mrs. Clinton." Stop Her Now "is among the newest of the so-called 527 advocacy groups whose prominence has grown in recent years." Collins, "a wealthy Texas businessman, funneled $80,000 into the group's coffers in the last few months, making him the group's single largest donor in the third quarter of 2006, according to the disclosure documents."

Christian Coalition's Designated President Resigns. The Washington Post (11/29, A13, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "For the second time in little more than a year, the Christian Coalition of America named a new leader and then removed him before he ever fully took the reins of the conservative political advocacy group. The Rev. Joel Hunter, pastor of a nondenominational megachurch in Longwood, Fla., said he resigned as the coalition's incoming president because its board of directors disagreed with his plan to broaden the organization's agenda." Hunter "wanted to take on such issues as poverty, global warming and HIV/AIDS."

Bush Supports Adding More Countries To Visa-Waiver Program. USA Today (11/29, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Tuesday that he wants more countries in a program that allows foreigners to stay in the USA without visas, despite criticism that the move could open the door to terrorists. 'We want people to come to our country,' Bush said in Tallinn, Estonia, one of several European countries that have asked to be included in the visa-waiver program, in which 27 foreign countries now participate. 'It's in our nation's interest that people be able to come and visit.'" Bush "said his administration aims to add more countries to the program, created to facilitate tourism and business travel 15 years before the 9/11 attacks increased fears of terrorism. He pledged to ensure that 'those that want to continue to kill Americans aren't able to exploit the system.'" The Washington Post/AP (11/29, A9) notes "officials did not say which other countries the administration might try adding to the program. Countries from Central and Eastern Europe have expressed interest in entering the program, which lets travelers enter the United States with only a passport."

The Washington Times (11/29, Dinan, 88K) reports "the proposed expansion would run athwart concerns that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) cannot keep up with the 27 countries already approved, as the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative branch, found in a July report. 'DHS cannot effectively monitor the law enforcement and security risks posed by visa waiver countries on a consistent, ongoing basis because it has not provided [the Office of International Enforcement] with adequate staffing and resources,' GAO investigators concluded, adding they also found 'weaknesses' in how DHS talks with overseas posts working on visa issues."

Bush Praises Estonia's Flat Tax. The AP (11/29, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush says the United States should have a simpler tax system. Apparently he has found one he likes -- Estonia's. In a brief stop in the Baltic nation on Tuesday, Bush managed to tout Estonia's flat income tax three times. 'They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple,' Bush said in Tallinn after getting a look at how Estonian citizens can file their taxes online." The AP adds, "In a toast about an hour later to Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, Bush said, 'I am amazed to be in a country that has been able to effect a flat tax in such a positive way.'" And "before fielding reporters' questions with Ilves, Bush again praised Estonia's approach to taxation. 'I appreciate the fact that you got a flat tax, you got a tax system that's transparent and simple,' he said."

Rice To Meet With Abbas In Push To Restart Talks. The AP (11/29, Daraghmeh) reports Secretary Rice "put Washington's heft behind new Mideast peace overtures on Tuesday, scheduling an unexpected meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas this week." The meeting was announced a day after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called on the Palestinians to return to peace talk, and Rice's visit "was seen as a further push to use the momentum to start new peace talks." Rice will meet Abbas Thursday in the West Bank town of Jericho, and Assistant Secretary McCormack "raised the possibility that she would also meet with an Israeli official."

Jordan's Abdullah Expected To Push For Peace Talks In Meetings With Bush. In a report from Amman previewing President Bush's visit, NBC Nightly News (11/28, story 2, 2:20, Engel, 9.87M) noted, "There are many competing agendas here in Jordan tonight. King Abdullah has said he wants the revival of the Israeli-Palestinian process to be the top agenda of his meeting with President Bush. … Also Lebanon's prime minister has said he wants his conflict with Israel and internal power struggles with Hezbollah also to be part of this agenda." However, NBC says "the problem is President Bush will be on the ground here for about less than 24 hours." Similarly, the AP (11/29, Halaby) reports King Abdullah "made clear Tuesday he will press for a renewed effort to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict when he meets with President Bush." In a speech to parliament, King Abdullah "described the Israeli-Palestinian dispute as the 'core' issue in the Middle East and indicated that in his talks with Bush, he would underline the need for the United States to push for peace."

Proposed UNSC Iran Resolution Drops Mention Of Sanctions. The New York Times (11/29, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) reports the six world powers "seeking to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions are circulating a significantly weakened draft" for a UNSC resolution against Tehran's nuclear program, "in a bid to keep their fragile coalition from falling apart." The new text under consideration has "dropped all mention of sanctions against Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr," according to European diplomats. Although the US "initially proposed including Bushehr on the list of programs to single out," Russia, which has been helping to build the plant, "balked." Meanwhile, the Times says that "complicating the matter is the steady drumbeat in Washington, from inside and outside the Bush administration, calling on President Bush to initiate talks with Iran over the worsening violence in Iraq."

Iranian Opposition Group Hindered By US Terrorist Label. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (11/29, A1, Higgins, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Early this summer, as Washington fretted about Iran's nuclear program, supporters of Mujahedin-e Khalq, an Iranian opposition group, held a rally in an auditorium two blocks from the White House. Prominent members of Congress addressed the crowd, as did the State Department's recently retired ambassador-at-large for war crimes." Mujahedin-e Khalq, known as MEK, is Iran's largest exile opposition group and, "say its supporters, the best hope of bringing democracy to Iran." But with the US armed forces "bogged down in Iraq and America's military options against neighboring Iran severely limited, the MEK and its fans are lobbying hard to present the group as an ally that can help curb Tehran's growing influence." Its supporters "include lawmakers and conservative foreign-policy analysts," but "most US officials scoff at forming any alliance with the MEK and dispute its claims of having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization." Meanwhile, a senior White House official says the Bush administration continues to view the MEK as a terrorist organization and "not an advocate for democracy or human rights" in Iran.

US, North Korean Officials Meet For Second Day Of Talks. The AP (11/29, Ang) reports nuclear negotiators from the US, North Korea and China "met for a second day Wednesday, a US Embassy spokeswoman said, amid a diplomatic push to resume six-nation talks on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill met with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawai in Beijinge for a second round of talks, according to Susan Stevenson, a spokeswoman for the US Embassy in Beijing. However, she "did not have details of the discussions or whether Hill met with Wu and Kim together or separately." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the main goal of the current meetings was to "make sure that everybody, at least, has a good, solid understanding of what might happen" when six-nation talks reconvene.

Satterfield Rumored To Be Named New Ambassador To Pakistan. The Washington Post's (11/29, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In The Loop" column that "chatter at State is that Iraq coordinator David Satterfield…may be headed to Pakistan to be ambassador, replacing Ryan Crocker, who's said to be heading to Baghdad…replacing Zalmay Khalilzad, who's said to be headed to just about every top foreign policy job."

Former Russian PM Stricken With Mysterious Illness. The Financial Times (11/29, Ostrovsky) reports former Russian prime minister, Yegor Gaidar, last week suffered "a sudden, unexplained and violent illness on a visit to Ireland, a day after Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB spy, died in London from an apparent radiation poisoning." In an interview with the Times, Gaidar, who is now in a stable condition at an undisclosed Moscow hospital, "said the doctors had so far been unable to identify the cause of the violent vomiting and bleeding that he suffered during a conference in Ireland." The Times notes that news of his illness "comes after a series of mysterious incidents involving Russian public figures over the past month."

Ally Of Poisoned Ex-Spy Finds Radioactive Traces In Office. The New York Times (11/29, A10, Cowell, 1.16M) reports Boris A. Berezovsky, "an exiled Russian billionaire and fierce opponent of the Kremlin, confirmed Tuesday that the police found radioactive traces in his office after the death last week of his close associate, Alexander V. Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radiation." Berezovsky said the traces of radiation in his office had been "discovered as part of an ongoing police investigation of all the locations visited by Alexander Litvinenko" on Nov. 1. The Times says the discovery "highlighted their close ties and offered one more clue about Mr. Litvinenko's movements on…the day he first reported feeling unwell."

Blair Pledges To Pursue Probe Of Death. The Washington Post (11/29, A14, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that "there is no diplomatic or political barrier in the way" of investigating Litvinenko's death and that he planned to speak with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the matter "at any time that is appropriate."

Pope Urges All Religions To "Utterly Refuse" Violence In The Name Of Faith. The AP (11/29, Simpson) reports, "Pope Benedict XVI urged leaders of all religions Tuesday to 'utterly refuse' to support any form of violence in the name of faith, while Turkey's top Muslim cleric complained to the pontiff of growing 'Islamophobia' in the world." In turkey, Benedict "sought a careful balance as he extended friendship and brotherhood to Muslims, hoping to end the outcry from many Muslims over his remarks linking Islam to violence. He expressed support for Turkey's efforts to join the European Union, moving away from opposition he voiced when he was a cardinal." But "the German pope also hammered away at key points of his 18-month papacy, telling diplomats that leaders of all religions must 'utterly refuse to sanction recourse to violence as a legitimate expression of faith.'" He "avoided mention of any specific religion, even as he decried terrorism and the 'disturbing conflicts across the Middle East.'"

ABC World News (11/28, story 3, 2:00, Miller, 8.78M) said, "At the Vatican embassy tonight, before an assembly of ambassadors, the Pope raised an alarm over conflicts in the Middle East. Warning they could lead to even more conflicts and spread terrorism. It was a dire warning from the Pope. He may be here on a journey of reconciliation, but he clearly sees even greater divisions erupting unless peace can be achieved in the Middle East."

The CBS Evening News (11/28, story 6, 2:00, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported, "The Pope mixed the volatile combination of politics and religion again when he told members of the diplomatic corps that religions should refuse to sanction what he called recourse to violence as an expression of religion. That risked rekindling the controversy of his use of a 14th century quote calling Islam violent, and in a country that is 99% Muslim, people here expect an apology or a show of contrition. Newspapers caught the public mood: Message to the Pope, this headline reads, 'Islam is peace.' Benedict called Turkey a bridge between religions, but it is one both he and the Turkish political leadership must cross carefully for the waters beneath it are most definitely troubled."

McClatchy (11/29, Schofield) notes the Pope also "called for an 'authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims' and praised his Turkish hosts Tuesday as he began what's surely his most controversial journey since he was elevated to lead the world's 1 billion Roman Catholics in April 2005." The New York Times (11/29, Fisher, Tavernise, 1.16M) and Washington Post (11/29, Moore, 690K) run similar reports.

More Commentary. The New York Times (11/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "We hope that the pope's evolving stance -- coupled with his calls for Christian-Muslim dialogue -- will soothe popular anger in Turkey and across the Muslim world. ... As the pope champions the rights of Christians in Turkey and other Muslim lands, he should bear in mind that his words will be most effective if he makes clear that the West still has a long way to go in defending the rights of minorities."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/29, 850K) says the Pope "will meet in Turkey with a representative of a religious tradition whose sometimes violent differences with the Roman Catholic Church can be traced back to the Crusades. That personage is not, as one might think, a Muslim, but a Christian: Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I of the Eastern Orthodox Church. … News coverage of the pope's trip has focused on Catholic-Muslim relations, given the outrage in the Muslim world over a lecture in September in which Benedict quoted a medieval emperor who said Muhammad's teachings contained 'things only evil and inhuman.' … Yet the religious purpose of the journey is to strengthen relations between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern churches that do not recognize the authority of the bishop of Rome. Benedict's attitude toward these ancient churches could offer as many insights into his view of his role as any of his dealings with Muslims."

Report Shows India's Muslims Lag Behind. The New York Times (11/29, A4, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports an official panel in India has concluded that Muslims, the nation's largest religious minority, are "lagging behind" on "most things that matter." Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office, which is reviewing the report, summarized the panel's "biting conclusion," saying, "The community is relatively poor, more illiterate, has lower access to education, lower representation in public- and private-sector jobs and lower availability of bank credit for self-employment. In urban areas, the community mostly lives in slums characterized by poor municipal infrastructure." The Times notes that the report is expected to be made public "soon, but leaks in the last several weeks have already turned its contents into political fodder," with "a number of Muslim religious and political leaders have already begun to advocate quotas for Muslims."

Ukraine's Yushchenko Vows To Continue Democratic Reforms. Ukrainian President Victor Yushchenko writes in the Washington Post (11/29, A23, 690K) that since the so-called "Orange Revolution," it has been his "goal as president has been to institutionalize democracy and guarantee that it is irreversible." However, he says that "because we were preoccupied with domestic political reforms this year, we failed to communicate effectively with our international partners" about "where Ukraine stands and where we are heading." Yushchenko states that "democracy and stability" will "form the basis of [his] agenda. To this end, he vows to "continue constitutional reforms that facilitate the effective work of government and prevent a return to authoritarianism or the usurpation of power."

WPost Urges China To Rein In Its Trade Surplus. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/29, A22, 690K) writes, "Two months after a high-profile visit to China, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. is planning a December return -- this time accompanied by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke as well as a handful of fellow Cabinet members." The Post says the trip "reflects Mr. Paulson's conviction that high-level intergovernment contacts can help promote policy breakthroughs," which it calls "a worthy effort." However, the Post says "there's no certain payoff," noting that US officials have "spent the past few years urging China to rein in its trade surplus," which "has nonetheless ballooned defiantly." China's policymakers "could stoke consumption if they wanted," the Post says, "but they have not taken the step that would make the biggest difference: Raising the government's spending on social services. … Nor has China allowed its currency to rise, a move that would help to ease the trade surplus. Although the yuan has gained modestly against the dollar over the past year, it has fallen against the currencies of other trading partners."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Strikes Down Parts Of Executive Order On Terrorism (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

A Los Angeles federal judge has ruled that key portions of a presidential order blocking financial assistance to terrorist groups are unconstitutional, further complicating the Bush administration's attempts to defend its aggressive anti-terrorism tactics in federal courts.

U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released late Monday, found that two provisions of an executive order signed Sept. 23, 2001, are impermissibly vague because they allow the president to unilaterally designate organizations as terrorist groups and broadly prohibit association with such groups.

The ruling marks a victory for the Humanitarian Law Project and other plaintiffs in the case, who are seeking to provide support for the "lawful, nonviolent activities" of two groups designated terrorist organizations by the U.S. government: the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in Turkey and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), also known as the Tamil Tigers, in Sri Lanka.

They argue that federal anti-terrorism laws put charities and individual donors at risk of prosecution for providing benign assistance to foreign groups that have been added to the government's terrorism list.

David Cole, a Georgetown University law professor who is helping to represent the plaintiffs in the case, said the executive order and a related federal statute improperly allow President Bush to create "blacklists" and engage in "guilt by association."

"The court's decision confirms that even in fighting terror, unchecked executive authority and trampling on fundamental freedoms is not a permissible option," Cole said in a statement.

The ruling is the latest setback for the administration's terrorism and detention policies, in lower courts and at the Supreme Court. In August, a federal judge in Detroit ruled that a National Security Agency warrantless wiretap program is unconstitutional. The government has appealed that ruling.

Collins has previously issued similar rulings in favor of the Humanitarian Law Project, a Los Angeles group that has filed legal challenges to a 1996 anti-terrorism law and to the 2001 USA Patriot Act. Those issues are still being litigated after Congress rewrote parts of the Patriot Act.

The latest case focuses on Executive Order 13224, which is aimed at cutting off financing to alleged terrorist groups and is based on the 1977 International Emergency Economic Powers Act. Twenty-seven groups and individuals were initially named as "specially designated global terrorists" under the order -- including the PKK and the Tamil Tigers -- and hundreds more since have been added to the list.

In her ruling, Collins said the order is unconstitutional because there is "no apparent limit" on presidential authority to designate groups or individuals as terrorists. In addition, the judge ruled, language banning those "otherwise associated" with such groups is "unconstitutionally vague on its face." Collins rejected a number of other claims by the plaintiffs, however, including that the order's definition of a terrorist group is too vague.

The Justice Department said it is too early to decide on an appeal.

"We are pleased that the court rejected many of the constitutional arguments raised by the plaintiffs," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. "However, we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional."

Bruce Fein, a Justice Department official in the Reagan years who has criticized the Bush administration's broad assertions of executive power, said that appealing Collins's ruling may carry more risks for the government than simply changing the executive order's language.

"If they take this up on appeal, they risk another repudiation of this omnipotent-presidency theory that they have," Fein said.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Judge Rules 2001 Listing Of Terrorists Violated Law (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A federal judge in Los Angeles has ruled that President Bush's designation of 27 groups and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" in a Sept. 23, 2001, executive order violated the Constitution because it was made without any announced standards.

The order "provides no explanation of the basis upon which these 27 groups and individuals were designated," the judge, Audrey B. Collins of Federal District Court in Los Angeles, wrote Monday.

"The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion."

That means, Judge Collins wrote, that "the president's designation authority is constitutionally vague."

David Cole, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, said yesterday that Judge Collins had broken new ground.

"It's the first decision to challenge the constitutionality of what is clearly the broadest power to blacklist individuals and groups on the statute books," Mr. Cole said.

The designation blocks financial and other interactions with the specified groups.

The challenge was brought by the Humanitarian Law Project, a human rights organization, and by groups of Tamil immigrants and people associated with them.

The plaintiffs said they wanted to provide lawful and nonviolent support to two of the organizations designated by Mr. Bush as terror organizations, the Kurdistan Workers' Party and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

Mr. Bush's order was based on a 1977 amendment to the Trading With the Enemy Act, which gave the president broad power to block transactions when the nation faces an "unusual and extraordinary threat."

In addition to designating the 27 groups and individuals, the order authorized the Treasury secretary to add more people or groups who provided services to or were "otherwise associated with" the original ones.

The plaintiffs said they feared being designated as terrorists given the breadth of the authority granted to the Treasury Department. The chilling effect of the possibility of being designated a terrorist organization, they said, impinged on their First Amendment right to freedom of association.

Judge Collins enjoined the government from designating the plaintiffs as terrorists based on their association with the two groups they sought to support but said the ban on providing services to them was not unconstitutionally vague.

Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the government was pleased that Judge Collins upheld the ban on providing services to terrorist organizations.

"However," Ms. Scolinos said, "we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional."

The government initially responded by saying it had never used the "otherwise associated with" provision as the sole basis for a designation. It later revised its statement, saying it had done so in at least 2 of 375 further designations.

"It is axiomatic," Judge Collins ruled, "that the Constitution prohibits punishing a person for mere association."

She added that nothing in the executive order "limits its application only to those instances of association involving activity, let alone activity that furthers or advances an organization's illegal goals."

Like Mr. Bush's own authority under the 1977 law, the authority he delegated to the Treasury Department, Judge Collins wrote, "contains no definable criteria" and so "is unconstitutionally vague on its face."

Order Freezing Alleged Terrorist Funds Ruled Down (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in Los Angeles has ruled that the Bush administration violated the Constitution when it froze the assets of more than two dozen alleged terrorist groups after the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released Monday, held that an executive order Bush issued Sept. 24, 2001 — designating 27 groups and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" — was "unconstitutionally vague."

DOJ_NMG_0099223

Collins said the order was flawed because it failed to explain the criteria used to make the designations and because it included no process to challenge the decision.

"The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion," the judge said.

The ruling came in a long-running lawsuit before Collins in which humanitarian groups are seeking to support the nonviolent work of two groups that the secretary of State has designated as terrorist: the Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey; and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka.

Earlier in the case, Collins struck down portions of a law that made it a felony to provide "material support" to terrorists, saying that language in the Patriot Act, which had amended the law, was ill-defined. The Justice Department has often used the material support law in prosecuting terrorist cases.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency believed that the judge erred in her decision.

Collins' latest ruling could affect another one of the administration's most widely used authorities in its war on terrorism, although the full import of the ruling was not immediately clear.

U.S. officials have used the power to freeze the assets of hundreds of organizations and individuals around the world to try to choke off financing for what it views as illicit operations.

But Collins also said that many of the designations, especially those made by the Treasury Department rather than by Bush, were valid because they followed detailed procedures.

The executive order "was as sweeping as any in the government's post-9/11 arsenal, as it allowed the president to designate groups and individuals without finding that they fit any criteria whatsoever," said David Cole, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center. Cole was the lead counsel in the case, along with the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York civil liberties group.

Cole said Collins' ruling was limited to protecting the humanitarian groups in the pending suit from being declared terrorist groups by Bush without a fair hearing or adequate notice. But he said her reasoning did "call into question the validity of many of the existing designations." He said it remained to be seen whether those designated would file legal challenges.

Controls On Bank-Data Spying Impress Civil Liberties Board (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A civil liberties panel appointed by the White House received a classified briefing Tuesday on the Bush administration's program to monitor international banking transactions, and several members said they had come away impressed with the privacy controls in place to prevent abuses against Americans.

The program, which gives American intelligence officials access to large volumes of banking data through a Brussels consortium known as Swift, has been attacked by regulators in Europe, who view it as illegal and have threatened sanctions. But the administration gave no indication at Tuesday's briefing that it was rethinking the program, defending it as a vital tool in tracking terrorist financing.

The briefing, lasting nearly two hours, was held at the Treasury Department for the five members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, created at Congress's direction in 2004 to examine privacy issues related to the war on terror. The board received a similar classified briefing last week on the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program, created by President Bush soon after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The board's only Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, who was a senior aide to President Bill Clinton, said that before the latest briefing he had had doubts about the Swift banking program. But "I was impressed with the lengths to which these people have gone to avoid infringing on people's civil rights," Mr. Davis said in an interview. "It was less of a concern than I expected."

Democrats in Congress, however, have questioned the independence and resources of the board and its ability to inquire deeply into highly classified programs. Until last month the White House had resisted allowing the board to be briefed on the Swift and N.S.A. programs.

The White House has now allowed security clearances for the board to look at both, and for the Justice Department's inspector general to examine the N.S.A. program. Democrats have suggested that the election victory giving them imminent control of Congress spurred the White House's change of heart, an assertion that administration officials deny.

On Monday, the board gave Congressional aides a briefing on its work, and Democratic staff members raised questions about its independence, according to four officials who were present. Democratic aides said they were troubled to learn at the briefing that any final report produced by the board would be vetted by the White House and that the panel would not examine issues related to civil liberties outside American borders — for instance, at the Guantánamo Bay detention center.

Alan C. Raul, a Reagan White House adviser who is vice chairman of the panel, said that given what he heard at Tuesday's briefing, the government appeared to have tight controls to ensure that only people with clear terrorist links were made targets of the banking program.

"When you hear program operators tell you how carefully they make these judgments, it's striking, and you'd have to say impressive," Mr. Raul said. "The execution seems to be done with scrupulous attention to the privacy and civil liberties implications."

Mr. Davis, the board's Democratic member, echoed that assessment. "Based on what I've seen so far in both programs," he said of the banking and N.S.A. efforts, "I think they have struck the right balance" between detecting terrorist threats and ensuring Americans' civil liberties.

"But there's a big caveat," he added. "I don't know what I don't know, and we are looking forward to getting more information."

Man Mistakenly Abducted By C.I.A. Seeks Redress (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Nov. 28 — A lawyer for a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured while in C.I.A. custody in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons.

In May, a federal trial judge threw out the suit brought by Khaled el-Masri, who said he was an innocent victim of the Central Intelligence Agency's program of transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation. Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets.

Benjamin Wizner, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened.

Mr. Wizner said the government had not plausibly explained how national security interests might be harmed by a trial. He said President Bush acknowledged the C.I.A.'s program, known as extraordinary rendition, this summer, and it is widely known that other governments have been involved. A trial would not disclose state secrets but would merely involve "confirmation of a fact the entire world already knows," he said.

Gregory G. Katsas, a senior Justice Department lawyer, told the judges that courts must defer to the executive branch when it invokes the state secrets doctrine, which was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953.

Mr. Katsas said Porter J. Goss, who was the C.I.A. director when the suit was brought, filed a secret statement with the court outlining the agency's case against a trial. Mr. Katsas said the statement provided a detailed account of how seemingly innocuous disclosures "will have a cascading effect that will have devastating consequences" for national security.

DOJ_NMG_0099225

Mr. Masri sat stolidly in the first row of the courtroom during the 50-minute argument. A large man with graying hair cinched in a ponytail, he said in an interview later that he was infuriated with Judge Ellis's view that there might be no remedy for the injustice apparently done to him.

Mr. Masri, who was born in Kuwait, was arrested in Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003, and flown to a prison in Afghanistan, where he was held for five months. During his incarceration, he has said, he was shackled, beaten and injected with drugs.

On Tuesday, he said through an interpreter that he was kept in deplorable conditions "not fit for a human being at all." Upon arrival in Afghanistan, he said, he was told that he was in a place where he had no right to recourse for what happened to him.

"I would like an explanation for what happened," he told reporters. "I would like an apology."

Mr. Wizner, his lawyer, said that although he believed Mr. Masri was entitled to financial compensation, he was not necessarily seeking anything beyond some official expression of remorse.

United States officials have been quoted anonymously in news reports as saying that Mr. Masri's case was one of mistaken identity; intelligence authorities may have confused him with an operative for Al Qaeda with a similar name.

The officials said Mr. Masri was released in May 2004 on the orders of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, after she learned he had been mistakenly identified as a terrorism suspect. He was freed in Albania, where he was left to make his way home to Germany, which he likened to being treated "like a piece of luggage."

Mr. Masri, who had earlier been denied permission to come to the United States to attend the hearing, said he has not been able to find a job since his return to Germany. "Both my Arab and German friends keep their distance," he said.

On Wednesday, he is scheduled to meet with some Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who are exploring the rendition program and the Bush administration's increasingly frequent invocation of the state secrets doctrine to block lawsuits.

Federal Judges Consider Torture Case In Richmond Courtroom (WWVT)

By Mike Garrity

WWBT-TV, NBC 12, Richmond, VA, November 29, 2006

Journalists from around the world packed a Richmond courtroom today, as three federal judges considered whether a German man who says he was tortured by the CIA should have his case heard in U.S. Court. Today, attorneys representing the German man named Khaled El-Masri, argued the U.S. government made a mistake that it now does not want to admit.

Khaled El-Masri used an interpreter to speak to a crowd of journalists from as a far away as Russia and Germany outside Richmond's U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "I was humiliated, I was beaten, and I was drugged, and I was taken to Afghanistan against my will," says El-Masri through his interpreter.

Attorney's representing El-Masri claim that back in December 2003, the CIA kidnapped him while he was on vacation in Macedonia. They say the CIA mistook El-Masri for a terrorist with a similar name. They say the CIA flew El-Masri to Afghanistan, tortured him, and held him in a prison for months. Eventually, they say El-Masri was released and left stranded on a mountain top in Albania, a country he had never been to.

But when El-Masri tried to bring a case against the CIA in U.S. District Court this May, a judge dismissed his case. So today, El-Masri's lawyers asked for an appeal.

But both today and back in May, attorneys with the U.S. Justice Department argued that simply hearing the facts of El-Masri's case could jeopardize U.S. National Security. The government says the facts in the case could expose things like secret interrogation methods or the names of CIA operatives, but El-Masri's attorney, Ben Wizner, thinks otherwise. "That argument is not plausible. It's being used not to protect national security, but to avoid embarrassment and accountability," says Wizner.

Today U.S. Justice Department attorneys would not comment on the case. In the meantime, El-Masri says he's not looking for money, but an apology and explanation from the U.S. government. It could be months before the court of appeals rules whether to hear the case.

Unjustly Imprisoned and Mistreated, Khaled al-Masri Wants Answers the U.S. Government Doesn't Want to Give

RICHMOND, Nov. 28

Khaled al-Masri was supposed to have been disappeared by black-hooded CIA paramilitaries in the dead of night. One minute he was riding a bus in Macedonia, the next -- poof -- gone. Grabbed by Macedonian agents, handed off to junior CIA operatives in Skopje and then secretly flown to a prison in Afghanistan that didn't officially exist, to be interrogated with rough measures that weren't officially on the books. And then never to be heard from again -- one fewer terrorist in the post-9/11 world.

Instead, on Tuesday, Masri finds himself sitting in an American courtroom so elegant that even his experienced lawyers are commenting on its beautiful dark wood and graceful chandeliers. Dressed in white shirt sleeves and a modest maroon vest, Masri is waiting to see if the judges will allow the CIA to disappear him again.

This time, it's not the physical, flesh-and-blood, burly, ponytailed German citizen with six kids whom the U.S. government wants to make vanish from the face of the Earth. It's his legal case, his very right to have his argument heard in open court, that the CIA is seeking to have disappeared. They argue, citing the state-secrets privilege, that to proceed with the case would damage national security and that this damage outweighs any legal rights Masri may have.

The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District agreed with the government in May.

If they have their way this time, the pale Justice Department lawyers swaying back in their chairs before the three judges of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit would prohibit any judge and any jury anywhere from ever hearing the arguments in Masri's six legal pleadings and 40 exhibits, more than 1,000 pages in all. Much of the evidence was unearthed by German prosecutors and European Parliament investigators.

There are also the eight U.S. officials who confirmed to at least one American reporter that Masri spent months in a dank Afghan cell because a couple of CIA officials in Washington had a hunch he was someone he was not and that they just didn't move fast enough when they found out he wasn't. Countless other reporters in the United States and Europe have been told the same by unnamed government officials.

So basically, "the entire world can discuss this case . . . but not the U.S. courts?" Masri's lawyer Ben Wizner will momentarily ask the panel.

But for now, the first Invisible Man to appear on U.S. soil is listening intently to the other cases the judges have to consider before his, including one about an Internet user's First Amendment free-speech rights. Masri's translator, Ulrike Wiesner, whispers in his ear: "They can even burn the American flag here." Burning a German flag is illegal in Germany. Those crazy Americans.

Masri whispers back: "Well, let's see if that applies to us Indians." They laugh quietly.

Much of Masri's ordeal has been confirmed by the German government. He fled the civil war in Lebanon in 1985 when he was 21 and married a German woman. He was divorced 10 years later and then married a Lebanese woman. He worked as a carpenter, then truck driver, then car salesman. Since 2004 he has been unemployed and living with his children and wife in a one-room apartment.

His deteriorating living conditions were a stress on his marriage. On Dec. 30, 2003, he decided to get away, to take a bus trip to Macedonia to clear his head. To make a very long story shorter, Macedonian police took him off the bus and interrogated him at the Skopski Merak Hotel for 23 days.

This being the Internet age, Masri says in one legal declaration: From the hotel Web site "I can identify the actual room where I was held. . . . I even recognize one of the waiters who served me food during my detention there."

At some point a couple of people who sounded American showed up. On Jan. 23, 2004, things took a bad turn. Current and former CIA officials say Masri was believed to have a fake passport and the same name as someone else they were looking for.

He was eventually brought to another room where, according to his affidavit, "I felt two people violently grab my arms. . . . I then felt someone else grab my head with both hands so I was unable to move. . . . Finally they stripped me completely naked and threw me to the ground. . . . I felt a boot in the small of my back. I then felt a stick or some other hard object being forced in my anus. I realized I was being sodomized. Of all the acts these men perpetrated against me, this was the most degrading and shameful."

DOJ_NMG_0099227

For his flight to Afghanistan, Masri was blindfolded, "my ears were plugged with cotton, and headphones were placed over my ears. A bag was placed over my head and a belt around my waist. They put something hard over my nose. Because of the bag, breathing was getting harder and harder for me. . . . I began to panic."

He spent five months in a filthy secret prison set up by the CIA and guarded by Afghans. He was made to drink water so putrid it made him vomit. He slept on a single blanket, shivered through the cold months and was fed chicken bones and skin. He was beaten and interrogated many times, sometimes by people he believes to be Americans. He went on a hunger strike, lost 60 pounds.

Eventually the CIA caught up with its mistake. They argued with the State Department over whether to tell the Germans and eventually agreed they could not lie to such a close ally. So they chose to tell then-Interior Minister Otto Schily because he was thought to be Washington-friendly.

Masri was released in Albania, then flown to Germany, where he made his way home to Ulm. There, he contacted a lawyer and then the German authorities. "What I really want is for them to admit that injustice was done. I'd like an explanation and I'd like an apology," he said.

Is a state secret still a secret if everyone knows it? That's what the court case boils down to at this point.

Masri's lawyers say no.

They point to President Bush's Sept. 6, 2006, disclosure that the CIA ran secret prisons abroad and conducted covert rendition flights as part of its counterterrorism campaign.

They point to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's statement that if there were injustices in these programs, they can be remedied in U.S. courts.

They point to the testimony of Schily before the German Parliament just last week in which he said that then-U.S. Ambassador Daniel R. Coats had told him that the CIA had mistakenly imprisoned Masri and offered an apology -- not to Masri, but to the German government. They point to reams and reams of official German evidence.

The CIA and Justice Department lawyers strongly disagree. They argue that allowing a case to go forward could lead to a "cascading" of disclosures, many unforeseen, and that foreign governments would refuse to work in secret with the CIA for fear they could end up in court.

"Just because some facts are in the public domain doesn't eliminate the need to keep others secret," Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas argued Tuesday. The president's announcement, he added, has "zero overlap" with Masri's allegations. "Even disclosures to judges carry risks," he reminded them.

Before all this happened, "I was a very simple person with not many problems," Masri says, straining and pausing to find words, or gather his thoughts. "I had lots of friends. My head was not burdened with so many things. I felt more safe."

Today's Masri "has less freedom. . . . This Khaled stays mostly at home. There's too much stress. And my interests have changed. I am reading a lot now, about politics and prisoners."

He has testified before government panels in Spain, Germany and to the European Parliament investigating the CIA's covert activities. He is in the news constantly, often with allegations of alleged ties to terrorist groups. Still unemployed and reconciled with his wife, he hates the limelight. He hates the stares on the streets and the Germans who call out to him, as one did recently in the supermarket: "You are a bad man!"

He has flashbacks, too. And his mood turns bad whenever he sees war news, especially from the recent war in Lebanon, where he still has family. "I get in a bad mood and just want to be left alone in my room," he says, "to withdraw."

Today, 10 cameras are waiting for him to finish his omelet and coffee and walk into the courthouse. "I am very nervous inside," he says.

The last time Masri tried to come to the United States to listen to his court case, he and his attorney had walked off the plane in Atlanta and found 20 security guards waiting for them, both men said. He didn't have a visa because German citizens don't need visas to enter the United States. Instead of letting him in, one of officers drew his gun and threatened to shoot the lawyer if he did not put away his cellphone.

DOJ_NMG_0099228

Flying back to the United States this week, Masri expected another hostile airport scene: "I had a funny feeling. I always thought they would take me and send me back to somewhere other than home."

This time immigration authorities were polite, looked through his luggage, asked him some questions, even spoke a little German. Eventually, one of them said "Welcome to America" and let him pass to the other side.

"I think it's really good I've gotten this far," he says with a slight smile.

Asked how he feels toward the United States after all this, he shrugs.

"I never thought badly of the United States. I do think badly of the foreign policy aspects and the sitting government."

Nudge a little further and he'll say he'd like "an America without Bush."

And a little further:

"I'd like to drive with the top down in a fancy car through New York City and to look up at all the tall buildings," he laughs, looking up to the ceiling and throwing open his arms. "You've got a real view of the whole thing from a car without a top."

Democrats Seek Republican Backing To Limit Bush's Surveillance (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Nov. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats, about to take control of Congress, say they will forge a bipartisan compromise to put limits on President George W. Bush's program of domestic eavesdropping of suspected terrorists.

Democrats say they already have a starting point for a compromise, noting that bipartisan proposals this year require court warrants for eavesdropping. At the same time, party leaders will be treading carefully in an effort to assure Americans that they can protect privacy without sacrificing vigilance, and to discredit Republican charges they are weak on national security.

``How will the Democrats proceed? I think gingerly," said Steven Aftergood, who directs a government secrecy project for the Federation of American Scientists in Washington. ``They can no longer function as a protest group."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without getting court warrants on communications between suspected al-Qaeda operatives in the U.S. and overseas.

While disclosure of the program triggered criticism from both parties, there is practically no chance the Republican-controlled Congress that returns to Washington next week will act on the issue, leaving it for the next Congress that convenes in January.

Rockefeller's Timetable

West Virginia Democrat Jay Rockefeller, who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in an interview Congress may be able to pass bipartisan legislation in six months.

Rockefeller said he supports ``collection of conversations where that is necessary for national security" but is disturbed by ``blanket" eavesdropping.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, the next Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, said the administration needs to provide more information to lawmakers about the program; Congress has been asked to ``legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge."

To pass legislation next year, Democrats will have to bridge a gap between lawmakers who favor requiring a search warrant in each case of surveillance, and those who would permit broad court authorization.

Democrats such as California Senator Dianne Feinstein have made individual warrants a prerequisite. Republicans say that would hobble the NSA's ability to move quickly.

Special Court

Bush agreed in negotiations with Republican Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter to authorize a special court that oversees intelligence and operates in secret to decide whether the eavesdropping was legal. The court was created under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to review, behind closed doors, requests for eavesdropping on suspected spies, terrorists and other foreign agents.

Specter's measure stalled this year, as did a House-passed bill to permit surveillance on condition that the president brief leaders of Congress.

Most Democrats opposed both measures, arguing that they failed to protect privacy and insisting that the 1978 law remain the exclusive means for authorizing surveillance. At the same time, no one in Congress has called for Bush to halt the program.

Democrats risk a political backlash ``if they tie the president's hands and if there are more attacks," said Robert Turner, who directs the center for national security law at the University of Virginia law school in Charlottesville. Any legislation must not ``require unplugging the headphones for a period of hours, days or weeks while some judge finds time to look at the paperwork," said Turner, who supports the president's program.

Specter's Support

Feinstein, a member of the Intelligence and Judiciary committees, would require the NSA to submit requests to the special court created under the 1978 law. Her legislation would permit emergency eavesdropping for seven days while a warrant is sought. Specter supports her proposal as an alternative to his own.

A separate House measure proposed by California Democrat Adam Schiff and Arizona Republican Jeff Flake would also require specific warrants and force Bush to tell congressional committees who is being wiretapped and why.

The measure ``has broad bipartisan support and would probably be a starting point" for debate next year, said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi of California.

Bush's allies say it is impractical to force the NSA to seek warrants because it must act quickly to sift through a large volume of messages. ``Something like that simply would not work," Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, a Kansas Republican, said in an interview.

Civil Libertarians

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, urged congressional hearings to ``grapple with this immediately."

A U.S. appeals court is reviewing a ruling by a federal judge in Detroit declaring that the NSA program is illegal. Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine told Congress this week he will investigate the agency's ``compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

Civil libertarians say that, with the midterm congressional elections over, they may pick up support from such Republicans as Senators Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and John Sununu of New Hampshire, who have voiced concern about the surveillance.

``The limited-government types and the strong-executive types" are split, increasing chances some Republicans will support constraints on the spying program, said Richard Epstein, a University of Chicago law school professor who favors court supervision of the surveillance.

The longer Congress waits, he said, ``the longer becomes the implied ratification that the president is within his rights." Last Updated: November 29, 2006 00:12 EST

Watching The Watchers (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard column, November 29, 2006

The Bush administration would deny it, but the impending Democratic takeover of Congress seems to be already affecting how it does business.

After a year of refusing to do so, the Justice Department has announced a narrow review of President Bush's secret domestic eavesdropping program. The surveillance program, which monitors international communications to and from the United States, has been controversial since it was first disclosed _ and the subject of a preliminarily successful court challenge _ because the president had decreed that the National Security Agency need not obtain warrants.

Congressional Democrats had asked the department to review the program a year ago, but plans for even a preliminary investigation were derailed when Bush blocked security clearances for Justice investigators. Now, the White House has told the department it will approve the required clearances.

The review will be headed by Justice's respected watchdog, Inspector General Glenn Fine. But the review will be confined to examining whether department lawyers met all the legal requirements in dealing with the NSA and making use of any information obtained from intercepts. Fine will not weigh in on the key issue _ whether the warrantless eavesdropping is legal and constitutional.

The Democrats have promised congressional investigations into precisely that point when they take over next year.

Also, after only grudgingly acquiescing in its creation and then stalling it off for a year, the Bush administration allowed the NSA to brief the congressionally created and presidentially appointed Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board. In guarded comments to reporters later, several board members said they were surprised and impressed by the NSA's privacy safeguards.

The administration has been notoriously hostile to any questioning, criticism or skepticism of its national-security initiatives, and for six years a compliant Republican-run Congress neglected its vital oversight function.

Better late than never _ that seems about to change, although it took a political earthquake to do it.

Report Rejects European Denial Of C.I.A. Activity (NYT)

By Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A new report by the European Parliament bluntly rejected the assertions by several European countries that they were unaware of a C.I.A. program to secretly abduct, transport and detain terror suspects.

"Many governments cooperated passively or actively" with the Central Intelligence Agency, said Giovanni Claudio Fava, who led a special inquiry. "They knew." The report said that 11 European countries, including Britain, Italy and Germany, knew of the agency's activities.

The report, issued Tuesday in Brussels, offered new confirmation of the United States' practice of so-called extraordinary renditions, in which suspects were abducted, then transported, with European complicity, to third countries where they might face harsh interrogation methods.

Mr. Fava's report followed an inquiry conducted for the Council of Europe, the European human rights watchdog organization. That report, written by Dick Marty, a member of the Swiss Parliament, described what the council called a "reprehensible network" created by the C.I.A., one that was allowed to exist through the "intentional or grossly negligent collusion of the European partners."

Mr. Marty's report was based largely on news reports, legal proceedings and other public information. But Mr. Fava asserted that his committee had obtained, from a confidential source, records of an informal meeting of European Union and NATO foreign ministers on Dec. 7, 2005, "confirming that member states had knowledge of the program of extraordinary rendition and secret prisons." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was among the participants, it said.

President Bush confirmed on Sept. 6 that the C.I.A. had been operating a secret detention program, and said 14 prisoners held abroad were being sent to the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The European Union-NATO meeting came just over a month after The Washington Post reported that the C.I.A. had been holding its "most important Al Qaeda captives at a Soviet-era compound in Eastern Europe." It did not name the country involved, though the group Human Rights Watch subsequently named Poland and Romania as leading possibilities.

Mr. Fava's draft report asserted that at least 1,245 C.I.A.-operated flights flew through Europe's airspace or stopped at its airports, and listed Poland as among the countries least cooperative with its inquiry.

The committee said that when it asked the Polish authorities for copies of the flight logs of 11 C.I.A.-operated flights, it was told that these were "said not to have been retained, then said to have been faxed and destroyed, and finally said to have been saved in an unspecified place." The report quoted Szymany airport employees as describing what it said transpired there in 2002 and 2003, when six Gulfstream jets with civilian registration numbers parked at the edge of the airport, not entering customs clearance.

Quoting a former senior airport official, it said that the authorities had been directly ordered not to approach the aircraft and that vehicles, bearing military registration numbers associated with the intelligence training base in nearby Stare Kiejkuty, would await each aircraft.

DOJ_NMG_0099231

Zbigniew Gniatkowski, a spokesman for the Polish mission to the European Union, said Tuesday that Poland stood by its previous denials of any involvement.

European Report Details Flights By CIA Aircraft (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

BRUSSELS, Nov. 28 -- Most days, the skies are quiet over the Szymany airport, a mothballed runway in rural Poland. So the airport director took note when strangers showed up on at least six occasions in 2002 and 2003, offering to pay large sums of cash to land planes from faraway places such as Afghanistan.

When the chartered civilian planes arrived, they followed the same secretive drill, Mariola Przewlocka, former director of the airport, told investigators from the European Parliament last week. To avoid prying eyes, she said, the aircraft would sit at the end of the runway and wait for unmarked minivans to arrive. In the dark, it was hard to tell whether people got on or off. But in at least one case, a flight took off with several passengers for Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, records show.

"More money was being paid for these landings than any other landings," Przewlocka told the investigators, adding that the people who brought the money spoke excellent Polish but that the invoices indicated the jet owners were from the United States. "The landings of these aircraft were part of the work of secret services, as we understood it," she recalled.

Details of the flights and testimony from airport employees constitute "serious circumstantial evidence" that Szymany was the transfer point for a nearby secret prison run by the CIA, according to a report released Tuesday by a European Parliament committee that is investigating CIA counterterrorism operations in Europe.

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, called the European Parliament report "hysterical in its hyperbole." He said the committee was leaping to conclusions about the missions of the CIA flights and improperly assuming that they all had a "nefarious" intent.

"There are numerous, numerous reasons for CIA flights to Europe," he said in a telephone interview. "By and large, they are a symbol of cooperation between our countries and the sharing of information, not illegal activity."

The committee said that it had found records of 1,245 CIA-operated flights landing at European airports or passing through European airspace, though it found evidence of only a handful of cases in which prisoners were transported.

The investigative committee said it suspected that the prison held captured al-Qaeda leaders and that it was housed in a nearby Polish intelligence training center at Stare Kiejkuty, in northeastern Poland. Although the committee acknowledged that it lacked proof, it cited testimony of airport employees that they were kept away from the mysterious flights by Polish military officials and were prohibited from conducting passenger checks or customs inspections.

The CIA declined to comment Tuesday on the parliamentary findings. The government of Poland has repeatedly denied allowing the CIA to operate a prison on its territory.

"The committee's report, from what we know so far, is not based on any strong proof but only commonly repeated assumptions, suspicions and probabilities," Krzysztof Lapinski, spokesman for Poland's minister for special services, told the Associated Press in Warsaw.

The European Parliament accused Poland of blocking the probe, saying that high-ranking Polish officials refused to meet with the panel. It also accused the Polish government of withholding or destroying flight logs pertaining to CIA flights at Szymany and other airports.

Also Tuesday, the Polish newspaper Gazeta Wyborcza reported that international flight logs showed that a single Gulfstream jet used by the CIA landed five times in Warsaw, the capital, and once at Szymany between February and July 2003. Four of the flights originated in Afghanistan, the paper reported.

In November 2005, The Washington Post first reported the presence of clandestine CIA prisons in Eastern Europe. The Post withheld the exact locations at the request of the White House, which argued that divulging such details could jeopardize active counterterrorism operations and subject the host countries to retaliation from al-Qaeda and its sympathizers.

DOJ_NMG_0099232

In September, President Bush acknowledged the existence of the CIA's overseas prison network for the first time. He said that 14 inmates had been transferred to the U.S. Navy prison at Guantanamo Bay and that the "black sites" had been emptied, although he did not rule out using them again.

No European country has admitted allowing the CIA to run secret prisons on its territory. But the parliamentary committee said it had obtained records describing an "informal" Dec. 7, 2005, meeting of foreign ministers from the European Union and NATO "confirming that member states had knowledge" of the secret prisons. The meeting was attended by Rice and other U.S. officials, according to the report.

"The decision has been to keep mum and shroud decisions in secrecy," said Giovanni Claudio Fava, an Italian member of the European Parliament who led the investigation. "Many of our governments have cooperated actively and passively."

The committee report also cited evidence that the CIA may have operated a prison in Romania and said it "cannot exclude," based on testimony by Romanian officials, "the possibility that US secret services have operated in Romania on a clandestine basis."

The panel said it "expresses serious concern" about 21 stopovers by CIA-operated aircraft landing in Romania, including a crash landing by a Gulfstream jet in Bucharest on Dec. 6, 2004.

Although no one was reported injured, seven passengers on board the flight "disappeared" after the accident, and Romanian air transport investigators never learned their identities, according to the report. The plane had started its journey at Bagram air base, the site of a U.S. prison in Afghanistan.

Researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Man Pleads Guilty In Plan To Aid Taliban (AP)

By Joe Stinebaker

The AP, November 28, 2006

HOUSTON -- A Houston man pleaded guilty after he and a Pakistani living illegally in the United States were charged with conspiring to join the Taliban and fight against U.S. forces, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Kobie Diallo Williams, 33, and Adnan Babar Mirza, 29, underwent training in guns and reconnaissance in the Houston area in preparation for joining up with the Taliban, prosecutors said.

The two men were charged with conspiracy. Mirza, a Pakistani who overstayed a student visa, also was charged with violating federal gun laws.

Williams, a U.S. citizen and a student also known as Abdul Kabir, surrendered Tuesday to members of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to the conspiracy charge. Mirza was already in custody on immigration violations.

"While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with the 9-11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," said Roderick Beverly, the head of the FBI's Houston office.

Federal prosecutors also said Williams had provided about $350 to Taliban members or their families.

Williams' attorney, Alamdar S. Hamdani, said Williams chose not to fight the charges.

"He made a grave mistake," said Hamdani. "And he has come forward to own up to that."

Prosecutors could not say on Tuesday whether Mirza had an attorney.

Williams and Mirza were held without bail. Williams could get up to five years in prison, Mirza 35 years.

The indictment said Williams and Mirza viewed U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan and Iraq as "invaders" and decided in April 2005 that they should travel to the Middle East to fight with the Taliban in Afghanistan.

U.S. Citizen Wanted To Join The Taliban, Officials Say (ABC)

By Brian Ross

ABC News' The Blotter, November 29, 2006

A United States citizen and a Pakistani national who overstayed his visa have been charged with planning to provide aid and financial support to the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0099233

The two Houston-area men, Kobie Diallo Williams and Adnan Babar Mirza, have been indicted by a federal grand jury and have been charged with attempting to obtain firearms and training so they could join the Taliban and fight against U.S. and coalition forces.

According to the indictment, in April 2005, Williams and Mirza agreed that they should travel to the region and fight with the Taliban because they viewed U.S. and coalition forces as invaders.

The two allegedly sought firearms training in the Houston area on at least eight occasions between May 2005 and June 2006. Mirza was in possession of an Armalite M15A4 rifle, a .308 rifle and a 12-gage shotgun, the indictment states. Since he had entered the U.S. in August 2001 on a student visa that expired on Dec. 12, 2005, Mirza, under U.S. law, was prohibited from possessing any firearms. According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, the men were also in possession of a Glock pistol and other weapons.

The indictment unsealed today states, "Williams and Mirza would and did meet at various shooting ranges and camp sites in the Southern District of Texas for the purpose of conducting firearms and paramilitary training to hone their skills with weapons to assist fighters engaging United States forces in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq."

In addition to the alleged firearms training, the men also agreed to provide financial support to the Taliban and their families, the indictment alleges. According to the indictment, Williams sent $350 to Taliban members and their family members on two occasions.

"The expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Roderick Beverly.

Since it has been deemed a terrorist organization, federal law prohibits any financial or other support to the Taliban, the violation of which carries a maximum sentence of five years. In today's arraignment, Williams pleaded guilty while Mirza, who was arrested last Wednesday by federal agents for overstaying his visa, is scheduled to have his detention hearing in the next several days.

Two Houston men have been charged with planning to aid the Taliban.

One of the terror suspects attended U of H downtown and the other attended classes at several HCC campuses.

Currently, they are both being held without bond in the federal detention center downtown.

Federal authorities say Kobie Williams is one of two men who had been training to use firearms with hopes of leaving Houston and joining the Taliban.

“And to fight the Jihad against American and Coalition forces overseas in the battle that is going on now,” said U. S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

The other suspect is Adnan Mirza, a Pakistani citizen, who had overstayed his student visa and was living in a westside Houston apartment complex.

Mirza was attending Houston Community College and working as an accountant at a small business.

Kobie Williams, also known as Abdul Kabeer, lived in an apartment in the Galleria area.

He attended U of H downtown and was working part time at Rice University in its engineering department.

Both men were seen on several occasions practicing with firearms at the American Shooting Center off Westheimer. How did the government learn about them?

“It was a referral from the border patrol as far as suspicious activity that they noted,” said Rod Beverly, head of the Houston FBI office.

Beverly would not get into specifics, but Senator John Cornyn was quick to point out to us that Mirza was here illegally.

“Whether you provided aid to the Taliban or simply overstayed your visa, we ought to be enforcing our immigration laws,” said Sen. Cornyn.

The United States government says Williams, who is an American, provided financial support of $350, money he thought was going to the Taliban and their families.

His attorney John Floyd said his client pleaded guilty today and is remorseful.

"I can tell you that he has expressed to us that this all began with frustration with what's going on with the war in Iraq. This was due to his frustration that he acted out in a way that now he sees was improper," said Floyd.

One who made a 'donation' pleads guilty; officials say both men trained to fight U.S. forces

Kobie Williams left Ramadan baskets packed with chocolate-laced trail mix on his neighbors' doorsteps and wistfully spoke of going to Egypt to study the Quran. Adnan Mirza was active in Muslim groups and spent his Sundays at a Houston soup kitchen feeding the homeless.

To their friends and families, Williams, 33, and Mirza, 29, were enthusiastic college students dedicated to God and family.

But Justice Department officials presented a shockingly different view of the men Tuesday, branding both as Taliban supporters — one contributing $350 to terrorists — who conspired to train with weapons with the goal of fighting U.S.-led forces in the Mideast.

Williams, a University of Houston-Downtown student also known as Abdul Kabeer or Abdul Kabir, pleaded guilty to the accusations Tuesday before U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. Scheduled for sentencing on Feb. 23, he faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Mirza, a Pakistani national who was in the country on an expired student visa, faces the same potential penalty if convicted. Additionally, he has been indicted on three firearms charges, each of which could bring a 10-year sentence and a $250,000 fine upon conviction.

"While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with Sept. 11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," FBI Special Agent in Charge Roderick Beverly said in a statement.

"In this post 9/11 era," U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle said, "threats against our international security efforts are taken most seriously."

Late Tuesday, authorities took into custody a cousin of Mirza, searching the cousin's home and confiscating documents, receipts, and anything in Arabic they couldn't understand, relatives said.

The indictments unsealed Tuesday came five months after federal authorities in Miami said they had uncovered an Islamist plot to attack U.S. targets including the 110-story Sears Tower in Chicago. Seven people were apprehended in that investigation.

Firearms training allegedIn the Houston case, authorities contended Williams, a U.S. citizen, and Mirza engaged in firearms training on at least eight occasions in the past 18 months. Investigators said the sessions took place in Harris and nearby counties.

Additionally, Williams provided $350 in support to Taliban members or their families.

In Tuesday's court session, Williams told the judge that "We knew that you couldn't get money to the Taliban." He added that he gave $350 to a "gentleman."

"Adnan informed us that there was a hospital that most of the families go to," Williams said.

"What families?" Werlein asked.

"Widows and children," Williams responded.

Williams, a thick-bearded man dressed in a white shirt and black trousers, spoke in a firm voice as he confirmed the prosecutor's allegations of firearms practice at shooting ranges and area campgrounds. He also admitted that he considered coalition forces fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq invaders.

He told Werlein he was studying computer science at UH-Downtown after receiving an associate's degree in electrical engineering technology. Williams also was listed as a technician on Rice University's civil engineering Web site, but his connection with that institution could not be confirmed Tuesday night.

'Not a crazy dude'

Residents at the southwest Houston apartment complex where Williams lived with his wife expressed shock at the arrests.

"He was not a crazy dude," said Joshua White, who noted that last year the couple had organized the neighborhood's crime-fighting National Night Out.

Williams was "very into his religion," White said, but didn't seem fanatical. White, who had known Williams about 18 months, said they occasionally debated religion.

When Williams spoke of a desire to travel to Egypt to study the Quran, White admonished his neighbor "not to go crazy over there." Williams laughed.

Another neighbor, Taylor Cole, described Williams as "a real nice guy."

At Ramadan, he said, Williams and his wife left a basket of treats on his doorstep along with a booklet explaining the religious observance.

Shock and dismay also were expressed by Mirza's uncle, aunt and cousin, with whom he shared a two-bedroom townhome on the southwest side.

"We know these are false charges," the cousin, Ali Qazi, 22, said.

Five years in Houston

Qazi said Mirza, a Kuwait-reared Pakistani, is studying biomedical technology at Houston Community College's Town and Country campus. Mirza, he said, has lived in Houston for five years. Qazi said the accused man has been very active with Islamic community groups, and routinely collects spare food from restaurants to feed the homeless.

In the past year, Qazi said, Mirza had developed an interest in hunting. Authorities said that individuals in the United States on student visas — or illegally — may not legally own firearms. He said authorities confiscated a shotgun and ammunition when they raided the home last week.

As Qazi spoke with a reporter about the case, Mirza's aunt, who asked not to be identified, prayed and wept.

"He's almost 30 years old, so he does everything on his own," Qazi said. "We don't ask questions about how he lives."

Late Tuesday, Qazi said authorities had taken his brother into custody. Qazi said he did not know why.

Qazi said his brother's wife called relatives about 8 p.m., saying that either or both the FBI or immigration agents arrived at her southwest Houston apartment. Authorities took anything in Arabic they couldn't understand, the wife told Qazi, including her Quran.

A local FBI spokeswoman said she could not comment because she was not aware of an arrest.

At the nearby Masjid Lel-Farouq mosque that Mirza attended, members Tuesday night expressed surprise at the federal accusations.

"He's the kindest, sweetest person," said one, who identified himself only as Mohamad because he feared retaliation from authorities. "He would not harm a fly."

Another, who identified himself as Ali, called the suspect "a very decent person."

"Just because you have a beard and you like to go hunting," he said, "doesn't mean that you are a terrorist."

Chemical Weapons Plot: Man Sentenced (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, November 29, 2006

Federal authorities say a white supremacist will spend the next three decades behind bars for attempting to acquire nerve gas and explosives in a plot to destroy government buildings. A judge sentenced Demetrius "Van" Crocker to 30 years in prison and lifetime supervised release.

Crocker was arrested in 2004 after he tried to buy the weapons from undercover agents. The 40 year-old told agents his dream was to set off a dirty bomb in Washington, D.C. while the House and the Senate were in session. A federal jury convicted him in April of 2006.

Investigators say Crocker became involved with neo-Nazi groups as a teenager in Jackson, Tennessee. The TBI and the FBI started investigating him after an informant alerted the agencies to his anti-government rants.

Marshals Decry Imams' Charges (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Air marshals, pilots and security officials yesterday expressed concern that airline passengers and crews will be reluctant to report suspicious behavior aboard for fear of being called "racists," after several Muslim imams made that charge in a press conference Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport.

Six imams, or Muslim holy men, accused a US Airways flight crew of inappropriately evicting them from a flight last week in Minneapolis after several passengers said the imams tried to intimidate them by loudly praying and moving around the airplane. The imams urged Congress to enact laws to prohibit ethnic and religious "profiling."

Federal air marshals and others yesterday urged passengers to remain vigilant to threats.

"The crew and passengers act as our additional eyes and ears on every flight," said a federal air marshal in Las Vegas, who asked that his name not be used. "If [crew and passengers] are afraid of reporting suspicious individuals out of fear of being labeled a racist or bigot, then terrorists will certainly use those fears to their advantage in future aviation attacks."

But Rabiah Ahmed, spokeswoman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Muslims "have to walk around on eggshells in public just because we don't want to be misconstrued as suspicious. You have to strike a balance between legitimate fears which people may have, but not allow passengers to have so much discretion that they can trigger a process that would violate a traveler's basic civil rights."

"Because one person misunderstood the actions of other law-abiding citizens, they were able to trigger a very long and daunting process for other travelers that were pulled off the plane in handcuffs and detained for many hours before they were cleared."

The imams say they were removed from the Phoenix-bound flight because they were praying quietly in the concourse. They had been in Minnesota for a conference sponsored by the North American Imams Federation.

But other passengers told police and aviation security officials a different version of the incident. They said suspicious behavior of the imams led to their eviction from the flight. The imams, they said, tested the forbearance of the passengers and flight crew in what the air marshal called a "[political correctness] probe."

"The political correctness needs to be left at the boarding gate," the marshal said. "Instilling politically correct fears in to the minds of airline passengers is nothing less than psychological terrorism."

The passengers and flight crew said the imams prayed loudly before boarding; switched seating assignments to a configuration used by terrorists in previous incidents; asked for seat-belt extensions, which could be used as weapons; and shouted hostile slogans about al Qaeda and the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0099237

Flight attendants said three of the six men, who did not appear to be overweight, asked for the seat-belt extensions, which include heavy metal buckles, and then threw them to the floor under their seats.

Robert MacLean, a former federal air marshal, expressed the fear yesterday that the situation "will make crews and passengers in the future second-guess reporting these events, thus compromising the aircraft's security out of fear of being labeled a dogmatist or a bigot, or being sued."

Flight attendants said they were concerned that the way the imams took seats that were not assigned to them -- two seats in the front row of first class, exit seats in the middle of the plane and two seats in the rear -- resembled the pattern used by September 11 hijackers, giving them control of the exits.

A Minneapolis police officer and a federal air marshal who were called to the plane after the imams refused to leave the plane for questioning said "the seating configuration, the request for seat-belt extensions, the prior praying and utterances about Allah and the United States in the gate area ... was suspicious."

One pilot for a competing airline said the incident would have a chilling effect on the flight crews.

"The flight crew may be a little more gun-shy about approaching people, they may have a higher standard for the next few weeks for screening unusual behavior. I hope that's not the case, because I do think US Airways did the proper thing."

Andrea Rader, spokeswoman for US Airways, said its employees "are going to do what is appropriate" to ensure that airplanes are safe and will not be dissuaded by uproar over last week's incident.

"I don't think people will be less vigilant as a result of this, and I think that's appropriate. There is a balance, and I think we will continue to achieve that. Our crews and people on the airplanes are going to watch for behavior that raises concerns."

Many airports offer private rooms for prayer, but CAIR's Miss Ahmed said travelers required to arrive at airports two hours in advance to go through security inspections are too exhausted and must pray at the gate.

"It's convenient to check in then get to the gate and pray there," she said.

Plane Prayers (WP)

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

AUS AIRWAYS CREW invited controversy -- and a bevy of unanswered questions -- last week when it kicked six Muslim imams off a flight. That decision led to, among other things, a "pray-in" protest at Reagan National Airport on Monday. There's a disturbing possibility that innocent passengers were removed from their flight, handcuffed, detained and denied the opportunity to purchase another ticket home just because of a preflight expression of faith.

Many facts of the case are still the subject of debate, but we know this much: Last week, six imams heading home from a conference in Minnesota unrolled rugs before boarding a US Airways flight to Arizona and said their evening prayers. When they boarded, they sat in different sections of the aircraft. Another passenger passed a note to a flight attendant expressing discomfort that Arabic men were moving around the airplane. The captain threw them off, and the local police and the FBI detained them for questioning. The imams were later cleared for flying.

According to some accounts, the imams declined to sit in their assigned seats, instead choosing to occupy different sections of the plane in a manner akin to that of the Sept. 11 hijackers. While boarding, they may have expressed disdain for the American effort in Iraq and spoken favorably of former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. A US Airways spokeswoman notes that they asked for seat-belt extenders, which some say could have been used to hit or strangle others, even though they are not obese. Another airline employee indicated that three of the men had one-way tickets and checked no baggage. The imams, however, say that they carried round-trip tickets and didn't talk politics on the jetway. A representative also said that any seat switching they did was innocent.

US Airways stands by its decision to boot the men from the plane, saying that, taken as a whole, their behavior after boarding was suspect. But the airline and the authorities who detained the imams have questions to answer publicly about the incident. Were they switching seats suspiciously? Did the imams have round-trip or one-way tickets? Did the men ask for seat-belt extenders, and if so did they give any reason?

Answers to these questions might help explain the airline and official actions, even if they do not end up justifying those actions. Pilots and others have to make difficult decisions when time is short and evidence tough to verify. But complete information on this case also could demonstrate that it stemmed from nothing more than a nervous passenger fueling unfair suspicion after seeing the men at prayer. And that's a scary possibility. America can't become a country so locked by fear that those who unfurl a prayer rug automatically become suspects.

Chertoff: First Responders Done By End Of '07 (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday that the nation's 35 highest-risk cities must have systems enabling first responders to communicate in a disaster by the end of next year. Every state must have such a system by the end of 2008, he said.

New York City has already achieved that goal, officials said, but will be expected to continue to improve communications with first responders in Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester.

"The bottom line is we have to be able to communicate during a disaster," Chertoff told more than 1,000 state and local homeland security officials assembled at the Washington Hilton Tuesday. "We're going to get it done."

The lack of interoperable communications among first responders, and the poor functioning of fire radios in the World Trade Towers, were contributing causes in the scores of firefighters' deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks. Hampered communication also slowed rescue and recovery after Hurricane Katrina.

Chertoff announced those deadlines five weeks before the start of a new Congress controlled by Democrats, many of whom have expressed frustration about the slow pace of progress on first-responder communications and pledged tougher oversight of his department.

The secretary said public scorecards would be issued in the next few weeks to the highest-risk cities -- including Boston, Houston and Chicago -- to help them prioritize needed improvements. The focus, he said, would be regional because "threats are region-based."

So the scorecard for New York City would assess communication not just among the city's first responders, but also among police, fire and emergency management groups in Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester.

The baseline goal is for incident command managers to be able to communicate with one another within one hour.

Local officials said they expect to do well in the ratings.

"Communications are vastly improved from what they were on Sept. 11," said New York Deputy Fire Commissioner Frank Gribbon. "We have radios where we share frequencies. We have an NYPD videofeed to our operations center."

Beyond hardware, Gribbon said the city has revamped protocols that set out who is in charge under what circumstances.

Chertoff also pledged Tuesday that next year's allocation of anti-terror grants would be more transparent. While continuing to allocate the lion's share of money to high-risk areas, he said, decisions would be based more on "common sense" than on "bean counting." This year's grants, which included 40-percent funding cuts to New York City and Washington, D.C., were widely criticized.

Changes to the program, he said, would include an extended timeline that will enable municipalities to fine-tune their proposals after getting feedback.

Chertoff also said that a comprehensive alert system is being developed with the goal of reaching 85 percent of Americans within 10 minutes.

"Those of you who grew up in the '50s remember that they used to break into television programing ... ," he said. "But we're in the 21st century. We have text messaging. We have the Internet. We have digital cable. We have satellite television. We have to upgrade the current patchwork system and build one that is national in scope for the 21st century."

Diplomacy Ain't What It Used To Be (column) (WP)

The Federal National Agency Association

DOJ_NMG_0099239

Is the Federal Emergency Management Agency in line for a makeover? Seemed like it, judging from a press schedule issued Monday by FEMA's parent, the Department of Homeland Security.

At 12:30 p.m. tomorrow Undersecretary R. David Paulison, head of FEMA, the schedule said, will "participate in a press conference with the National Emergency Management Agency to announce a new emergency management tag logo and moniker."

Rebranding FEMA might make sense after last year's failed hurricane response and was in fact suggested by Senate investigators, among other changes.

Not to worry. FEMA's stationery, jackets and vehicle decals appear safe, at least for now.

Turns out that public-affairs staffers conflated two Paulison appearances: one to talk about his vision for a reorganized agency, and another to announce a new logo for the National Emergency Management Association, an organization of the top emergency officials from the 50 states.

FEMA? NEMA? Let's call the whole thing off.

A Deputized FEMA Director?

On the bright side for Paulison, buzz at the agency is that he will be nominated by President Bush for promotion to the deputy secretary level. Congress recently passed legislation raising the status of the FEMA administrator, effective March 31, mandating that he report directly to the secretary of the Homeland Security Department and advise the president and the White House Homeland Security Council during disasters.

Judge Upholds Policyholders' Katrina Flood Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A federal judge offered a glimmer of hope to the tens of thousands of people whose homes and businesses in New Orleans were flooded in Hurricane Katrina, ruling that insurance companies should pay for the widespread water damage.

If upheld, the ruling late Monday by Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans could cost the insurers billions of dollars more than the $41 billion they have already paid to storm victims. But the insurers insist that their policies do not cover flooding, and they said yesterday that they expected an appeals court to reverse the decision. A final ruling could take months, if not years.

Judge Duval's decision centered on the distinction between flooding caused by high winds and heavy rains and flooding caused by human error. Much of the destruction in New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in August 2005 was a result of levee failures.

He said the language in the insurance policies on flood coverage was ambiguous because it did not "clearly exclude man-made" flood disasters. Since the insurers provided the wording for the policies, he said he felt "constrained to interpret it against the insurers."

He made an exception for State Farm and the Hartford Insurance Company, whose policies do not provide coverage for flooding "regardless of cause."

Lawyers for more than a dozen homeowners and Xavier University, which had business insurance, hailed Judge Duval's decision as a victory.

"This is a major breakthrough," said John N. Ellison, a member of the team of lawyers representing storm victims and a partner at Anderson Kill & Olick in New York. "Our hope is that this ruling may help get the redevelopment of the houses and the city going so the city can come back to life."

The ruling was the first by a court in Louisiana on damage from Hurricane Katrina. It ran counter to rulings by a federal judge in Mississippi that supported the industry's contention that most property insurance policies do not provide coverage for flooding.

But the judge in Mississippi, L. T. Senter of Federal District Court, disagreed with the insurers' contention that any damage due to flooding nullified the coverage. He cleared the way for trials early next year to determine how much damage to flooded homes and businesses resulted from high winds.

The rulings differ, in part, because the nature of the flooding was different. In Mississippi, the storm drove water from the Gulf of Mexico ashore and wiped out tens of thousands of homes unprotected by artificial barriers. In New Orleans, flood waters breached some levees and poured into the city as the storm was moving away. The water lingered in parts of the city for weeks.

Mr. Ellison, the lawyer for the homeowners, said he believed that the New Orleans case would go to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit "on an expedited basis" and that deliberations could begin in the spring.

More than 200,000 homes and thousands of businesses were damaged or destroyed by the flooding in New Orleans. The insurers have refused to pay claims for water damage and the relatively small amounts that homeowners and businesses received for wind damage have been far from enough for most people to rebuild. The federal government has stepped in with promises of several billion dollars in assistance, but little of the money has reached the people who need it.

The insurers said that Judge Duval's decision was contrary to decades of case law and state insurance regulation and would turn out to be a short-lived loss for their side.

"The judge reached the wrong conclusion," said Robert P. Hartwig, the chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York. "The policies clearly exclude flood-related damage under any and all circumstances. We don't believe the decision will be upheld."

Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, including several of those in the New Orleans lawsuit, said Judge Duval appeared to be overreaching to solve the social and economic problems caused by Hurricane Katrina.

"Here is a phenomenon for which there is no insurance, and the court isn't going to allow that to exist," Mr. Maniloff said.

"The court is finding who is in a better position to bear the loss, and it is coming out in favor of the individual, the policyholder," he said. "This is an aberration."

Judge Duval, who was appointed to the federal court by President Bill Clinton in 1994, said in an 85-page decision that the insurers could have made clear "that 'flood' means water damage caused by negligent acts or omissions." But, he said, they "chose not to do so."

Nearly a dozen insurance companies had sought dismissal of the lawsuits over flood losses. But Judge Duval ruled in favor of only two, State Farm, the largest home insurer in Louisiana, with about 20 percent of the market; and Hartford, a unit of the Hartford Financial Services Group, which has a much smaller share.

Judge Duval said he cleared the way for an immediate appeal because "there is a substantial ground for a difference of opinion."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Adviser's Memo Cites Doubts About Iraqi Leader (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A classified memorandum by President Bush's national security adviser expressed serious doubts about whether Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had the capacity to control the sectarian violence in Iraq and recommended that the United States take new steps to strengthen the Iraqi leader's position.

The Nov. 8 memo was prepared for Mr. Bush and his top deputies by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and senior aides on the staff of the National Security Council after a trip by Mr. Hadley to Baghdad.

The memo suggests that if Mr. Maliki fails to carry out a series of specified steps, it may ultimately be necessary to press him to reconfigure his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by providing "monetary support to moderate groups," and by sending thousands of additional American troops to Baghdad to make up for what the document suggests is a current shortage of Iraqi forces. (Text of Memo)

The memo presents an unvarnished portrait of Mr. Maliki and notes that he relies for some of his political support on leaders of more extreme Shiite groups. The five-page document, classified secret, is based in part on a one-on-one meeting between Mr. Hadley and Mr. Maliki on Oct. 30.

"His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change," the memo said of the Iraqi leader. "But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

An administration official made a copy of the document available to a New York Times reporter seeking information on the administration's policy review. The Times read and transcribed the memo.

The White House has sought to avoid public criticism of Mr. Maliki, who is scheduled to meet with Mr. Bush in Jordan on Wednesday. The latest surge of sectarian violence in Baghdad and the Democratic victories in the midterm elections are prompting calls for sharp changes in American policy. Such changes are among options being debated by the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

A senior administration official discussed the memorandum in general terms after being told The New York Times was preparing an article on the subject. The official described the document as "essentially a trip report" and not a result of the administration's review of its Iraq policy, which is still under way.

He said the purpose of the memo "was to provide a snapshot of the challenges facing Prime Minister Maliki and how we can best enhance his capabilities, mindful of the complex political and security environment in which he is operating."

The American delegation that went to Iraq with Mr. Hadley included Meghan L. O'Sullivan, the deputy national security adviser, and three other members of the National Security Council staff. The memo, prepared after that trip, has been circulated to cabinet-level officials who are participating in the administration's review of Iraq strategy.

There is nothing in the memo that suggests the Bush administration is interested in replacing Mr. Maliki as prime minister. But while Mr. Bush has stated that he has confidence in the Iraqi leader, the memo questions whether Mr. Maliki has the will and ability to establish a genuine unity government, saying the answer will emerge from actions he takes in the weeks and months ahead.

"We returned from Iraq convinced we need to determine if Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others," the memo says. "Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? If so, is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power? The answers to these questions are key in determining whether we have the right strategy in Iraq."

In describing the Oct. 30 meeting between Mr. Hadley and Mr. Maliki, it says: "Maliki reiterated a vision of Shia, Sunni and Kurdish partnership, and in my one-on-one meeting with him, he impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so." It said the Iraqi leader's assurances seemed to have been contradicted by developments on the ground, including the Iraqi government's approach to the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia known in Arabic as Jaish al-Mahdi and headed by Moktada al-Sadr.

"Reports of nondelivery of services to Sunni areas, intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones, removal of Iraq's most effective commanders on a sectarian basis and efforts to ensure Shia majorities in all ministries — when combined with the escalation of Jaish al-Mahdi (JAM) killings — all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad."

Among the concerns voiced in the memo was that Mr. Maliki was surrounded by a small group of advisers from the Shiite Dawa Party, a narrow circle that American officials worry may skew the information he receives.

The memo outlines a number of short-term steps Mr. Maliki could undertake to establish control. The Iraqi leader has recently indicated his intention to take some of those steps, like announcing his intention to expand the size of the Iraqi Army and declaring that Iraq will seek an extension of the United Nations mandate that provides for the deployment of the American-led multinational force in Iraq. The United Nations Security Council voted on Tuesday to extend that mandate.

The memo also lists steps the United States can take to strengthen Mr. Maliki's position. They include efforts to persuade Saudi Arabia to use its influence with the Sunnis in Iraq and encourage them to turn away from the insurgency and to seek a political accommodation.

Addressing Mr. Bush, the memo said one option was for the president to "direct your cabinet to begin an intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S.

action." Although the memo did not offer specifics, this appeared to be an allusion to a more active American role in the Arab-Israeli peace process. Recently, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has reached out to the Palestinians and has said he wants to move ahead with peace talks. But the memo's authors also contemplate the possibility that Mr. Maliki's position may be too tenuous for him to take the steps needed to curb the power of Shiite militias, to establish a more diverse and representative personal staff and to arrest the escalating sectarian strife.

In that case, the memo suggests, it may ultimately be necessary for Mr. Maliki to recast his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by pressing moderates to align themselves with the Iraqi leader and providing them with monetary support.

The memo refers to "the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad," a seeming acknowledgment that there is a substantial shortfall of troops in the Iraqi capital compared with the level needed to provide security there, in part because the Iraqi government has not dispatched all the forces it has promised. An American brigade generally numbers about 3,500 troops, though Iraqi units can be smaller. While Democrats have advocated beginning troop withdrawals as a means of putting pressure on Mr. Maliki, the memo suggests that such tactics may backfire by stirring up opposition against a politically vulnerable leader.

"Pushing Maliki to take these steps without augmenting his capabilities could force him to failure — if the Parliament removes him from office with a majority vote or if action against the Mahdi militia (JAM) causes elements of the Iraqi Security Forces to fracture and leads to major Shia disturbances in southern Iraq," the memo says.

The memo lists a number of possible steps to build up Mr. Maliki's capability. They include asking Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander, to develop a plan to strengthen the Iraqi leader.

This could involve the formation of a new National Strike Force, significantly increasing the number of American advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, a force that has been infiltrated by Shiite militias, and putting more Iraqi forces directly under Mr. Maliki's control.

In addition, the memorandum suggests that Mr. Bush ask the Pentagon and General Casey "to make a recommendation about whether more forces are needed in Baghdad."

The administration appears to have already begun carrying out some of the steps recommended in the document. Among them were a trip over the weekend by Vice President Dick Cheney to Saudi Arabia as part of an effort to seek help from Sunni Arab powers in encouraging Sunni groups in Iraq to seek a political compromise with Mr. Maliki.

The senior administration official who agreed to discuss the memo would do so only on condition of anonymity. The official said some of the steps projected in the document were being carried out.

The official also stressed that the administration retains confidence in the Iraqi leader. "What we are seeing is that he had the right intentions and is willing to act," the senior official said. "Our own review has opened a consultative process on where Maliki wants to take the government. A successful strategy has to be one that is driven by the Iraqis."

Text Of U.S. Security Adviser's Iraq Memo (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Following is the text of a Nov. 8 memorandum prepared for cabinet-level officials by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and his aides on the National Security Council. The five-page document, classified secret, was read and transcribed by The New York Times.

We returned from Iraq convinced we need to determine if Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others. Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? If so, is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power? The answers to these questions are key in determining whether we have the right strategy in Iraq.

Maliki reiterated a vision of Shia, Sunni, and Kurdish partnership, and in my one-on-one meeting with him, he impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so. Maliki pointed to incidents, such as the use of Iraqi forces in Shia Karbala, to demonstrate his even hand. Perhaps because he is frustrated over his limited ability to command Iraqi forces against terrorists and insurgents, Maliki has been trying to show strength by standing up to the coalition. Hence the public spats with us over benchmarks and the Sadr City roadblocks.

Despite Maliki's reassuring words, repeated reports from our commanders on the ground contributed to our concerns about Maliki's government. Reports of nondelivery of services to Sunni areas, intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones, removal of Iraq's most effective commanders on a sectarian basis and efforts to ensure Shia majorities in all ministries — when combined with the escalation of Jaish al-Mahdi's (JAM) [the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army] killings — all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad.

While there does seem to be an aggressive push to consolidate Shia power and influence, it is less clear whether Maliki is a witting participant. The information he receives is undoubtedly skewed by his small circle of Dawa advisers, coloring his actions and interpretation of reality. His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change. But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action.

Steps Maliki Could Take

There is a range of actions that Maliki could take to improve the information he receives, demonstrate his intentions to build an Iraq for all Iraqis and increase his capabilities. The actions listed below are in order of escalating difficulty and, at some point, may require additional political and security resources to execute, as described on Page 3 of this memo. Maliki should:

¶Compel his ministers to take small steps — such as providing health services and opening bank branches in Sunni neighborhoods — to demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities;

¶Bring his political strategy with Moktada al-Sadr to closure and bring to justice any JAM actors that do not eschew violence;

¶Shake up his cabinet by appointing nonsectarian, capable technocrats in key service (and security) ministries;

¶Announce an overhaul of his own personal staff so that "it reflects the face of Iraq";

¶Demand that all government workers (in ministries, the Council of Representatives and his own offices) publicly renounce all violence for the pursuit of political goals as a condition for keeping their positions;

¶Declare that Iraq will support the renewal of the U.N. mandate for multinational forces and will seek, as appropriate, to address bilateral issues with the United States through a SOFA [status of forces agreement] to be negotiated over the next year;

¶Take one or more immediate steps to inject momentum back into the reconciliation process, such as a suspension of de-Baathification measures and the submission to the Parliament or "Council of Representatives" of a draft piece of legislation for a more judicial approach;

¶Announce plans to expand the Iraqi Army over the next nine months; and ¶Declare the immediate suspension of suspect Iraqi police units and a robust program of embedding coalition forces into MOI [Ministry of the Interior] units while the MOI is revetted and retrained.

What We Can Do to Help Maliki

If Maliki is willing to move decisively on the actions above, we can help him in a variety of ways. We should be willing to:

¶Continue to target Al Qaeda and insurgent strongholds in Baghdad to demonstrate the Shia do not need the JAM to protect their families — and that we are a reliable partner;

¶Encourage Zal [Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador] to move into the background and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments. (We want Maliki to exert his authority — and demonstrate to Iraqis that he is a strong leader — by taking action against extremists, not by pushing back on the United States and the Coalition.);

¶Continue our diplomatic efforts to keep the Sunnis in the political process by pushing for the negotiation of a national compact and by talking up provincial council elections next spring/summer as a mechanism for Sunni empowerment;

¶Support his announcement to expand the Iraqi Army and reform the MOI more aggressively;

¶Seek ways to strengthen Maliki immediately by giving him additional control over Iraqi forces, although we must recognize that in the immediate time frame, we would likely be able to give him more authority over existing forces, not more forces;

¶Continue to pressure Iran and Syria to end their interference in Iraq, in part by hitting back at Iranian proxies in Iraq and by Secretary Rice holding an Iraq-plus-neighbors meeting in the region in early December; and

DOJ_NMG_0099244

¶Step up our efforts to get Saudi Arabia to take a leadership role in supporting Iraq by using its influence to move Sunni populations in Iraq out of violence into politics, to cut off any public or private funding provided to the insurgents or death squads from the region and to lean on Syria to terminate its support for Baathists and insurgent leaders.

Augmenting Maliki's Political and Security Capabilities

The above approach may prove difficult to execute even if Maliki has the right intentions. He may simply not have the political or security capabilities to take such steps, which risk alienating his narrow Sadrist political base and require a greater number of more reliable forces. Pushing Maliki to take these steps without augmenting his capabilities could force him to failure — if the Parliament removes him from office with a majority vote or if action against the Mahdi militia (JAM) causes elements of the Iraqi Security Forces to fracture and leads to major Shia disturbances in southern Iraq. We must also be mindful of Maliki's personal history as a figure in the Dawa Party — an underground conspiratorial movement — during Saddam's rule. Maliki and those around him are naturally inclined to distrust new actors, and it may take strong assurances from the United States ultimately to convince him to expand his circle of advisers or take action against the interests of his own Shia coalition and for the benefit of Iraq as a whole.

If it is Maliki's assessment that he does not have the capability — politically or militarily — to take the steps outlined above, we will need to work with him to augment his capabilities. We could do so in two ways. First, we could help him form a new political base among moderate politicians from Sunni, Shia, Kurdish and other communities. Ideally, this base would constitute a new parliamentary bloc that would free Maliki from his current narrow reliance on Shia actors. (This bloc would not require a new election, but would rather involve a realignment of political actors within the Parliament). In its creation, Maliki would need to be willing to risk alienating some of his Shia political base and may need to get the approval of Ayatollah Sistani for actions that could split the Shia politically. Second, we need to provide Maliki with additional forces of some kind.

This approach would require that we take steps beyond those laid out above, to include:

¶Actively support Maliki in helping him develop an alternative political base. We would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc;

¶Consider monetary support to moderate groups that have been seeking to break with larger, more sectarian parties, as well as to support Maliki himself as he declares himself the leader of his bloc and risks his position within Dawa and the Sadrists; and ¶Provide Maliki with more resources to help build a nonsectarian national movement.

• If we expect him to adopt a nonsectarian security agenda, we must ensure he has reasonably nonsectarian security institutions to execute it — such as through a more robust embedding program.

• We might also need to fill the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad with coalition forces if reliable Iraqi forces are not identified.

Moving Ahead

We should waste no time in our efforts to determine Maliki's intentions and, if necessary, to augment his capabilities. We might take the following steps immediately:

¶Convince Maliki to deliver on key actions that might reassure Sunnis (open banks and direct electricity rebuilding in Sunni areas, depoliticize hospitals);

¶Tell Maliki that we understand that he is working his own strategy for dealing with the Sadrists and that:

• you have asked General Casey to support Maliki in this effort

• it is important that we see some tangible results in this strategy soon;

¶Send your personal representative to Baghdad to discuss this strategy with Maliki and to press other leaders to work with him, especially if he determines that he must build an alternative political base;

¶Ask Casey to develop a plan to empower Maliki, including:

• Formation of National Strike Forces

• Dramatic increase in National Police embedding

• More forces under Maliki command and control

DOJ_NMG_0099245

¶Ask Secretary of Defense and General Casey to make a recommendation about whether more forces are need in Baghdad;

¶Ask Secretary of Defense and General Casey to devise a more robust embedding plan and a plan to resource it;

¶Direct your cabinet to begin an intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S. action;

¶If Maliki seeks to build an alternative political base:

• Press Sunni and other Iraqi leaders (especially Hakim) [Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Maliki rival] to support Maliki

• Engage Sistani to reassure and seek his support for a new nonsectarian political movement.

Bush To Press Iraqi Premier On Security (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 28 -- President Bush signaled plans to both reassure and pressure Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki over deteriorating conditions in Iraq, as the White House prepared for an unusual summit Wednesday in Jordan aimed at arresting the slide in security.

Speaking with reporters Tuesday in Tallinn, Estonia, before flying here for a NATO summit, Bush hinted at the U.S. government's growing impatience with Maliki when he said he would query the prime minister about his "strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself."

"My questions to him will be: What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?" Bush said. Despite his pointed emphasis on the Iraqi government's role in controlling the violence, Bush also made clear his view that Iraq has not yet fallen into civil war and voiced determination to keep U.S. troops there despite growing pressure to bring them home.

"We will continue to be flexible, and we'll make the changes necessary to succeed. But there's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," Bush said later, in a speech here in the Latvian capital. "We can accept nothing less than victory for our children and our grandchildren."

With violence in Baghdad reaching levels not seen since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, both Bush and Maliki face increasing pressure to accelerate a turnover in responsibility for security to Iraqis and to begin withdrawal of more than 140,000 U.S. ground troops. The White House is conducting an internal review of Iraq policy, and the commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana representative Lee H. Hamilton is finishing its deliberations on what the U.S. government should do.

In a classified memo written earlier this month, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley expressed the administration's private frustration with Maliki's performance, questioning whether "Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others." The secret five-page memo, obtained by the New York Times and posted on its Web site Tuesday night, outlined a series of proposed steps for the United States and Iraq to take.

Among other things, the Nov. 8 memo suggested that Maliki should be pressured to distance himself from anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and "bring to justice" figures in Sadr's militia who "do not eschew violence"; shake up his cabinet to include more nonsectarian technocrats; expand the Iraqi army; and declare the immediate suspension of Iraqi police units suspected of involvement in sectarian conflict.

Hadley proposed that the United States help Maliki build a new political coalition within the Iraqi parliament that would rely more on moderate, less sectarian elements rather than harder-line Shiite representatives. To accomplish this, Hadley said, money could be provided to Maliki's political operation and moderate parties. The memo also raised the possibility of sending more forces to Iraq and recommended that U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad take a lower profile "and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments."

The memo laid bare the doubts about Maliki. Written shortly after Hadley met with the Iraqi prime minister, it noted concerns about various actions, including intervention to stop military action against Shiite targets, efforts to stack ministries with Shiite majorities and reported nondelivery of services to Sunni areas.

These actions "all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad," Hadley wrote. "While there does seem to be an aggressive push to consolidate Shia power and influence, it is less clear whether Maliki is a witting participant." Hadley wrote that Maliki "impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so." A White House spokeswoman Tuesday night had no comment on the memo.

Briefing reporters traveling with the president earlier Tuesday, Hadley said the broader White House Iraq review is not yet complete, suggesting that Bush's meetings with Maliki, scheduled for Wednesday evening and Thursday morning, will not produce any major developments -- at least publicly. But the meetings, the third between the two leaders since Maliki took office in May, will offer an opportunity to resolve tensions between the two governments over how to proceed.

The Bush-Maliki relationship had started with high hopes among White House officials that the prime minister would prove a more effective leader than his predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jafari. After a quick trip to Baghdad in June, Bush declared he had determined that Maliki was dedicated to a free Iraq.

But the relationship has grown fractious as repeated efforts to curb violence in Baghdad have failed. Administration aides have expressed frustration that Maliki has not moved more aggressively against Shiite Muslim militias, while he has bristled at pressure from Washington.

Sadr, the leader of one of those militias, is a key supporter of Maliki's government and a growing political power in the country. Curbing militias such as Sadr's Mahdi Army and bringing sectarian fighting under control are considered critical tests of Iraq's ability to govern itself -- and of the ability of U.S. forces to withdraw without leaving behind a chaotic situation.

Hadley, speaking Tuesday afternoon with reporters in Riga, offered a sober assessment of the Maliki government. He said efforts to secure Baghdad by U.S. and Iraqi forces have "not produced adequate progress in an acceptable time frame." He said Maliki had taken steps to reconcile warring religious and political factions but "obviously they have a long way to go."

Contrary to the doubts expressed in his memo, Hadley told reporters he was not criticizing Maliki, adding that he disagreed with the view in Iraq that Maliki is ineffectual. "We think that this unity government is doing pretty well in a very difficult situation," he said. "Maliki has been impatient and has said that his government has not produced the results they seek. And he's got some ideas about how to enhance their capabilities to do so."

Maliki faces criticism at home for going ahead with his meetings with Bush. Sadr's faction has threatened to bolt the government if the meetings take place, though it was unclear whether the threat would be carried out.

"We don't want or like this meeting, particularly at this time, because the country is in the midst of a security crisis, and the presence of the prime minister is necessary," said Bahaa al-Araji, a member of parliament from Sadr's bloc. "We are concerned that the prime minister may receive instructions from Bush on the security situation. We believe that the government must have the final say on such matters because the security situation is something that concerns Iraq and its government only."

Joost Hiltermann, who follows Iraq for the nonprofit International Crisis Group from Jordan, voiced skepticism that Maliki would crack down on private militias. "He is completely beholden to the Sadrists," he said. "The notion that he could confront the power of the militias that gave him power is absurd."

"There is a problem with saying that we need to get the Iraqis to take charge of the situation," said Eliot A. Cohen, a professor of military strategy at Johns Hopkins University. "By virtue of the kind of government we helped create -- particularly one based on proportional representation -- and because the institutions of the Iraqi state are weak, even if we can get him to promise, we cannot reasonably expect him to deliver much."

Before leaving for Jordan on Wednesday, Bush will finish meetings with other NATO leaders gathered here for a summit that is focusing heavily on the alliance's mission in Afghanistan. U.S. officials were hopeful that the summit would yield new troops for the fight against the resurgent Taliban, as well as a loosening of restrictions from member countries on how those troops can be used.

In a speech here, Bush alluded to these issues in saying that NATO commanders "must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs."

DOJ_NMG_0099247

Bush started the day with a round of meetings in Tallinn with the leaders of Estonia, the first time a sitting U.S. president has visited the tiny Baltic country. Bush has now visited each of the three Baltic nations that gained independence with the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. Given their experiences with despotism, Bush has found a more congenial audience in these countries for his message of promoting democracy and the U.S. interventions in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Iraqi Premier Wants More Control Over His Military (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Maliki will press Bush for the U.S. to relinquish some authority. His government holds direct talks with Syria and Iran.

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki will push for the U.S. military to relinquish control over his nation's security forces when he meets President Bush today to discuss a strategy to quell raging violence in Iraq, aides and political insiders said Tuesday.

Frustrated by U.S. accusations that he isn't doing enough, Maliki says his hands are tied as long as he does not have the authority to deploy forces as he sees fit. He wants Bush to accelerate the training of the army and police, fund more recruits and provide them with bigger and better weapons, lawmakers briefed by Maliki said.

The prime minister also will insist at the two-day summit in Jordan that his government should drive negotiations with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, they said.

Maliki's emboldened stand comes at a time of uncertainty for U.S. strategy in Iraq. Bush is under pressure to make changes after Democrats swept the midterm congressional election on a wave of unhappiness about the war's results.

Bush is waiting for recommendations from a bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which Tuesday continued work on its final report.

Democrats want Bush to set a timeline to start reducing the number of U.S. forces in Iraq. But Bush maintained Tuesday that there was no possibility of an immediate pullout.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do," he said during an afternoon speech in Riga, Latvia, where he was attending a NATO summit. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is completed."

Bush is also under pressure to enlist the help of Iran and Syria in curbing the bloodshed. But he ruled out direct negotiation with Iran unless it halts a uranium enrichment program that potentially could be used to produce nuclear weapons.

While the United States considers its options, Maliki's government has opened direct talks with both countries.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was in Tehran on Tuesday, securing promises of assistance from his counterpart, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. He also has accepted an invitation to visit Syria, said his spokesman, Hiwa Osman, reached by telephone in Tehran.

The comments came on the eve of a hastily arranged summit in Amman, the Jordanian capital, where King Abdullah II will hold talks with Bush and Maliki after a week of some of the fiercest fighting in Iraq's civil war.

At least 215 people were killed in coordinated car bombings Thursday in a Shiite Muslim slum of Baghdad, a stronghold of anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr and his Al Mahdi militia. Hundreds more died in days of reprisal attacks, as Shiite and Sunni militiamen pounded neighborhoods with mortar rounds and gunfire.

As the toll grew, Iraqis on both sides of the sectarian divide directed their anger at the United States and demanded an immediate pullout.

"If the Americans withdraw, the fighting will stop," Iraq's most revered Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari, said in Jordan, where he met with Abdullah in the run-up to the summit. "Once Americans make the decision to withdraw, whether it is in one or two years, we can go to the resistance and tell them you have what you have been fighting for."

But other Sunnis trapped in Baghdad's strife-torn neighborhoods said they had no one besides the Sunni fighters to turn to for protection. They accused Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force of turning a blind eye to sectarian death squads and even colluding with them.

Sunnis are likely to find threatening any consolidation of security forces in Maliki's hands.

Adnan Dulaimi, head of the Sunni bloc in parliament, found himself calling for U.S. help when gunmen attacked his home over the weekend.

"I think that without the Americans, there will be a security vacuum and the result will be civil war," he said Tuesday.

Sadr's political representatives threatened last week to pull out of parliament and the Cabinet if Maliki met with Bush, a move that could precipitate the collapse of a painfully crafted government drawing in representatives of Iraq's main ethnic and religious groups. By Tuesday, however, they had softened their stance.

"We will wait until we have the visit and then we will examine the situation: Are there any benefits or good results for the Iraqi people?" said Nassar Rubaie, a spokesman for Sadr's political bloc. "Then we will discuss it and eventually decide" whether to pull out.

Bush said he intended to ask questions of Maliki, rather than offer his own solutions.

"My questions to him will be: What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?" Bush told reporters in the Estonian capital, Tallinn, en route to the Riga summit.

Maliki insiders said the prime minister's answer would be to tell U.S. commanders to give the Iraqi government full control over its security forces.

"This will not happen overnight; it needs a lot of preparation," said Haider Abadi, a lawmaker from Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party. "We need to build our forces, we need to train them, we need to arm them properly.... But if we can achieve a timeline, we will have achieved a lot."

U.S. and Iraqi officials also expect to discuss Talabani's visit to Iran. Khamenei on Tuesday blamed American policies for the violence in Iraq and told Talabani that Iran considered it a "religious and humane duty" to help establish security in the neighboring country, according to his office's website.

Bush is expected to press Maliki to deliver on promises to disarm Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army and the rival Badr Brigade, which are linked to key members of the political bloc that put the prime minister in power.

But Abadi and other officials close to Maliki ruled out military action against the militias.

"Unfortunately, you cannot disarm militias when your population feels the Iraqi security forces and the multinational forces are not doing enough to protect them from terrorists," he said. "This will result in the collapse of the government."

He said the government would seek a political solution to the problem of private armies and focus on cleaning up its security forces, which officials acknowledge have been infiltrated by Shiite militiamen.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have been vague about any expected outcome from the meeting, a silence that appeared to inspire little confidence among Iraqis reeling from last week's carnage.

"I don't think any good will come out of this meeting," said Kareem abu Karrar, whose world was upended when a car bomb exploded in the busy intersection where he sells electrical goods. He saw friends ripped to pieces and watched in a daze as a minivan packed with passengers flew through the air.

"We are now used to not expecting any good from Bush or Maliki," he said, "because we learned that after every attempt for national reconciliation, the exact opposite happens."

Some Question Whether Al-Maliki Strong Enough (USAT)

By César G. Soriano And Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Two months ago, President Bush declared Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was “the right man” for the job.

DOJ_NMG_0099249

As Bush prepares to meet with al-Maliki today and Thursday in Jordan, analysts say there is growing evidence that al-Maliki is not up to the formidable task of bringing stability to his country.
